From your hostility to a particular measure, you have attempted to take away that freedom of action which you admit justly belongs to them; and to accomplish this object, you have presumed to exercise a power which you admit you do not possess. You have even attempted to instruct and control the votes of the immediate representatives of the people; a power which is no where claimed as belonging to the Legislature. It is surprising to us that you did not foresee the obvious objections to a proceeding so extraordinary. It is wonderful you did not perceive that the disclaimer of the right to instruct, on the part of the Assembly, took away all obligation on the part of the instructed to obey. The entire doctrine of instruction rests on the principle of the right of the Legislature, as the constituent body, to control the action of the Senators of the State, as it agents or representatives. It is, so far as respects a particular measure, a withdrawal or reclamation of the trust delegated by the original appointment. The Legislature takes back the trust into their own hands, and absolves the Senators from all responsibility, and assumes the same themselves. As it assumes the duty of the Senators, it necessarily assumes all the responsibility which pertained to that duty. It is not our purpose here to examine the soundness of this doctrine, but only to explain what it is, and the principle on which it rests. The whole depends on the right of the Legislature to instruct, and if that is denied, the whole doctrine falls to the ground; and any attempt to exercise such a power, can be regarded in no other light than a usurpation, involving a flagrant violation of the rights of the Senators, and of the people of the State whose representatives they are. The injustice of attempting to exercise this power, when not founded on the acknowledged right of instruction, will be more manifest by looking a little farther into the subject. The Legislature is not the constituent body of the Senators, but the whole people of the State. The right of instruction exists, if at all, not in the General Assembly, but in the people, and could be exercised by you for their benefit only. Where such right is generally recognised by the people, the representatives in the Legislature of a State are elected with a view to the exercise of such power, if, in their judgment, there shall be occasion for it, as well as to attend to the local interests of the State. But where the people do not generally acknowledge the existence of the right of instruction, the attempt of their representatives to exercise such power, is a palpable act of usurpation. In such a case, it is truly an "odious doctrine."

Taking such to be the fact, what authority had you to attempt to assume our duty and our votes, and to dispose of them according to your judgment or caprice? If your constituents deny the principle of instruction, they can have conferred upon you no such power: they cannot be supposed to have conferred on their representatives powers which they do not claim to possess themselves. They do not admit your right to interpose between us and our duty; and we cannot, therefore, absolve ourselves from our responsibilities to them, on the ground that you, in violation of their rights, as well as ours, have instructed us how to act. They hold us directly responsible to them; and there is no way that we can avoid that responsibility, as long as they deny your right to interfere.

Is it then true, that your constituents do deny the right of instruction? Of this we think there is no doubt. Your own prompt disavowal of it must be regarded as nearly conclusive on this point; and especially as you did this at a time when it would have been very convenient, for the purpose you had in view, to have admitted the principle. But this you dared not do. We are not disposed to charge you with having, in this decision, disregarded the known will of your constituents; but must believe that it was a knowledge of their sentiments which constrained you to vote as you did on the amendment before referred to.

But we have other evidence of the sentiments of your constituents, whose opinions on this subject have been long known. In 1835, when the majority of the General Assembly were elected by that portion of the citizens of the State who, in the arrangement of political parties, constitute the Democracy, a resolution was passed instructing the then Senators in Congress to vote to expunge from the journal of the Senate of the United States a certain resolution condemnatory of the late President of the United States. This resolution was in the following words:

"Therefore be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Assembly convened, That the Senators in Congress from this State be instructed, and they are hereby instructed, to vote in favor of rescinding and expunging from the records of the Senate the said recited resolution."

In the preamble to this resolution are the following words:

"And whereas, it is not only the right, but the duty, of the immediate representatives of the people, when the sentiments of their constituents are known in relation to any subject affecting their rights and liberties, to instruct the Senators of the State in Congress to conform thereto, so that they may truly and faithfully represent the people of this State."

This resolution of 1835 not only contains an instruction, in direct and positive terms, but also an assertion of the right of instruction on the part of the Legislature, and derives this right from the known sentiments of their constituents. It may also be stated here, that pending the election that year, the question of the right and propriety of instructing the Senators of the State to vote to expunge the resolution of the Senate of the United States referred to, was much discussed, was acted upon in primary meetings of the people, and formed an important consideration on which the election turned.

If in any case, therefore, instructions would be held obligatory on Senators, this was such a case. But notwithstanding all this, one of the instructed Senators—the Hon. Gideon Tomlinson—opposed the expunging of the aforesaid resolution of the Senate of the United States, in violation of such instructions from the Legislature; and soon after he was nominated by the same political party to whom you owe your election, as their candidate for Governor, and received the votes of that party at the election which took place in April, 1836. The General Assembly, in 1836, also passed a resolution instructing its Senators to vote to recognise the independence of Texas; and in the session of 1837, the said Tomlinson voted in disregard of his instructions, and soon after was nominated by the same political party for Congress, and received their votes in his district.

In these instances, a violation or disregard of instructions appears to have been considered by the political party who constitute your constituents, as a recommendation to favor and confidence rather than a political offence. We might refer to numerous other evidences of the fact that your constituents totally deny the right of instruction, and disclaim it as a false and dangerous doctrine.

From these examples, therefore, we have every reason to believe that we should best conform to the opinions and wishes of your constituents, now a majority in the State, by voting directly contrary to your instructions, which they, it is reasonable to suppose, must regard as an unauthorized proceeding, and a violation of their rights.

If, therefore, we were to regard the aforesaid resolution as designed by you to instruct us, and control our votes, we could not, consistently with what we believe to be due to the known principles of the majority in the State, consider ourselves bound by it; because we must regard it as an unauthorized act on your part, and a violation of the rights of your constituents, who hold us as responsible to them, and not to you, who do not admit that we can avoid the responsibility which belongs to our stations by any act of yours.

We have endeavored to show what are the opinions of your constituents in respect to the doctrine of instruction; but we are at a loss to discover what your principles are on that subject. You have voted down a proposition which asserted the right of instruction, and have nevertheless passed a resolution which purports to instruct us. The only interpretation we can put on conduct so inconsistent and extraordinary is, that you regard the doctrine of instruction as unsound in principle, and yet are willing to use it against Senators who may be politically opposed to you, either to control their action, which you admit you have no right to do, or to force them to resign. Such a proceeding, so inconsistent with the character of an honorable and enlightened Legislature, we have witnessed with the deepest regret, as we cannot but regard it as derogatory to the character of the State, which must suffer when its legislative councils so far forget what is due to their high functions as to practise the most paltry artifice and trickery to effect selfish party purposes. If you deny the principle of instruction, you are precluded from passing any valid instructing resolution; and any attempt to do it can have no binding force, as the obligation to obey rests entirely on the right to instruct.

With these views of the subject, we would respectfully inform you that we cannot consider the aforesaid resolution as having any binding force as an instruction, intended to control our action, even if such was the fair import of the language, as you disclaim the right to instruct.

The only light, therefore, in which we can regard the resolution, is as an expression of the will or opinion of the Legislature. In this view of it, the respect to which it is entitled depends, in part, upon the reasons which appear to have influenced the action of the General Assembly; and all we know on this point is contained in the preamble to the resolution. We presume that the act referred to as the Sub-Treasury or Independent Treasury bill, is the bill which passed the Senate, entitled "An act to impose additional duties on certain public officers," &c. From the terms, however, in which you speak of this bill, we should be almost led to believe that you could not be acquainted with its provisions, and that you must have formed your opinions concerning it from the polluted sources of the Bank presses of the country. If the provisions of the bill had been examined, we are persuaded that neither prejudice or perversity of judgment, however great, could have led the General Assembly to express the opinion that this act "is, in its character and tendency, contrary to the spirit of our free institutions, dangerous to our liberties, and destructive to our dearest interests." You do not inform us what provision or what principle there is in the act which is pregnant with such dreadful consequences. We are left entirely in the dark on this subject. If you had only pointed out what there is in the act fraught with such consequences, it would have afforded us great relief, as we should have been as ready to oppose and to denounce it as were the majority of the General Assembly.

The principle of the act is, that it is the right and the duty of the Government to manage its own revenues, through the agency of its own officers. This is the principle of the bill; all the rest is matter of detail. Do you mean to assert that this principle is, "in its character and tendency, contrary to the spirit of our free institutions and dangerous to our liberties?" Do you believe that the liberties of the country would be endangered by entrusting the revenues of the people to the sworn officers of the Government, subjected to the strictest accountability? What would you have the Government do? If it cannot trust its own officers, pray whom can it trust? Can it confide with more safety in the officers of moneyed corporations? Is there no danger to liberty from a partnership between the Government and the banking institutions of the country, whether State or National?

We are equally at loss to perceive what there is in this bill which should have led the General Assembly to believe that, should it become a law, "it would still further derange the currency, prostrate business, spread ruin and desolation through all clases of society, and change the present distress into a settled and deep-rooted despair." This is truly a most gloomy and horrid picture of distress, and we can hardly imagine how the General Assembly, penetrated with such fearful apprehensions, could have adjourned without having adopted some measures to have averted from the people of the State a threatened calamity, which could only be equalled by the "pestilence which walketh in darkness, and wasteth at noonday." Fortunately, these terrible calamities exist no where, unless it be in the minds of the enemies of this measure; and whether they exist there or not—whether they are feigned, or the results of a diseased imagination—we leave for the world to decide, by contrasting the words with the actions of all these prophets of wo.

The bill has not become a law; but its principles have been practically carried into operation in the management of the finances, for more than a year; and instead of the currency becoming "still further deranged," it has been gradually improving; and instead of "business being prostrated, and desolation and ruin spread through all classes of society,' business has been steadily reviving, and is now nearly recovered from the severe revulsion occasioned by the explosion of the banks, and an unprecedented course of over-trading for the two preceding years. And as to the desolation and ruin, we believe that they exist no where in our fair and prosperous land, except in the jeremiads of the panic orators.

We are, therefore, happy to be able to inform you that these apprehended calamities to the people of the State and country are entirely groundless.

Another reason assigned is, "that, if said bill should become a law, it will provide one currency for the office holders, and an inferior one for the people." This objection, we are persuaded, cannot have been derived from an examination of the bill, but has, probably, been received from the speeches of the opponents of the measure in the Senate, where it has figured largely. The objection would, undoubtedly, have great weight in it, was it true; but, unfortunately for those who use it, there is not one particle of truth in it.

The bill, as it passed the Senate, provides no currency either for office holders or the people. It has nothing to do with the question of currency, even so far as respects the public revenues, as that depends on existing laws. As the bill contains no provisions whatever, in relation to the currency, it is certainly a great mistake to say that "it provides one currency for the office holders, and an inferior one for the people."

And in respect to other laws, the Federal Government provides but one currency, and that is gold and silver, which is both for office holders and the people. The inferior currency to which we presume you allude, we suppose must be the paper emissions of the banks, which we would beg leave to inform you are not "provided" by the Federal Government, but by State legislation. Of this important fact, we presume the majority of the General Assembly were not ignorant; yet it would seem that it did not occur to them when urging the last objection to the measure under consideration.

As the friends of a sound currency, and to a much greater extent than now exists of a metallic currency, we are rejoiced to perceive that the General Assembly, are of the opinion, that bank paper is an "inferior currency" to gold and silver. This sound and highly important opinion, promises well for the interests of the State, and we hope and trust that it will be carried out in its future legislation.

With these views of the reasons assigned by the Legislature, and with the strong convictions which we entertain of the necessity, justice, and importance of the measure in question, we must respectfully inform you, that should the bill again come before the Senate, we shall feel it our duty to give it our support, although we regret to differ on so important a measure with the General Assembly, and perhaps with the majority of our constituents.

Here we might stop, having said all that is necessary to explain our course, and the reasons for it; but an apprehension that we may be charged with having studiously avoided an expression of our own opinions, regarding the doctrine of instruction, induces us to go something farther, that the particular case seems to require.

We do not wish to disguise our opinions on this or any other subject, as our constituents have a right to know what they are. The doctrine of instruction rests on a popular principle, and we are, and ever have been, fully persuaded that the just and proper Administration of our Government, both State and National, consisted in giving a full development to, and justly and fairly carrying out, all the popular principles in the system. Considering the right of instruction as one of these principles, we respect it, and feel bound to carry it out to the utmost limit of the Constitution. Farther than this, we cannot go as long as the Constitution remains as it is. If it is deemed necessary to carry this, or any other popular principle farther, it must be done by changing the Constitution. When the question arises in that form, there can be no embarrassment from existing institutions, and every one is left free to follow out this or any other popular principle, so far as, in his judgment, will best conduce to the safety, liberty, and happiness of the people—the just ends of all Government. We believe in, and will sustain, the right of instruction, so far as it is consistent with the Constitution, and no farther, as that is the supreme law of the land, which we have sworn to support. To violate it, by pushing to an extreme, a popular principle, is still a violation; and although the end may be good, the means cannot be justified.

As the principle of instruction is understood in some the States, it appears to be directly in conflict with the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution; and to the extent that it is so, it appears to us to be an unsound and even a dangerous doctrine. It is held that the right of the Legislature to instruct carries with it the unqualified obligation on the part of the Senator to obey or resign. This is substantially to change the Constitution, and to alter the tenure of the office of Senator. Under the Constitution, a Senator holds his office for six years; and as it has prescribed no restriction, limitation, or qualification whatsoever, it becomes a constitutional right, and equally a constitutional obligation, to exercise his own judgment on all questions that come before the Senate, and to act free from compulsion or coercion in any form. To hold, therefore, that the Legislature have a right to absolutely control the vote of a Senator, or force him to resign, is inconsistent with the Constitution; for if he obeys against his judgment, the vote he gives is not his own, but that of the Legislature, which has no constitutional right to give a vote in the Senate, and is given by him by compulsion, in violation of that freedom of action which the Constitution guarantees, not only to him, but to the whole body of his constituents, as well the minority as the majority. If he refuses to obey, and resigns his seat by compulsion, that is, changing the tenure of his office, and instead of a term of six years, he holds it during the pleasure of the Legislature, not to exceed six years, which is inconsistent with the Constitution.

The object of this doctrine is to give greater effect to the popular and fundamental principle, that the representative possesses only delegated power, and is not to exercise it for himself, but for his constituents. The object is good; but the principle of instruction, carried to the extent we have considered, is neither a just nor an effectual means of attaining it. To make that principle efficacious and uniform, it must be incorporated into the Constitution; then it would be legally binding, and operate equally upon all. Now it can only operate upon the conscience of those who believe in the doctrine; for those who do not admi that the Legislature has any such right, feel bound, both by conscience and their oath, to act according to their best judgment for the interest of their State and country, and do not in conscience believe that the Legislature of the State can interpose and take from them their responsibility to the people, whom they regard as their real constituents.

The object intended to be effected by the principle of instruction cannot, to any considerable extent, be accomplished; its efficacy must be limited to those who recognise the doctrine, and to such of that number as are honest enough to conform to it in their own practice. Many are strong believers in it, so far as regards its application to others; but, when applied to themselves, they find no difficulty in discovering some subterfuge to avoid its force. As the consciences of men are very different, a principle which is applicable only to the conscience must be a very unsafe and variable rule of action.

Ought a body, whose deliberations are so important as the Senate of the United States, to be liable to be controlled in its action by a principle so uncertain and unequal as this?

Let us suppose the country is divided into two great political parties; one of which holds this doctrine to the extent we have explained it, and the other totally deny it. At a particular time, the latter are a majority in the Senate, but a minority in the States. The Legislatures of some of the States, represented by Senators opposed to them, instruct their Senators, who feel, in conscience, bound not to obey. In such a state of things, the party which has become a minority, and as the case may be—a small minority in the States—still remains a majority in the Senate, and can control the action of Congress.

But suppose the party which recognises the principle of instruction are in a majority in the Senate, but, by some temporary change in public opinion, they fall into a minority in the States. Some of the States instruct their Senators, who feel bound to obey or resign; and in either case, the majority in the Senate is destroyed. It would, therefore, result, that one party could not maintain a majority in the Senate unless they were a majority in the States; whilst the other party, less scrupulous, or holding different principles, although a minority in the States, may still continue, for years, a majority in the Senate—the most important branch of the Government.

This is not supposing an extreme case, but only what has, to some extent, already occurred, and its injustice and inequality all must admit. It may be said that a party which does not recognise the soundness of the principle, will never attempt to instruct Senators who may be opposed to them, and whom they may suppose respect the principle. Consistency might require this; but experience teaches us otherwise, and proves that it has been, and will be done. The very case which has led to this communication, as you must be aware, is an instruction from a Legislature, a large majority of whom disavow the right, as we have already shown. And in any State, where parties are nearly equal in numbers, as is the case now in Connecticut, it is easy to see, that by the observance of this principle by one, and the disregard and abuse of it by the other, the latter may secure the representation in the Senate at all times. If they acquire the majority in the Legislature, when the Senators are against them, they have nothing to do but to instruct them out, and fill their places with men of their own principles; and if, the very next year, they fall into a minority in the Legislature, they will still retain their power in the Senate, as their Senators, if instructed, will neither obey or resign. It is contrary to their consciences to do either; but it is perfectly consistent with the consciences of such a party to attempt to use against others a principle which they will not observe themselves, and which they declare to be odious. Can any doctrine be just which leads to such results? Can any principle be sound which is liable to be used by those who deny its authority to overthrow the power of those who respect it? Whether the votes of a State in the Senate, on any important measure, are to be given according to the judgment of the Senators, or the will of the Legislature, must always depend on the fact of the Legislature being in session, and having an opportunity to give instructions, circumstances altogether contingent and accidental. One objection to this "obey or resign" principle is, that it annihilates the rights of the minority in a State, who are as much a part of the constituency as the majority, and makes the Senators the mere agents or instruments of a temporary majority in the Legislature.

Whilst the doctrine of instruction is designed to give greater effect to the public will, its tendency, in practice, will commonly be to impair it, by taking away the responsibility of the Senators. The true American doctrine is, to impose upon legislators, as upon all other functionaries, the necessary and proper limitations and restrictions on their power, by the constitutional or organic law, and to subject them, within their prescribed sphere of action, to the highest degree of responsibility. This depends mainly on two principles: first, to secure publicity to their action, and thus subject them to the scrutiny and censorship of public opinion and the press; and secondly, by a suitable limitation of the term of the office, so that the representative will at all times act under a consciousness that his trust is soon to return to the constituent body, who will not be likely to restore it to a faithless representative, who has once abused it. These two principles come only in aid of another, still more important, which is, the right and the duty of the constituent body to select representatives whose principles correspond with their own, and whose known personal and political integrity afford a guaranty that they will honestly adhere to those principles, and faithfully carry out the popular will. If this important privilege of selecting for representatives men whose principles are known to be in conformity with those of the majority of their constituents, and who possess a high character for integrity, is disregarded, the right of instruction will be of little avail in securing a faithful representation of the principles and opinions of the constituent body.

The true doctrine of instruction results from the theory of the Government, and we consider it to be this: That any direct and positive expression of the opinion, will, or desire, of the Legislature in respect to the action of its Senators on any particular measure, is to be regarded as an instruction, as much as though a particular prescribed form of words was used; and that in no case is a legislative instruction, whatever may be the form or language, to be regarded as absolutely mandatory. The Legislature of a State has no right to command its Senators to resign in any form. If they can do it conditionally, they can absolutely. The instruction should be considered not as mandatory, but as advisory; and is entitled to the greatest respect from the Senators, who ought not to disregard it without the most weighty and substantial reasons.

That there are such reasons in the present case, we have abundantly shown, as the General Assembly not only acted without authority, but in the face of an express disclaimer of the right to instruct; besides, it appears to us evident, from the preamble to the resolution, that the majority must have entirely misapprehended the principles and provisions of the bill to which their resolution refers.

We are sensible that the right of legislative instruction is generally respected by that portpon of the citizens of the State, with whom we are politically associated; yet we believe, that there are few even of this portion of our constituents, now supposed to be a minority, who hold instructions as absolutely mandatory. They regard this doctrine as a part of their general creed, which recognises and cherishes all the popular principles of our political institutions. They respect the principle as an element of popular rights, and as a means of giving efficacy to the popular will, within the prescribed limits of the Constitution. They desire the legitimate and proper use of the principle, not its flagrant and palpable abuse, to effect selfish party purposes.

They believe that a Legislature, which disavows the right of instruction, cannot honestly nor rightfully exercise a power which they declare they do not possess. Such a proceeding, we are persuaded, they must regard, not only as without authority but as derogatory to the Legislature—being a prostitution of its high functions to the miserable purpose of attempting to accomplish a selfish end by dishonest means; and at the same time, calculated to bring into contempt a popular principle, which, when fairly understood, and properly applied, they sincerely respect.

It is evident, therefore, that to obey your instructions, given under the circumstances to which we have referred, would be disregarding the sentiments of one portion of our constituents, and a direct violation of the known principles of the other, now supposed to be the majority; neither of which can we consent to do, consistently with the respect which we feel for both.

This, gentlemen, is a fruitful subject, on which much more might be said; but we fear we have already exhausted your patience, and will conclude with the expression of our regret that we cannot comply with the wishes of the General Assembly, consistently with our sense of duty to the people of the State who have honored us with the responsible station we hold; and this regret is the more sincere, as we have seen abundant evidence of the enlightened and patriotic purposes of the present Legislature, the important results of whose wisdom, intelligence and firmness, we doubt not, will be duly appreciated, and not soon forgotten by our common constituents.

With sentiments of great respect,
We are, gentlemen, yours, &c.
J. M. NILES,
P. SMITH.

Mr. NILES said he had intended to submit some additional observations, but feared he should consume too much of the time of the Senate. The paper he had read contained three distinct grounds, each of which he considered a complete justification of the course he and his colleague proposed to pursue. The first is, that the resolution is not, in its terms, or in substance, upon any fair construction, an instruction which could be regarded as obligatory upon the Senators. If the principle of instruction was admitted to the utmost extent it had been carried any where, the resolution does not come within it. It instructs us what is the will of the Legislature, but studiously avoids a mandatory form of expression. By avoiding this, it appears that the General Assembly was not willing to assume the responsibility of our votes, or did not feel authorized to do so. As the responsibility is left upon us, that imposes upon us the duty of acting according to our own judgment. Or, at most, we can only consider the resolution as an expression of the opinion of the General Assembly.

The second ground is, that if the resolution had been mandatory in its terms, the General Assembly, in its passage, voted down an amendment which expressly asserted the right of instruction. They first deny the right, and then proceed to instruct, if the resolution is so to be regarded. This must necessarily take from it all mandatory authority, even if its terms had imported it. The resolution of 1835, to which he had referred, was not only direct and explicit in in its terms, importing a command, but contains an express assertion of the right, derived from popular sentiment. Had there been, in the case under consideration, only an omission to assert the right, it might perhaps have been claimed, with some propriety, that the passage of the resolution carried with it an implied assertion of the principle. The performance of an act, it might be said, was in itself a declaration of the right and power to perform it.

But no such deduction can be made in this case, because the majority expressly disavow the right, and speak of it as an odious doctrine. This objection, therefore, takes from the resolution all authority, and leaves it only as an expression of the opinion of the General Assembly; and had it assumed to be nothing more, it would have been entitled to the highest respect. But on its face it bears the stamp of intentional ambiguity, and double-dealing. The whole proceeding wears the appearance of an attempt to practise a deception upon all parties—upon the Senators and representatives, by inducing them to believe that they were instructed, when those who voted for the resolution did not consider it as such. It was deceptive in relation to the constituents of the Assembly; for if they were to complain of the exercise of a power which did not belong to the Legislature, the language is so equivocal, that it would be easy to deny that it was intended as an instruction.

The studied ambiguity of the resolution appears to be a fraud on the principles and consciences of those who passed it; an attempt to get round their own principles, and to act on what they may have supposed to be the principles of their political opponents, without recognising the same themselves. This, if he might be permitted to quote the old adage, is what may be called "whipping the Devil around the stump."

Although these two grounds of objection were each believed to be sufficient to explain and justify the course he and his colleague felt it a duty to pursue; and although this resolution does not properly come within the principle of instruction, yet they had no wish to avoid an expression of their opinions on the principle itself. He had no desire to place the justification of his conduct on a plea of abatement, or even a special plea in bar, but preferred to meet the broad principle on which the General Assembly professed to act, although they disavowed it themselves. He rather rejoiced at an opportunity to set himself right on that subject.

Mr. N. said that no principle was more grossly perverted to the selfish purposes of party than this, and he thought it high time that it was rescued from such palpable abuse. This was, to some extent, true of both of the two great political parties, but more especially of the Federal or Whig party. He believed they never respected the principle when applied to themselves, yet were always ready to use it as an instrument against their opponents.

He could not admit that a party who denied the doctrine of instruction, who disregarded it themselves, and treated it as odious, could, with any semblance of justice or propriety, apply it to others. It had become a mere engine of party warfare. On this point he might differ from some of his friends; but, for one, he could not carry his respect for any principle so far as to become an instrument of its gross abuse and perversion—a perversion which destroys the principle and occasions the most manifold injustice. He intended to have no professions in his political creed which he did not carry out in practice; and it was, in his judgment, impossible that any principle can be faithfully adhered to in practice by one political party, which is entirely disregarded by another. The old adage is founded in good sense: "that it is a bad rule which will not work both ways."

The abuse of the principle has arisen from pushing it too far. An instruction, whatever may be its terms, ought never to be regarded as possessing the absolute authority of a law, or as carrying with it an unqualified obligation to obey or resign. There is no such right or power in the Legislature; and the attempt to set it up and exercise it, has very nearly brought the entire doctrine into ridicule and contempt. It has taken from it the respect, influence, and authority, which justly belong to it when the principle is correctly understood and honestly applied.

In respect to the proceedings of his own Legislature, he regretted that he had felt it a duty to speak of them in the terms he had. But they were unworthy of the General Assembly, and did no credit to the State. The resolution, without having the form or substance, or resting on the principle, of a mandatory instruction, was so worded as to have that appearance, and to place his colleague and himself in a situation either to obey it, or to be subjected to a charge of violating the instructions of the General Assembly, and of being held up to their constituents and the country in that light. This had rendered it necessary for them to pursue the course they had.

He was surprised at the whole proceeding, and at the strange reasons assigned against the Independent Treasury bill. Surely they ought to have been informed on this subject; neither pains or expense had been spared to do it. Great exertions had been made, and much money expended, to enlighten the people. Both in the State and out of it, much had been done. Agents had been sent on here for aid, and the State had been literally flooded with speeches from this place. The mails have groaned under their weight. But these mighty labors do not appear to have produced any very important results, if we are to judge from this resolution.

Mr. N. asked that the resolution might be read and laid on the table.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he supposed this reply to the Legislature of Connecticut was expected to receive some degree of sanction from the fact of its having been read to the Senate of the United States, for he could discover no other reason for reading it. Against allowing it any such sanction Mr. C. most emphatically protested. He was wholly unwilling to let it go out with the appearance of any such sanction. He was sorry, notwithstanding, to deprive the Senator of any consolation in his present state of political adversity, and it was with no personal unkindness that Mr. C. endeavored to withhold from him the sanction desired; but he did not wish to become in any way accessory to the promulgation of such a document, filled as it was with matter derogatory to the Legislature and State which the Senator represented.

For himself and his principles, Mr. C. said, when the pleasure of his Legislature should be made known to him in any form, though he did not profess to be under the obligation of unlimited and passive obedience, there must be circumstances of very great potency that would induce him to disobey legislative instructions, and they would at all times obtain from him a respectful hearing. But he must protest against this reply of the Senator, which denounced the proceedings of the Legislature as dishonorable, and as a prostitution of the right of instruction; and it even went beyond that, and obliquely charged the results of the late election as having been brought about by the use of money. This sort of language held by a Senator here against his State ought in no way to be sanctioned by such a body as the United States Senate. And had the gentlemian's doctrine of instructions come to this, that when the instructions came from political friends they were to be obeyed in the most obsequious manner, but when they can be called a party project, for a party purpose, then the little minority, and their representatives, in all the insolence of office, may denounce those instructions as dishonorable, and may say to the majority of the people of the State, you have been seduced by the minority, and we therefore will not obey our instructions?

The Senator had made use of the term "we" in his reply. Whether this was meant to include his colleague, or whether the gentleman meant to speak in the royal style, Mr. C. did not know. But however that was, Mr. C. was sorry to see the spirit in which gentlemen submitted to their political retirement. They had gone beyond their depth in a sea of glory, that was all; and when they were brought back, and had conned their lessons in the school of adversity, Mr. C. thought they might perhaps be brought to their senses, and made useful members of society in their proper places.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut observed that he rose, at this time, simply for the purpose of satisfying the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] that his colleague did not express himself in the plural to indicate himself only as having given the reply to the Legislature of Connecticut, but had his sanction in every thing said in that answer. If, sir, said Mr. S. we are to be admonished here by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, for having improperly given an answer to the instructions of the Legislature of our State, he apprehended that the gentleman might have some feeling on this subject; and with some good reason, as the gentleman seemed to find fault with expressions made here, as being unkind and unjust towards the Legislature of Connecticut, who gave these instructions. Money, the honorable Senator says, was stated by my honorable colleague to have been distributed, influencing the action of the people in that State, which procured the result which produced the majority in that Legislature. I have no doubt of it, and am willing to express it here and elsewhere, and for that reason am willing that it should go abroad under my hand, in connection with that of my colleague, that this Legislature came into power under extraordinary circumstances, by various means, not necessary to enter into here. By this means, however, I am prepared to say, and that gentleman too, if he lives twelve months more, will say that they came into power without the approbation of the people themselves.

But why did gentlemen show so much feeling in regard to the people of Connecticut? Is he so intimately connected with them? And if so, I desire to know how it is that he became so connected. Sir, one of the means used to produce the result I have referred to, was the sending of missionaries from the State of Kentucky and elsewhere, to operate on the good people of Connecticut, to assist in bringing about that result from which these instructions emanated. Who are those persons? They are too well known in that State to be necessary to name them here. Are they the persons who were intimately connected with the late tragedy? Has the honorable gentleman himself been so connected with that tragedy, that he should express this bitter feeling about the answer of himself and colleague? If so, let him enjoy it. I assure him that all the advantage gained in sending that mission to Connecticut, will not contribute much to the success of the cause he advocates. Taking it altogether, the mission, and the catastrophe that followed the authors, will not gain as much as they calculated on. Sir, by what means it commenced; who had any agency with it; who concocted it, and what produced this result, if the honorable Senator supposed he had contributed any thing to it, I am satisfied that he should have the full benefit of it. But that he should step between the Senators from Connecticut and their Legislature, and admonish them, I deny that he has the right. He may have the full benefit of that temporary revolution; for I am satisfied that it will be but temporary.

I have nothing more to say, than to satisfy this Senate that this answer of myself and colleague had my full assent. If the honorable Senator from Kentucky has any peculiar interest in the State of Connecticut, I have no objection to his exercising it; but I am not accountable to him or to any body else for my conduct towards the Legislature of my State. I will forbear to suggest the means that were made use of, to place this Legislature in power, to enable them to give these instructions no further than barely to allude to the circumstances, which perhaps excite the feelings of a Senator here. But are we to be charged with improper conduct, with insolence for answering them, when they undertook to instruct us to vote, under a principle which they themselves declared unsound? If this placed them in an exalted position in the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky, I have no objection. A Legislature undertakes to instruct Senators to disobey the Constitution of the country, when this very Legislature says that they themselves do not believe that it ought to be done in that particular. They virtually say we consider the principles on which these instructions are based, are unsound; yet we undertake not only to act for ourselves, but for the people you represent.

If they have placed themselves in this position, is it wrong for us to say to them in reply, that they have acted improperly—that they have exercised a power which they themselves say does not exist?

Are we, said Mr. S. to sit by, and hear ourselves denounced for giving our reasons for not obeying instructions, which those who gave them say are founded on principles which they do not believe in? Are we to be charged with insolence and impropriety of conduct, and at the same time to be told that it is a matter with which we have nothing to do? While the Senator from Kentucky denounces our conduct as unworthy of the seats we hold, I must believe his denunciation grows out of feelings such as a simple representative from Kentucky could not possess. If I have mistaken the feelings of the Senator, and done him injustice, I am sorry for it.

But there must be some cause for this excitement and for this feeling, and the denunciation of us for the answer which we, as representatives of Connecticut, have given to our Legislature. I have barely risen to show that if there is any such feeling any where, that it came from a quarter whence we had no right to expect it.

Mr. NILES replied to Mr. CRITTENDEN with much warmth. Whether this proceeding had been regular, or irregular and unusual, he would not undertake to say; but sure he was that the remarks of the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] were unusual, and of a very extraordinary character. He has undertaken to arraign me, and to pronounce a lecture to me on the course I ought to pursue towards my constituents. He has thrust himself between me and my constituents, and undertaken to instruct me in my duty to them. I think I know what my duty is, and do not desire the volunteer aid of any one to enlighten me in it. Mr. N. said he knew both his duty and his rights; and whilst he should endeavor to discharge the one, he should take care to cause the other to be respected. An interference and attack upon him of this kind, he could not have expected from any quarter; and from none less than from the Senator—he was about to say his friend—from Kentucky; for, although differing in politics, he had entertained towards him the most kind and friendly feelings. The Senator speaks of this proceeding as very extraordinary, and asks whether any action is expected upon the paper he (Mr. N.) had read? He protests against its receiving any sanction from the Senate, or any authority or additional influence on account of its having been introduced here. He cared nothing for the gentleman's protest, as he neither asked nor expected any action of the Senate on the paper. He had introduced it as a response to the resolution of the Legislature of his State, which he had presented, and as containing an explanation of the views of his colleague and himself on that subject. It was read as a part of his (Mr. N's) speech, and in that light was before the Senate, but in no other. It was perfectly competent for him to present his views in regard to the resolution he had offered, as he saw fit; in a speech, or a written response, which he had a right to make a part of his speech. This he had done, and he believed there was nothing extraordinary or unusual in it. If there was, the Senator should have called him to order; not attempt to arraign his conduct, and read him a lecture. For his conduct here he was accountable to his constituents and the country; and to this body, so far as respects an observance of its rules: but he was not accountable to any individual member.

Mr. N. said he had no petty ambition, as the Senator intimated, of seeking a quarrel with the Legislature of his State. His purpose was very different, and of a much more exalted character. In a certain contingency, a high and responsible duty would devolve upon him, in which not only his own State, but the whole country, were interested. In indicating the course he felt it a duty to pursue, he desired to present the considerations by which he had been governed. This was not a question between him and the Legislature of his State; so far as any such had existed it was disposed of, and he had no complaints to make, and nothing to say on that point. He was surprised at the allusions of the Senator to it; his remarks were, it appeared to him, inconsistent with those liberal feelings which he believed the Senator to possess. He [Mr. N.] asked no sympathy or indulgence from any one, on account of his situation. Nor did he think his conduct authorized the remark, that he was restive and uneasy under the decision of the Legislature of his State, or that feelings springing from that decision had influenced his present course. He had made no complaints, and, so far as respects himself, was quite indifferent on the subject. There had been instances of public men who had pursued a very different course. There is one very conspicuous one with which the Senator must be very familiar. He alluded to a distinguished statesman, who, when struck down by public opinion, and driven from his post, retired pouring out execrations upon his countrymen, and declaring the elevation of his rival, whom he denounced as a "military chieftain," as more to be dreaded than "war, pestilence, or famine." This was a case which would have justified the Senator's rebuke.

But the Senator had charged him with renouncing the good old Democratic Jeffersonian doctrine of instruction. He denied this: he had renounced no doctrine he ever professed: he had endeavored to explain his understanding of the doctrine; to what extent it was sound, and beyond what point it became unsound and impracticable. In respect to the doctrine itself, and the principle on which it rests, the opinions now expressed were not new, they had been long entertained; but as regards the utility and practical application of the doctrine, he freely admitted that his mind had undergone a change. Sir, if this doctrine ever possessed any practical efficacy, the Senator's political friends have destroyed it. They have not only disavowed it, and disregarded it; but they have attempted to use it as a political engine against their opponents. Whilst denying the principle, and disregarding it themselves, they have attempted to use it as an instrument against Senators opposed to them. This has rendered it little more than a mere farce, and done much to bring ridicule and contempt upon the doctrine itself. He had endeavored to rescue it from this reproach, by attempting to prove that instructions could have no binding force, coming from a Legislature which denied the right to instruct. For some years past, we have all seen what use has been made of this doctrine by the Federal or Whig party in most of the States. He had given a history of it in his own State. His friend from New Jersey, [Mr. WALL,] in his able speech, has informed us what the Federal doctrine of instruction has been in that State. We have seen what it is in Ohio and Pennsylvania, and in other States. It is every where the same—a mere instrument of party warfare. We have seen a resolution from Pennsylvania, directing the Senators to vote against the Sub-Treasury bill, and at the same time instructing them to vote to separate the public revenues from the banks; a resolution carried by the vote of a member who admitted that he acted under threats from a bank. What respect was due to such instructions was for the Senators from that State to decide; and one of them [Mr. BUCHANAN] has suffered his vote to be controlled by it. He has acted according to his sense of duty, of which Mr. N. did not complain; yet he was free to say that he should not have felt himself bound by such a proceeding.

Mr. N. said that he respected the doctrine of instruction as an evidence, and the highest evidence, of the popular will, but not a conclusive evidence; and he could not regard it, in any case, as possessing the authority of law, as that was inconsistent with the Constitution; and although he did not admit the right of the Legislature to force a Senator to resign, yet he had such deference for the popular will that he would not hold a seat here if he could not represent the opinions, as well as the interest, of a majority of his constituents. He spoke of the settled and abiding opinions, not of those which may be the result of a temporary excitement, and extraordinary efforts to alarm and mislead the public mind.

Mr. N. said that this Federal doctrine of instruction was a very curious thing, and very much of a one-sided principle. When they were a majority, and wished to use it, it was a sound and excellent principle; but when they were a minority, and it was applied to them, it was a false, absurd, and odious doctrine. It was very much like their "spoils" doctrine. When they were in a minority, removals from office were denounced as "proscription for opinion's sake," as the most wicked and abominable practice which ever prevailed in a civilized country; but the moment they are a majority, it becomes a sound doctrine, a most conservative principle. And such is their regard for it, that they always carry it out vastly further than any examples on the other side, which they have so pointedly condemned. He had recently seen, in his own State, an instance of carrying this principle to an extreme point; it had been carried beyond the living, and, to an extent, to invade the rights of the dead. In one of our principal towns, the driver of the hearse has been removed for voting against the Whig ticket, so that it is now well settled that no man can be buried except by a good Whig. Hereafter we shall not only be required to live according to Whig doctrines, but to die and be buried under their mild influence. He had never complained of removals, whether in a majority or a minority, but really thought it was going a little too far, when an event, which levels all earthly distinctions, is made subservient to party domination and party strife.

But said Mr. N. the Senator charges me with having made severe reflections upon the Legislature of my State, and of alluding to the improper use of money in the late election. He would not object to the too Senators from Kentucky, volunteering their services in taking care of the interests of Connecticut. They could, no doubt, represent the State more ably than his colleague and myself; one of them also has undoubtedly a much greater stake in its politics, than either himself or his colleague; and as they were gradually sliding into their seats, perhaps it might be as well for them to go home, and leave the State in the hands of the Kentucky Senators, who would no doubt more ably represent it, and especially the Whig cause. But as his term was short, he thought he had perhaps better hold on, and try to represent at least a part of the State, leaving it for the gentlemen from Kentucky to supply all deficiencies.

Mr. N. said, in reply to the remark of the Senator, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] that what he had written in the paper he had read, or what he had said of the proceedings of the Legislature, was done advisedly and deliberately, and he expected to abide by it, both here and elsewhere. He had given the facts—a true account of the proceedings—with such comments upon them as he thought they deserved, so far as was necessary to his present purpose. Further than this, he had not gone. Having given the proceedings truly, all could judge whether his remarks upon them were borne out. If he had spoke of the proceeding as dishonorable or dishonest, it was because he so regarded it. If this was a reflection upon the State, neither the blame nor the responsibility rested upon him, but upon those weak or dishonest agents who had attempted to entrap himself and his colleague by cunning and trickery, through the forms of legislation; and it had since been a subject of boast and triumph in their papers. He believed he knew what was due to the character of his State, and did not think it could be benefitted by any attempts to justify or defend such proceedings.

The Senator was mistaken, however, in supposing he had said that money had been used to carry the late election. He had said nothing in regard to the election, either in the paper he had read, or in his remarks. His allusion to the use of money was not in reference to the election, but in regard to the exertions which had been made to enlighten the people on the subject of the financial questions before the country. It did not fall within his purpose to speak of the election; if it had, he should not have hesitated to have said that money had been raised and used to an extent, and for purposes, never before witnessed in the State, and which he hoped never would be again. But his allusion to money had reference to the pains which have been taken to inform, or, as he considered it, to mislead the people in relation to the currency question. The exertions in that behalf had been great, both in the State and out of it. No efforts and no expense appear to have been spared.

It was true, as stated by his colleague, that political missionaries visited the State last fall, one of whom was from Kentucky. They travelled through the State, and attended large political meetings, called for the purpose, at which they harangued the people in the usual Whig style of denunciation, common-place abuse, and party slang. During the present session, one or more missionaries have visited this city, to make arrangements for having the State well supplied with speeches of members of Congress. Whatever may have been the case of the first, the last mission was attended with wonderful success. The State was literally plastered over with speeches, like the land of Egypt with frogs. The franks of some Senators whom he could name, must be as familiar with the people as household words. The Senator from Massachusetts, whom he did not see in his place, [Mr. WEBSTER,] the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr.

CLAY,] and a member of the House from the city of New York, who appeared to be a sort of tender to the big Whig ships of war, were most distinguished for their disinterested and meritorious exertions to enlighten his constituents. As an evidence of the extent of their labors, he would state one fact: In a very small interior town, there was one hundred and thirty speeches received in a single mail. Surely such disinterested and patriotic services ought to be made known, that those concerned in them may have the credit to which they are entitled.

Mr. N. said, that in some towns in his State, lying on the Sound, the people are in the habit of taking large quantities, of what is called the white fish; they are not valuable for food, but are excellent for manure, and are spread over the land, and sometimes thrown into the hill, and it said a single fish makes a first rate hill of potatoes; and if the electioneering speeches from Congress, with which the State has been plastered over, were as valuable a manure as the white fish; (and he thought they about as worthless for any thing else,) the State would produce such a crop of potatoes this season, as was never raised before; and he would engage that the surplus beyond what would be required for home consumption, would supply the State of Kentucky for two years. In this way, the disinterested labors of gentlemen who had shown so much anxiety to serve his constituents, might be turned to some account.

Mr. N. did not deny or dispute the right of the Senator to criticise or comment on the paper he had read. He admitted that it was before the Senate, not for its action, but as a part of his speech; and, as such, a proper subject of remark. He did not complain of the Senator's remarks on the paper; what he did complain of was, that the Senator should have stepped in between him and his constituents, and undertaken to teach him his duty to them. He thought he understood the duty he owed to his State, and should endeavor to discharge it faithfully and fearlessly; and if, in doing this, he was so unfortunate as to offend either of the gentlemen from Kentucky, he might regret it, but could not alter his course to accommodate any one. But he thought that his State was in a way to be well taken care of; and that, with the assistance of the Senators from Kentucky, it would be fully and ably represented.

After a few remarks by Mr. CRITTENDEN,

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he regretted the necessity of saying a few words, imposed upon him by some gratuitous remarks, relating to himself, of one of the Senators from Connecticut. It had been his intention not to say one word on this occasion, and he should not have done it but for this reference to himself, although he thought it proper for his colleague or any other Senator, if they choose to do so, to comment on a paper which had been read in the Senate. Had it come to this, that one Senator might read in the Senate a reply to the instructions which he had received from his Legislature, and no other Senator had a right to say any thing upon it, on the ground of improper interference? Mr. C had paid no attention to it; he was half asleep while the reading was going on; but the remark of the Senator, that Mr. C. had interposed between him and his constituents, called for a reply. What was the true state of the fact? Certain petitions had been entrusted to Mr. C. by citizens of Connecticut, which he, in the course of his duty, had presented to the Senate; and the Senator from Connecticut then interposed himself, and represented the petition as untrue and dishonorable; and Mr. C. cou'd not but defend the constituents of the Senator himself against a charge which Mr. C. thought unfounded, and brought against them by their own representative. In doing this, Mr. C. had not gone out of his way; but as they had confided a petition to him, he had done for them what he would have done for any of the human kind, and had endeavored to vindicate them from a charge which he deemed incorrect.

Mr. C. had also been charged as having left his country and her councils with execrations, going home with restlessness and disgust, and as returning back to annoy the country. What was the ground of this charge? Mr. C. had returned under urgent circumstances; his office had been unsolicited, and he had resolved to do his duty in these struggles and these times, and he had denounced a military aspirant, and had denounced him in language which he was proud to have used, when he had exclaimed, Send us war, pestilence, and famine, rather than curse us with a military rule; and if he could have then foreseen that this execrable measure, the Sub-Treasury bill, would have been introduced by the influence which he then deprecated, he would then have denounced it as he did now, as not at all preferable to war, pestilence, and famine, and as not inferior to any one of them in its malign effects on the welfare and prosperity of the country.

One of the Senators from Connecticut had said that political missionaries from Kentucky had been at work in Connecticut. Mr. C. denied the fact that any such missionary had gone from his State; it was a work of that Senator's own imagination, without the fact to support it; at least Mr. C. knew no foundation whatever for such a charge.

In respect to the doctrine of instruction, although he had the right to express any opinion, Mr. C. would have said nothing about it, but for what the Senators from Connecticut themselves had said, that on their vote hung the fate of the Sub-Treasury bill. And was not Mr. C's State interested in that measure, and had they not the right to inquire whether those who were to fix this measure on the country were acting in conformity with the views of those whom they here represented? And are we to be told that a majority of the people of Connecticut, as well as of the Legislature, are adverse to this measure, and yet to have it fixed upon us by their two Senators, who, at the same time, acknowledge that they were acting contrary to the will of the majority of the people of their own State? And are Senators not at liberty to call on them to respect their instructions under such circumstances? But the spirit of those instructions pervaded the whole Union, though Senators said this spirit was temporary. We had heard enough of Reaction! Reaction! Reaction! but where was the evidence that there would be reaction? There was indeed evidence of action, but it was forward, unequivocal action against the Sub-Treasury, as much so as it ever was against the alien and sedition acts, or any other most execrable measure.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. A declaration which I made in the course of my remarks in regard to a particular mission going from Kentucky to Connecticut, and was denied by the honorable Senators from Kentucky. Now I did not speak of my own personal knowledge, but from common report. I did not see them there, and have no more knowledge of the mission than what I have seen in the newspapers of the day; and which, never having been denied, I believe to be true. The Senator denies it, and I assert it on the information I possess; and the people will judge whether his information is more correct than mine.

Mr. CLAY. Then what must we think of a Senator who gets up in his place and asserts a fact, having no other authority than the newspapers?

Mr. SMITH. I am satisfied the missionaries were there, as stated, though I did not see them; and it is very extraordinary that the Senators from Kentucky did not know it; but if they choose to place it on this ground, that they were not there with their knowledge, let the people of Connecticut judge how they came there, and for whose benefit.

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, June 22, 1838,

Mr. ADAMS continued his remarks in opposition to the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the subject of the annexation of Texas, and in support of the motion to recommit it with instructions. In the course of his remarks, Mr. A. has given a detailed account of the proceedings of the House in relation to their action upon the subject of petitions respecting slavery, and the annexation of Texas, as incidental to that subject. He has given, in order, the different times when petitions and resolutions of State Legislatures have been presented to the House, and has stated the action of the House thereon. He has also read and commented briefly upon many of the memorials and resolutions, with arguments to show that the action of the House had not been correct in principle, nor in accordance with the wishes of a large portion of the people.

Mr. A. then gave way for the orders.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. McKENNAN moved the House to take up the resolution of Mr. BOON, proposing to fix the period of adjournment of the present session of Congress.

Objection being made—

Mr. McK. moved a suspension of the rules, and thereon asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 139, nays 55.

So the rules were suspended; and the resolution being taken up,

Mr. McKENNAN moved to strike out the "first Monday," and insert the "second Monday" in July.

Mr BOON accepted this as a modification.

Mr. NAYLOR moved to substitute the "first" Monday. Lost without a division.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana moved to insert the "third" Monday in July.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. GARLAND then, as a reason for the motion he made, drew the attention of the House to the mass of business on the calendar, especially relating to the western country.

Mr. BOULDIN said he was anxious that the public business should be done. That it might be done, was true; that it might have been done, was equally true. But if the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] thought that length of time would secure that object, he would ask him to look back upon the last six or seven months, and see what had been done in all that time. He said, if they were disposed to do the business now, he had no doubt that every thing material could be done by the 9th of July. If they did not wish to do it, they never would do it in any length of time. If they meant to do it, let them do it; if not, let them go home.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY was convinced to the contrary, for there were several pressing bills that would take up days each in discussion. Though he was as anxious as any one to get away, yet he was unwilling to do so, and leave such a mass of business unfinished.

Mr. BOON explained that the object he had in originally moving the resolution at the time he did was to bring to the consideration of the House that it was necessary for Congress to take an order to adjourn at some time or other. He was as anxious as any man could be, that before the House adjourned, the most important measures before them, and more especially, of all the rest, the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands, with the bills in relation to the army, the western frontier, &c. should be acted upon. But if gentlemen would only leave off talking, and vote, they might yet act upon them all by the 9th of July. If they would only act upon the principle of those great men, George Washington and Benjamin Franklin, who never spoke in public over about five minutes at a time, they could get through with their business in a couple of weeks from Monday. Indeed, they ought to have got through it a long time ago, and could have done so, if they had not wasted so much time.

Mr. HAYNES said he would show his estimate of the value of time by moving the previous question; but the House refused to second it—ayes 72, noes 95.

Mr. NAYLOR urged the House to adopt the later day.

Mr. HAYNES rose among the most vociferous cries of "Question!" from all parts of the hall, which continued for some time. When order was restored, Mr. H. said he would have stood there till doomsday, rather than be cried down. He had merely risen to call for the yeas and nays on the amendment; and, as

The CHAIR was about to propound the call to the House,

Mr. MASON of Ohio reminded the SPEAKER that they had been already ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment disagreed to—yeas 90, nays 121.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution till Friday next.

Mr. CASEY asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused; and, on the call of Mr. HAYNES, the question was taken by tellers, and agreed to—yeas 95, nays 89.

So the resolution was postponed till Friday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting a report of the Commissioner on Pensions, and sundry documents from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Third Auditor, in relation to pension agents, payment of pensions, etc.; which, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. HALEY, on leave, presented to the House certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut, in relation to an amendment of the Federal Constitution, in regard to the appointment and removal of officers; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee on the Union, Mr. CONNOR in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the "Independent Treasury bill," under the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. HUNTER continued his remarks in support of the bill till the period for the House to take its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House met at half-past three, pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, on leave, reported a bill from the Committee of Claims, for the relief of Joseph K. Averill.

[This bill was to provide for the payment of witnesses fees to the petitioner, who had been brought from the exterior part of Ohio, to testify in the late trial of White. Mr. W. suggested the propriety of passing the bill at once; but objection being made by Mr. PETRIKIN, the SPEAKER said it could only be passed by general consent, as the Speaker had only taken the chair to pass to the usual recess; and if debate would arise, the bill must take its place on the calendar.]

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, and continued the consideration of THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

There being not more than twenty members in their seats, and while the Chairman was waiting to call the committee to order,

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts stated that the House in the morning had endeavored to fix a day for adjournment, and it was urged that it was impossible to adjourn at an early day in July, because of the pressure of important business, which could not so soon be properly disposed of; and he remarked, that if the recess of an hour and a half was virtually to be extended to two hours and more, and if members would not attend to the business of Congress, no adjournment could be had before August. He then moved that the committee rise, and report the fact to the House that they found themselves without a quorum; and made that motion with a view to move a call of the House.

The CHAIR said it was a courtesy usually extended to members addressing the committee to wait for members to come in.

Mr. HUNTER expressed his readiness to go on, and he proceeded with and concluded his remarks in favor of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY then took the floor, and went on for some time in opposition to the bill, when he gave way for a motion that the committee rise, which was carried.

The House then, on motion of Mr. THOMAS, took up the bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers in vessels, propelled in whole or in part by steam.

The amendment proposed in Committee of the Whole, with many others proposed in the House, were severally considered and acted upon, many were adopted and others rejected, and before any final action on the bill,

The previous question was demanded, but before determining whether there was a second,

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, June 22, 1838.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a petition signed by a number of the citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, similar to several others presented by him on the same subject, asking Congress to pass the Independent Treasury bill, and in opposition to the charter of a National Bank: laid on the table.

Mr. NORVELL presented the memorial of the officers and managers of the Washington Monument Association in relation to the receipts and expenditures of that association; and moved that it be printed.

Mr. MORRIS called for the reading of the paper; and accordingly the Secretary having read a portion of it,

Mr. KING moved to lay it on the table, there being several expressions in it which he thought disrespectful, and therefore ought not to be read to the Senate.

Mr. NORVELL said he hoped that his friend from Alabama would, for a moment, withdraw his motion to lay the memorial on the table. This paper proceeded from as respectable a body of gentlemen as any in the country; and he did think that, as they considered themselves to have been injuriously assailed on this floor, they should have an opportunity to be heard. It was true that they had used strong language; but this, under the circumstances, was natural. Let the memorial be read, and then the Senate might take what course they thought proper, as regarded the further disposition of it. By the statement of moneys collected, it appeared that the society had received only between 27,000 and 28,000 dollars, of which they had invested upwards of $27,000, principally, he believed, in Pennsylvania State stocks. Between four and five hundred remained uninvested. Except what had been allowed to collectors in the different States, as commissions for moneys obtained from subscribers by them, very little had been expended, as the statement would show. He was authorized to say, too, that the books, with the names of all the contributors to the monument, are in the hands of the Treasurer of the Association, open to the inspection of all. These were facts which, in justice to these respectable citizens, ought to be known to the Senate and to the public, after what had passed here on the subject.

Mr. KING, in explanation of the reasons which induced him to make the motion, said, that in the first place, he did not perceive that the subject of the memorial was a matter with which the Senate had any thing to do, and that no action of the Senate could result from it; and secondly, he objected to the further reading of it, because it contained expressions, applied to Senators or the Senate, which ought not to be permitted to be read there.

Mr. PRESTON, who just then entered the chamber, remarked, that the memorial was from very respectable persons, who conceived themselves injured by something that transpired on this floor. He had, on more than one occasion, objected to the reception of memorials because their language was not respectful; and he therefore desired to have it read, that he might judge whether it was so or not. If it was a question of reception, he must hear the paper read before he could vote on it.

Mr. KING said there was no question of reception raised. The paper was received. His motion was to lay it on the table; and if the honorable gentleman wished to know whether it was respectful or not, he could easily read it at the Secretary's table. He had objected to the reading, because the paper spoke disrespectfully of members of that body. If the paper was laid on the table, any member could move to take it up, and submit what propositions he pleased as to the disposition of it.

Mr. PRESTON said he would not take upon himself the responsibility of calling up a paper which was deemed disrespectful to members of that body. But if it was so, he thought it ought to be called up, in order to be disposed of in a proper manner.

Mr. SEVIER observed that this day was set apart for the consideration of private land claims; and he hoped it would not be consumed as yesterday was in debate. The matter complained of by these individuals had been published in the public newspapers, and he presumed the editors would have no objection to insert their reply. It was a matter with which the Senate had nothing to do, and he, therefore, moved to lay it on the table.

This motion was carried.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of Joseph Shenecke, praying for a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRESTON presented the petition of Wm. W. Fry, praying permission to import an iron steamboat free of duty: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the petition of the members of the Knoxville bar, praying for a change of the times of holding the courts of the United States for the district of East Tennessee, reported a bill in conformity with the prayer of the petition; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MORRIS presented certain additional documents in support of the claim of Catherine White; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. M. from the Committee on Pensions, reported, without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of Sarah Barnes, recommending its passage.

Also, reported, without amendment, and recommending their indefinite postponement, the bills from the House for the relief of Wm. Steele of New York, Eliphalet Spafford, Wm. Glover and Daniel B. Perkins.

Mr. TIPTON, on leave, introduced a bill giving the consent of Congress to certain acts of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida; which was twice read and referred.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the petition of sundry clerks in the Executive Departments of the Government, reported a bill classifying and regulating their salaries; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Madame De Lusser; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD made several reports on private bills from the House which had been referred to the Committee on Claims, and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Patents, to which had been referred the amendment of the House to the bill providing for the appointment of persons to test the utility of inventions to improve and render safe the boilers of steamboats against explosion, made a report thereon, recommending the Senate to disagree to said amendment, and, on taking the question, the Senate disagreed accordingly.

The amendment of the House to the bill making appropriations for certain roads in the Territory of Wisconsin, was considered and concurred in.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, the Senate took up the bill giving the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislative Council of Florida, chartering a railroad and steam navigation company; and the same having been considered as in Committee of the Whole, was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Senate took up the bill for the benefit of the Alabama, Florida and Georgia Railroad Company; and the same having been considered as in Committee of the Whole, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The resolution submitted by Mr. GRUNDY, fixing the hours of meeting of the Senate at 11 instead of 12 o'clock for the remainder of the session, was considered and agreed to.

The following bills were severally taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The Senate adjourned over to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, June 23, 1838.

Mr. LINCOLN, on leave, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether, in resuming the work upon the new Treasury building, it is intended that any portions of the walls, at their northern and southern extremities, are to be removed, or are to be extended and connected at the north with the walls of the building occupied by the State Department; or whether the latter building is to be taken down, or such alterations made therein as materially to change its exterior or interior structure, and, if so, in what manner and at what cost; and that he be requested to lay before the House a definite and descriptive plan of the elevation and dimensions of the Treasury building, as the same, on his approval, is to be prosecuted to its completion, with an estimate of the whole cost of the building, including any alterations which, in connection therewith, are to be made in the building of the State Department, and in the grading of the contiguous street, and the construction of the necessary walls and culverts to protect the foundation of the building, and render the approach thereto, and the occupation thereof, appropriate and convenient.

Mr. L. asked its present consideration.

Mr. KEIM objected, because he was opposed to renewing the old controversy on the Treasury building at this late period of the session, and also because it might have the effect of again throwing the workmen out of employment who had been re-engaged.

Mr. LINCOLN moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina called for the yeas and nays; but

Mr. KEIM, on hearing the resolution read again, remarked that, as it was merely a call for information, he would withdraw his objection; whereupon, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER made an ineffectual attempt to make the bills extending the pension system to western warriors the special order for Thursday next.

TEXAS.

Mr. ADAMS proceeded in his remarks on the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in relation to the annexation of Texas; and was referring to the right of slaves to petition, and the proceedings in the House last Congress upon his tendering a petition of that character, stating that he should have no hesitation in presenting a petition from a slave, if his memorial was properly couched, and on a proper subject, or something to this effect. Mr. A. was proceeding in this line of remark, when

The SPEAKER called him to order, saying that the remarks were irrelevant to the subject under consideration.

Mr. ADAMS said he was putting an extreme case, by way of illustration, which was in order.

The SPEAKER again reminded Mr. A. that he was out of order.

Mr. LEGARE rose, and said he felt compelled to call the gentleman from Massachusetts to order; and cries of order were heard in various parts of the House.

Mr. ADAMS called upon the SPEAKER to reduce the disorderly words to writing, and appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

The SPEAKER said the CHAIR could not be called upon to reduce remarks made out of order to writing. It had never been known, either by any rule, or by parliamentary usage; and if such a course could be sustained, it would continually bring the CHAIR into conflict with members, and would render it impossible for the House to proceed with its business.

Several members referred to the twenty-third rule of the House, which requires that disorderly words shall be reduced to writing.

The SPEAKER said he was perfectly aware of that rule, and it applied to cases where one member called another to order for disorderly or personal remarks, and not to the SPEAKER, when he called a member to order for irrelevant remarks, for the rule says the SPEAKER shall call members to order, and makes it imperatively his duty.

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of the rule by which the SPEAKER called him to order, and refused to reduce the objectionable remarks to writing.

The SPEAKER read the rule requiring that a member "shall confine himself to the question under debate," and said he had called the gentleman from Massachusetts to order for irrelevancy in debate. As he was about to put the question on the appeal from the decision of the Chair,

Mr. ADAMS again insisted upon having the words reduced to writing.

Cries of "order!" "order!"

The SPEAKER directed Mr. ADAMS to take his seat.

Mr. ADAMS continued to hold the floor, and persisted in demanding that the words should be reduced to writing, and said he would then appeal, but he would not appeal from the decision in the form in which the SPEAKER had put it.

The SPEAKER then put the question upon the appeal; and the decision of the CHAIR was sustained—yeas 115, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Aycrigg, Banks, Beatty, Birdsall, Boon, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Cheatham, Clowney, Connor, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cushman, Davee, Deberry, DeGraff, Dennis, Dromgoole, Edwards, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Fry, Glascock, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Haley, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Wm. H. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, Martin, Maury, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Menefee, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Noble, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Pearce, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Potter, Pratt, J. H. Prentiss, Randolph, Reily, Rencher, Rives, Rumsey, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sheplor, Snyder, Southgate, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Taylor, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Vanderveer, John White, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Word, Worthington, Yell, and Yorke—115.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Carter, Corwin, Cranston, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Evans, Everett, Ewing, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Goode, Grennell, Halsted, Hastings, Henry, Lincoln, Samson Mason, McKennan, Mitchell, Naylor, Ogle, Patterson, Peck, Potts, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Slade, Stanly, Tillinghast, and Elisha Whittlesey—36.

So the decision of the CHAIR was sustained by the House, and Mr. ADAMS thus declared to be out of order.

Mr. BOON then called for the orders of the day.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, on whose motion the resolution to fix the day of adjournment was postponed till Friday next, said that, at the request of a number of gentlemen, whom he was was willing to accommodate, he would move a reconsideration of that vote. From the proceedings on the Steamboat bill last night, even under the melancholy disasters that had recently occurred, it seemed they could get no vote on any subject; and, therefore, he thought the sooner the session was brought to a close the better. He then made the motion indicated, and asked its consideration at this time, to which no objection was made.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CUSHING and Mr. TITUS severally made objections, but it was decided to be too late, though the CHAIR suggested the entertaining of the objection; but objection was made to it, and, after some conversation,

Mr. HOPKINS moved to lay the motion on the table; on which, at the call of Mr. WILLIAMS, the yeas and nays being ordered, they were—yeas 64, nays 139.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table; and the question recurring on the motion to reconsider, it prevailed: yeas 142, nays 61.

The question then recurring back on the original motion, to postpone till Friday—

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to postpone it till Thursday next.

The CHAIR ruled that the first motion took precedence.

Mr. WILLIAMS then withdrew the original motion; and remarked that believing the general sense of the House was in favor of the 9th of July, though he himself preferred an earlier day, and as the resolution, as modified yesterday, proposed that day, he demanded the previous question, which was seconded without a division, and the main question being ordered thereon—

Mr. DAVEE asked for the yeas and nays, which, being ordered, were—yeas 145, nays 69.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. McKAY asked leave to submit a resolution fixing a day for the consideration of the army bill; but it was objected to.

Mr. HARLAN also make an appeal to the House to devote a short time to the steamboat bill; but that was also objected to.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONNOR in the Chair, on the above bill.

Mr. KENNEDY continued his remarks in opposition to the bill until the House, according to order, took its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House met pursuant to the order, and went into Committee of the Whole, at half past three o'clock, on the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. KENNEDY was entitled to the floor.

After waiting some time, and there being but a few members in their seats,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the committee rise, which motion was decided in the negative without a division.

Some time longer was spent in waiting, when

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina moved that the committee rise; which motion was carried in the negative—ayes 14, noes 15.

There being no quorum, the committee rose, and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said the committee had been similarly situated for several days past immediately after the recess. If the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY] was not prepared to go on, there were others who were desirous of addressing the committee, who would probably take the floor, and prevent the loss of time.

Mr. CONNOR said he had observed the practice to be for the SPEAKER to wait a short time till the members could come in; and, therefore, he had not called the committee to order.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts said he had yesterday, under similar circumstances, moved that the committee rise, with a view to move a call of the House. If the time was to be wasted, and the recess was to be extended to two hours, instead of an hour and a half, it would be impossible to despatch the public business; and he thought it he duty of those present to order a call of the House.

Mr. THOMAS said that it was well understood that members would not remain in their seats at this warm season of the year to listen to long set debates. The speeches would be made, and would go forth to the country to produce their effect upon the minds of the people; and he suggested that, when in Committee of the Whole, there should be no recess, but that members might go and come, as they saw fit, as none would be obliged to stay except such as took part in the debate; and that the committee should sit till nine o'clock at night, for the purpose of enabling gentlemen to participate in the debate, which could then be conducted so as not to retard the public business.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a call of the House, but at the suggestion of several others, he withdrew the motion.

Mr. ADAMS inquired if the suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] was to be considered as the rule of the House. He had no objection that members might go and come as they pleased; but to the proposition to sit till nine o'clock this warm weather, he had serious objections.

On motion, the House again went into committee, and

Mr. KENNEDY resumed his remarks in opposition to the bill; and after he had concluded,

Mr. TOUCEY obtained the floor, and moved that the committee rise; which motion was negatived, without a division.

Mr. T. then proceeded to address the committee, at length; but after some time he gave way to

Mr. HOPKINS, who moved that the committee rise; which motion was carried in the negative.

Mr. TOUCEY again continued his remarks for some time, when he gave way to

Mr. ROBERTSON, who moved that the committee rise; and on taking the vote there were—ayes 24, noes 77. Tellers were then ordered on the call of Mr. HARLAN, and the vote was—ayes 38, noes 99: so the committee refused to rise.

Mr. TOUCEY then continued and concluded his remarks.

Mr. THOMPSON obtained the floor, and addressed the committee at some length.

Mr. JENIFER then took the floor, and moved that the committee rise: lost.

Mr. POTTER proceeded to address the committee at length; and after some time, he gave way to

Mr. PARRIS, who moved that the committee rise; which motion was decided in the negative—ayes 64, noes 90.

Mr. POTTER continued his remarks, but again gave way to

Mr. DUNCAN, who moved that the committee rise; and the question being taken by tellers, was lost—ayes 63—noes 70.

Mr. POTTER continued and concluded his remarks; after which,

Mr. RHETT moved that the committee rise; which was carried in the affirmative—ayes 85, noes 84.

So the committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. BRONSON moved an adjournment, but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. THOMAS, who moved, by instruction from the select committee on the subject of so much of the memorial of F. P. Blair as related to the manner in which the public printing had been executed, that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Objection being made—

Mr. NAYLOR moved to adjourn, but withdrew at the request of

Mr. THOMAS, who moved to suspend the rules to allow him to make that motion.

Before any decision was had upon that motion,

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana moved an adjournment, and called for the yeas and nays upon that motion; which, being ordered, were—yeas 102, nays 72.

So the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, June 25, 1838.

Some conversation took place between Mr. ADAMS and the CHAIR in reference to the entry on the journal of the point of order on Saturday, but no motion grew out of it.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had fixed the 9th proximo as the day of adjournment.

The CHAIR stated that the motion would be enterdd, and lie over.

Mr. HAYNES said he would move to lay the motion on the table, if it would be in order.

The CHAIR replied that no motion for its disposition would be in order, till it was taken up for consideration.

Mr. HAYNES then moved to consider the motion at this time; and, if objected to, he should move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky propounded an inquiry to the CHAIR, that if the House should refuse to suspend the rules, whether the resolution passed on Saturday would not itself be suspended?

The CHAIR replied that that resolution would, as a matter of course, be still pending.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I move to lay the motion on the table.

The CHAIR, for the reason given above, ruled the motion out of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS then expressed a hope that the House would suspend the rules, and then lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The CHAIR being about to propound the question on suspending the rules to the House.

Mr. WILLIMS of North Carolina moved a call of the House, which was ordersd, and proceeded in till 189 members had answered to their names; when, on motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, it was dispensed with.

The House suspended the rules—yeas 142, nays 52.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky then moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider; which was seconded, and the main question ordered without a division.

Mr. CASEY then called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which, being ordered, were, yeas 64, nays 135.

So the House refused to reconsider, and the resolution was sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Resolutions were then called for in the order of States.

Mr. CUSHMAN presented the following, which was rejected:

Resolved, That the House bill No. 472, to define the number, compensation, and duties of officers of the customs, and House bill No. 712, making appropriations for building light houses, light-boats, beacon-lights, buoys, and making surveys for 1838, be made the special order of the day for Thursday, the 28th day of June, instant.

Mr. ADAMS presented the following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be transmitted to this House the newspaper presented to the Secretary of State of the United States by the late Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Texas, with his note of the 12th of September, 1837, or a copy of the resolutions of the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi, to which the said Minister invites the attention of the Secretary of State, and alleged in the said note of the Texan Ministe to be contained in the said newspaper.

Mr. A. moved that it be considered at this time. Objection being made, he moved a supension of the rules; but the House refused—yeas 84, nays 108.

Mr. ROBERTSON submitted the following, which were read:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House on the first day of the next session, all the information not heretofore communicated, now in possession of the Executive, or which may be procured before that time, touching undue attempts or practices, if any, since the 29th May, 1830, to keep down the price of the public lands, or prevent purchases or entries thereof at public or private sale, by force, threats, or fraud, and the measures taken since the the date aforesaid, to prevent, defeat, or punish such fraudulent practices, and illegal entries upon public lands.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury prepare, and lay before this House on the first day of the next session, a statement of all grants and donations of public lands, or of the proceeds of sale thereof to the States, by the United States, distinguishing the amount made to each, and the purposes and considerations what made; and accompanying the said statement with an estimate of the amount to which each State would be entitled of similar grants and donations, according to the proportion specified in the several deeds of cession from the several States to the United States.

Secondly. A statement of the whole quantity of public land now surveyed, and an estimate of the quantity unsurveyed; distinguishing each, and where situated; and accompanying the same with separate plans for dividing the said lands, and the proceeds of sales thereof among the States, in the proportions aforesaid, on such conditions as to the time and manner of division and sale, graduation, reduction of price, and reservation of title in the United States, and final disposition as may be best calculated to effect the objects of this resolution, in conformity with the original compacts entered into between the several States and the United States relating to the said lands.

Thirdly. A plan for reorganizing the land system, on such principles as will best secure the public against loss from illegal entries, frauds, &c. pointing out the defects or advantages of the present system, more particularly in reference to preemption, and sales at public auction; and, in general, suggesting such alterations as experience may have shown to be necessary.

Mr. R. moved their consideration at this time; and, objection being made, he moved a suspension of the rules and asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 104, nays 70. Not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts, the resolutions were ordered to be printed.

F. P. BLAIR'S MEMORIAL.

Mr. McKAY submitted the following:

Resolved, That the select committee on the subject of so much of the memorial of F. P. Blair as related to the manner in which the public printing had been executed, have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. HARLAN objected to its adoption.

Mr. McKAY stated that it was submitted under the direction of the committee, who could not perform the duty assigned them without the power proposed being given to them.

Mr. DUNCAN and Mr. RIVES simultaneously moved a suspension of the rule, and those gentlemen and Mr. GLASCOCK called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered—were yeas 121, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Bond, Boon, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Connor, Crary, Crockett, Cushing, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Farrington, Fairfield, Rich'd Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, Goode, James Graham, Grantland, Graves, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Halsted, Hamer, Harrison, Hastings, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Hoffman, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Logan, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Miller, Samuel W. Morris, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Owens, Palmer, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Phillips, Plumer, Pope, Potts, J. H. Prentiss, Reily, Rencher, Rives, Robertson, Sawyer, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sheplor, Sibley, Snyder, Spencer, Stone, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Weeks, Elisha Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—121.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Biddle, Borden, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Chambers, Cheatham, Clark, Coles, Cranston, Darlington, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Ewing, Wm. Graham, Hall, Harlan, Hawes, Jenifer, Lincoln, Marvin, Samson Mason, Maury, Maxwell, Menefee, Milligan, Mitchell, Patterson, Peck, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Ridgway, Rumsey, Southgate, Stanly, Stuart, Stratton, Thompson, Albert S. White, John White, C. H. Williams, Word, and Yorke—51.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. DROMGOOLE stated that he could not vote for the resolution, unless it was so modified that the witnesses be named, and subpœnas asked. He was opposed to the assumption of power by select committees in administering oaths, without special authority by the House, that is, if the House had the power to delegate such power.

Mr. HARLAN moved, as a substitute, to discharge the Select Committee from the whole subject, on the ground that there was not time to go into so extended an inquiry as was proposed, from the establishment of the "Globe" to the present time. The memorialist should have come there at the commencement of the session.

Mr. THOMAS gave the history of Mr. HOPKINS's resolution, to which this was a substitute, stating that the Editor of the Globe had not sent in his memorial while that resolution was under discussion, but, finding that it was not likely to be reached again, from the awkward manner business was transacted, then he petitioned to have his accounts, and the correctness of his charges for work, inquired into. Mr. T. did not anticipate any great amount of labor devolving upon the committee, for all they proposed doing was to call for complete returns of the accounts, and examine a few practical printers of the District, in reference to their correctness.

Mr. BOON expressed his astonishment at the objection to investigation coming from the quarter it did; a quarter that had been heretofore so loud and general in favor of raising committees of inquiry, even where the charges were indefinite. Now here was a case where the charges were distinct, and the individual named, and yet it is opposed from that quarter. As for the objection that the inquiry would interfere with the business, it was too ridiculous to be crammed down, for the House could go on as it had before done. Such an argument was a mere scarecrow, of no possible validity. It was urged that it was too late in the session for the committee to terminate their labors; if that should be the case, that subject would fare no worse than all the other unfinished business of the session. Mr. B. hoped, when the question was taken, it would be taken by yeas and nays, so that the American people might see how far gentlemen proved consistent to their former course upon the subject of raising committees of inquiry into supposed or charged corruptions.

Mr. BYNUM said like the honorable member from Indiana [Mr. BOON] he had not been a little astonished at the proposition made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARLAN,] to discharge the committee raised by the House upon this subject from its further consideration. After the extraordinary and frequent alarms that had been made of corruption in the different departments of the Government, he thought such a motion, at such a time, came with a most awkward appearance, and in a most questionable shape.

It was more than singular, that gentlemen should stand here continually, and make charges, and cry corruption, corruption, and when a serious proposition was made in a specific shape to investigate them, with dates and responsible names attached that they were the very first to oppose them, and even to throw every obstacle in the way of investigation that they possibly could. It was a fact that the American people should know, to convince them of the true nature of the thousand charges of corruption against the Administration, and to prove that they had been almost invariably made, with no other view than for political effect, and to delude and excite the public mind.

He did not see how such conduct could be exculpated before the eyes of a just and intelligent people. Sir, here is a serious charge of corruption made against an individual, involving the guilt of a proportion of the members of this House. The individual has come forward and asked an investigation into the charges; and after a wonderful flourish of trumpets on the part of the prosecutors, they have now come forward to discharge the committee, and quash their prosecution, after they have circulated their allegations on the four winds of the heavens, on the flimsy pretext of there not now having time to notice such stuff, and that it is to turn out a mere whitewashing committee, to whitewash the character of Francis P. Blair. This the gentlemen should have thought of before making their charges of corruption against this individual, and that portion of the House whose guilt is involved in these charges. It is, then, due, sir, to a portion of this House that this investigation should be prosecuted to its end. Of the individual whose character there has been an attempt to blast by this charge, he knew but little—but what has taken place with him, as the editor of a public journal; and he took this occasion to say, fearlessly, although he had been frequently assailed and denounced with the bitterest epithets upon this floor and elsewhere, that there was not a man at the head of so important a press that had ever better sustained its character for truth and unflinching integrity, as far as had come within his knowledge, than had the editor of the Globe. He had often listened with the deepest solicitude and interest to the bold and daring charges that had been made against him of foul corruption and profligacy, and had often been led to believe, from the apparent confidence with which they were made, that there might have been some truth contained in them; but up to this day, he boldly asserted, he had not been able to see the first scintilla of evidence to establish the truth of the first charge that had been brought against him of corruption or improper practices, nor that impeached, in the least degree, his character for veracity. He had often wished for such a committee as had been raised, for the purpose of investigation of many of the charges that had so frequently been mode here in relation to the acts of presses connected with the Government, and sincerely hoped that the present would be carried on in good faith, that the public might see the merits of some of those charges.

He feared, however, from the writhing and twisting in a certain quarter, that corruptions, if any, were about to be placed on other shoulders than those of the Editor of the Globe. He feared that much, from the sudden changes that had taken place in relation to this subject in a certain quarter, might result to the implication of others than were at first expected. He had heard much of certain bargains and corruption about the public printing of this Congress, which, if true, was black and damning, and should be exposed to public view. He hoped that the concealment of these facts had not wrought this sudden change in gentlemen in relation to the subject of investigation of charges of corruption, which they have been so fruitful in making. Let those gentlemen now come up, and back their judgment, and test the sincerity of their charges. Let us see now who will shrink from carrying out their professions of anxiety to expose corruption. They are here challenged to carry on their prosecution by the party arraigned, and will they dare to shrink back from it? I hope not. They cannot do it without reflecting much on the many charges that they are in the habit daily of making, and circulating from this place of venality and corruption.

There is much about the public presses, acting under the influence of certain institutions, that the people ought, and should know, and there had been no occasion more favorable, that had come within his observation, than the present to carry on such an investigation.

The charge of the circulation of documents and speeches by the officers of the Government and members of Congress, at the expense of the public Treasury, is a most serious one, and ought to be met and investigated. The people required it, the interest of the whole country demanded the investigation of such a charge when definitely made, and by a responsible person. If true, it was a species of corruption that should not be borne nor tolerated for a moment by any party. Hence, again, the great necessity of probing to the bottom this matter; and if the charges are foul and unfounded, the public should know it, particularly in relation to the franking privilege; how far it has been abused, and by whom. There were other means, as he had understood, of getting documents gratuitously furnished to members; that he should also be glad to have inquired into, but of which he knew nothing of his own knowledge. It was but sheer justice to the public that the whole truth in relation to these matters should go forth to the people, that they might see the character of the engines at work to fabricate public opinion, and from what source at last came the means by which this whole machinery was put and kept in operation.

The gentleman from Kentucky had moved to discharge the committee and suppress all further investigation. This, too, was most singular, considering that the honorable member did not belong to the committee, and could know but little of their ability or means to investigate this subject, during this session, nor had he cared even to inquire. Such a proposition, he thought, would much more appropriately have come from one of the members of the committee, who, it might be presumed, knew something of the opportunities of carrying on the investigation.

He hoped the member would think better of his course, and withdraw his extraordinary proposition to discharge the committee, and that the resolution to prosecute the investigation would prevail, and leave given them to send for persons and papers, if deemed important or necessary to the development of the truth in relation to the subject. He should certainly vote for the fullest and freest investigation into this matter, and hoped the House would sustain the proposition, and resist every attempt to thwart, by indirection, the examination into the facts.

Mr. HARLAN withdrew his motion to discharge the committee, and moved the following:

"And that the said committee be instructed further to inquire and report to this House how and to whom the patronage of the Government has been paid for printing and for the publication of the laws of the United States; what editors of newspapers have been deprived of the publication of the laws, and the reasons therefor, and the correspondence relating to that subject; and to inquire into all abuses, if any, which have arisen under the existing laws and regulations upon the subject of the public printing and the publication of the laws; and, to this end, that the committee have leave to sit during the recess of Congress."

Mr. STANLY moved the following amendment to the amendment, which Mr. HARLAN accepted as a further modification of his amendment:

"And that said committee be further instructed to inquire by what authority a large number of extra Globes were folded with the Messages which were ordered by members in the early part of the session, without their knowledge and consent, and thus transmitted at the public expense; and that they also inquire under what arrangement the editor of the Globe had the exclusive printing of said Message, and was thus enabled to practise such device."

Mr. DUNCAN made an earnest appeal to the House, as an act of justice to the memorialist, who had been charged there and elsewhere, to adopt the original resolution, especially as, without it, the committee could not perform the duty assigned them. He hoped, after all these grave charges had been made, that there was no intention of shrinking from their investigation, by loading it with propositions that had no possible connection with them. If this gentleman, Mr. Blair, had been injured, let him be redressed; if he, or any of the Heads of the Departments, or any of the officers of the Government, or members of that House, had been guilty of impropriety, let them be all exposed. To test the sense of the House, he moved the previous question.

Mr. MITCHELL moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. BOON called for the yeas and nays, which, being ordered, were—yeas 47, nays 129, as follows:

Mr. MENIFEE offered the following resolution, which was read:

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend the resolution by adding at the end the following:

"Also, to examine the waters of the Susquehannah river for the like purpose.

Mr. MENIFEE asked the gentlemen from Pennsylvania to make his motion more definite, and confine the survey to some particular point on that river.

Mr. PETIKIN said it was his purpose to have a general survey of that river, and he could not consent to modify his amendment to meet the wishes of the gentleman.

The House then took its usual recess till half past 3 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House convened at half-past three o'clock, and went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONNOR in the chair, on the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The question pending being on the motion of Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, to strike out the enacting clause,

Mr. RHETT, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the committee at length in support of the bill.

The question was then taken, and the vote was, ayes 92, noes 86.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee then rose and reported the bill, striking out the enacting clause.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky they rose, and said he thought this bill had been discussed long enough, and in order, therefore, to bring the House to a vote, whether this bill should be rejected or not, he demanded the previous question.

Mr. WISE moved a call of the House, which was ordered, and proceeded in.

The following gentlemen were excused on account of ill health:

Mr. BRUYN, on motion of Mr. GRAY.

Mr. COFFIN, on motion of Mr. E. WHITTLESEY.

Mr. CURTIS, on motion of Mr. FILLMORE.

Mr. LOOMIS, on motion of Mr. BIRDSALL.

Mr. MURRAY, on motion of Mr. SOUTHGATE.

The House refused to excuse Mr. JACKSON of Georgia, Mr. GRANTLAND having made an ineffectual motion to that effect.

The CLERK was then directed to make out a list of the absentees, and furnish to the officers, in order to notify the absent members at their lodgings. Several gentlemen suggested that those members in attendance in the galleries and lobbies be permitted to enter; but others others objecting, the CHAIR said it could only be done by unanimous consent. Pending this stage, however, the officers let all in who were at the doors on their own responsibility, whose names were afterwards disclosed, and among them were some of those who had been excused.

The only members then absent were the following: Messrs. BRUYN, CARTER, JACKSON of Georgia, MORGAN, OGLE, and MURRAY.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky moved to dispense further with the call.

Mr. CONNOR asked for the yeas and nays; which being ordered,

Mr. WILLIAMS withdrew his motion; and

Mr. CHILDS renewed it, as did

Mr. CONNOR the call for the yeas and nays; which were again ordered.

At this stage, Mr. MURRAY and Mr. MORGAN came into the hall, leaving then but four absentees.

The House dispensed with the call—yeas 117, nays 104.

At this stage Mr. CARTER and Mr. OGLE appeared, the only absentees being Mr. BRUYN and Mr. JABEZ JACKSON.

The question then recurred upon the demand for the previous question, when

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina appealed to the mover to withdraw it, and permit the question to be taken on the distinct propositions.

Mr. WILLIAMS declined.

The previous question was then seconded by more than a majority of the whole House, viz: ayes 127.

Mr. CUSHMAN then asked for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, but subsequently withdrew the request, and

Mr. BRONSON renewed it; but they were not ordered, and the main question was ordered without a division.

The main question, being on ordering the bill to a third reading, was then propounded, and thereon,

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 111, nays 125, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Chaney, Chapman, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Howard, Hubley, William H. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—125.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. FOSTER of New York, who had voted with the majority, gave notice of a motion to reconsider; and then, on motion, at a quarter before 8 o'clock,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, June 25, 1838.

The CHAIR announced a communication from he Secretary of War, transmitting a report from he Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in compliance with the resolution of the 13th instant, relative to an exchange of certain lands with the Pottawatamie Indians.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR also communicated a report from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a detailed statement of the accounts of such of the collectors and receivers of public moneys and disbursing agents who have been reported as defaulters: laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKEAN presented three memorials from sundry citizens of Pennsylvania—one against the late Cherekee treaty, and one against the admission of Texas into the Union; which were laid on the table: and one praying for the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, the question of receiving which was laid on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Joseph K. Avery; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented six memorials from sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, similar to several others lately presented by him, asking for the passage of the Independent Treasury bill, and opposed to the establishment of a National Bank: laid on the table.

Mr. MORRIS presented certain additional documents in support of the claim of Catharine White; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRIS also presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against the Cherokee treaty; which was laid on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the petition of William Fry, reported a bill to allow him to import, free of duty, an iron steamboat, suited to the navigation of rivers; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the resolution of the Senate directing them to inquire into the expediency of allowing vessels to store their cargoes, which had been ordered off by the blockading squadron when bound to ports in Mexico, reported a bill to that effect; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which had been referred the bill from the House making, temporary provision for the comfort and support of the lunatics of the said District, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported, without amendment, several bills that had been referred to that committee.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, with a joint resolution fixing the day of adjournment of the present session of Congress being the 9th of July next; and

On notion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for tomorrow.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT,

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing equitable commissions to the agents or attorneys of persons to whom allowances have been made under treaties of indemnity with foreign nations, when, in consequence of an indebtedness to the United States on the part of the claimant, the money has been retained by the Government, and the agent, as attorney of the claimant, has not been paid for his services in prosecuting the claim before the commission.

Mr. CLAY rose for the purpose of calling the attention the Senate to a resolution offered by Mr. HUBBARD and agreed to by the Senate some days ago, requiring that the original papers on private claims should not be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, but allowing copies of them to be procured by the claimants on paying such compensation as is allowed for similar services in the State Department of the Government. Mr. C. argued that the portion of the resolution authorizing pay for copies of the papers was unconstitutional, inasmuch as it was in the nature of a tax, which the Senate had not the constitutional power to originate, and much less to lay, without the concurrence of the other House. Mr. C. therefore moved to rescind that portion of the resolution, including also that part which allowed copies to be obtained by the claimants.

Mr. HUBBARD had not examined with critical precision the constitutionality of the matter. All the object he had in view was the furtherance of justice to individuals, and the security of the United States. The experience which every Senator had in relation to the claims made by individuals must convince the Senate of the propriety of adopting some such measure. He had no great objection, if the Senate saw fit, to have copies of the papers given to the individuals at the expense of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS thought he saw great propriety in retaining the original papers on the files of the Senate. It was due, as the Senator from New Hampshire had very justly observed, for the security of the Government. He did not view it in the same light as the Senator from Kentucky, as a tax, but as a mere office regulation. He was persuaded, from what little experience he had, that the Government had already been subjected to losses, by the habit which claimants had got into of withdrawing their papers.

Mr. CLAY still denied the power of the Senate to enforce such a rule without it was done by the concurrent legislation of both houses. He therefore hoped the rule would be rescinded, at least so far as related to the charge imposed.

Mr. KING said great injury would be likely to result to the Government from the withdrawing of the papers of individual claimants. There were cases on which all the testimony of which reports were founded, were no longer to be found on the files of the office. The papers were withdrawn, and the cases gradually improved, (for ten or fifteen years, in some instances,) until all the original evidence was lost sight of. Mr. K. said he was glad to find the Senator from Kentucky had suddenly become so strict a constructionist. He, [Mr. K.] however, did not look on the subject in the light of a tax. The clause of the Constitution on which the Senator relied to sustain him, did not bear him out. Mr. K. expressed a wish that the section might be retained.

Mr. SEVIER hoped the Senator from Kentucky would move to strike out the whole of the section, and if that Senator would not do so, he [Mr. S.] would. Mr. S. thought the reports, which were always in cases of any importance, were sufficient evidence at least for landmarks to guide them in their researches. If individuals chose to withdraw their papers, let them do so.

Mr. HUBBARD said he would ask the yeas and nays on the question. He saw no injury likely to result, and was satisfied it would be attended with much good. As to the report which had been referred to by the Senator from Alabama, there were some case where there was no evidence to sustain the written reports.

After some further remarks from Mr. NORVELL, BAYARD, and others, the question was taken on Mr. CLAY'S motion, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Trotter, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Davis, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Swift, Wall, Williams and Wright—19.

Mr. SEVIER then made his motion to rescind the whole rule; on which motion the debate was further continued by Messrs. NORVELL, MORRIS, MERRICK, BAYARD, and others; when the question was taken by yeas and nays, and lost—yeas 12, nays 26.

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Merrick, Norvell, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, and Young—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Wall, Webster, Williams, and Wright—26.

Mr. BUCHANAN said there was a resolution from the other House, fixing the day of adjournment, which he was anxious should be at once acted on.

Mr. WRIGHT said it was generally understood that it was to be acted upon to-morrow, and with that understanding several Senators who were then in their seats were now absent. He thought, therefore, it would be better to let it lie over until that period.

Mr. BUCHANAN had no desire to take advantage of the absence of Senators, but was desirous that the question might be promptly acted on. Congress had now been in session, with an interval of six weeks, ever since September. He was opposed to perpetual parliaments; and as the House had taken the lead in fixing the day, he was for concurring at once, as that would have a tendency to set Congress to work in good earnest; and until the time was fixed, our experience showed us that we would go on discussing subjects from day to day, without bringing them to any practical result. Wherever he went he was asked, "Why don't you finish your business, and adjourn." He would agree, under the circumstances, that the subject should lie over; but gave notice that he should call it up to-morrow, after the reading of the journal and the morning business was dispensed with.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the various petitions in relation to the passage of an international copyright bill, made an unfavorable report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG said he was not in his seat when the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury was read this morning; and as it was a document of great interest, he would move for the printing of 5,000 extra copies.

Mr. MORRIS opposed the printing as unnecessary. The usual number had been ordered, which he thought would be sufficient for all the uses of Congress; and he thought it time to check this expenditure of printing documents.

Mr. YOUNG replied at length, urging the absolute necessity of the printing. It was not for Congress that this document was wanted; it was to do an act of justice to individuals who had been injured from the circumstance of being reported as public defaulters, when, in fact, they were not so. The document in question gave the reasons why persons had been so reported, and it was due to the individuals that they should be justified in the public opinion. Mr. Y. instanced cases where, to his knowledge, persons had been represented as defaulters to the Treasury long after the money had been paid, but from some informality, had not been credited on the books.

Mr. LINN alluded to the last war, where there were many cases of a like nature; and he would be very glad to give his vote to print an extra number in order that all injurious impressions in relation to individuals might be removed.

Mr. MORRIS contended that no man was a recorded defaulter who was not so in fact, or from inattention and informality in the settlement of his accounts. Mr. M. said our public officers were not so corrupt, nor so inattentive to their public duties, as to record any man a defaulter, when there was nothing to justify it. If there were such, he, for one, would go for their removal. But the fault was on the part of those whose business it was to render their accounts in proper form and in due time; and the thanks of the country were due to those faithful public servants who made these returns.

Mr. YOUNG replied, still maintaining the necessity of the document going forth to the world. If there were gentlemen who thought that five thousand was an extravagant number, he would so modify his motion as to reduce it to two thousand extra.

The question on this motion was taken, and the printing ordered—ayes 21, noes not counted.

The bill for the benefit of the Alabama, Florida; and Georgia Railroad Company having been read a third time, and on the question, shall this bill pass?

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he should ask for the yeas and nays. He desired to be understood as having no objection to the passage of the bill. On the contrary, he meant to give it his vote, but as this bill was very liberal in its principles, he was desirous that the record of those sustaining it should be seen.

The yeas and nays being ordered, were—yeas 28, nays 6, as follows:

This amendment being accepted by Mr. PRENTISS,

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, the amendment was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, ——— next.

The Senate then went into Executive session, and soon after,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, June 26, 1833.

Mr. STONE, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay of the volunteers or drafted militia men who are now, or may hereafter be called into the service of the United States. Also, those who are, or may hereafter be employed by the General Government, for the purpose of removing the Cherokees out of the States of Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Alabama, and settling them west of the Mississippi, as well as those volunteers who have just returned home from Florida, or who may hereafter be received into the service of the United States for either of the foregoing purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana submitted the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the fees allowed by law to the Clerks, Marshals, and District Attorneys of the United States courts for the State of Louisiana, so as to correspond with the fees allowed for similar services in the State courts of the said State.

Mr. MARTIN, on leave, laid on the table an amendment he gave notice he should submit to the "bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands;" and it was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked leave to submit the following resolution, with a view to make it the special order for some early day:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to take such measures as he may deem necessary:

First. To cause, as soon as may be, all payments of public dues, of every description, and without discrimination, to be made hereafter in the current coin of the United States, or Treasury notes, or the notes of banks situated in the State, Territory, or District wherein such dues are receivable, and whose notes are payable and paid on demand in such current coin.

Secondly. To cause all public money, as early as practicable after it shall be received, to be placed in the State banks, preferring always, when such can be had, those which are depositories of the State, Territory, or District wherein situated, on condition that they will agree, for reasonable compensation, not exceeding one eighth of one per cent. to receive the same on special deposite, not to be used by them as a basis or fund for discounts or otherwise, nor mingled with other funds; to keep and render accounts, give receipts or certificates, permit inspections and examinations, make payments and transfers, and give collateral security for the safe keeping thereof in such manner as may be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, or by the laws of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to compel such transfers at the expense of the bank, nor to authorize transfers, in any case, except where the public service, or the safety of the funds, may render them necessary.

Thirdly, To cause all notes of banks remaining on deposite at the end of every two months to be converted into the legal coin of the United States, and be continued or replaced in deposite as aforesaid, and to be drawn for and used, so far as the public convenience or necessities will admit, in preference to all subsequently accruing revenue.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected, for he said he could never consent to let a matter get in at the window that ought to enter by the door.

Mr ROBERTSON moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays; which being ordered—were yeas, 70, nays 123, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Briggs, John Calhoon, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Corwin, Crockett, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Grantland, Gray, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Hoffman, Hopkins, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Legare, Lincoln, Lyon, Mallory, James M. Mason, Samson Mason, Menefee, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Ogle, Pearce, Pope, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Rencher, Robertson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Augustine H. Sheppard, Sibley, Southgate, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Taliaferro, Thompson, Toland, John White, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Heman Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Clark, Coles, Craig, Crary, Cranston, Cushing, Cushman, Davee, De Graff, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Farrington, Fairfield, Richard Fletcher, Foster, Glascock, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grant, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Hamer, Harrison, Hastings, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson Joseph Johnson, Nath. Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Logan, Marvin, Marin, Maury, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Noble, Owens, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Patterson, Paynter, Peck, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Phillips, Pickens, Plumer, Potts, Potter, Pratt, John H. White, Elisha Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—123.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

[Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, who was out of his seat, when his name was called, asked leave to record his vote in the affirmative, as he was warmly in favor of the proposition, but the request was refused.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked a similar indulgence to record his vote in the negative, but it was also objected to.]

TEXAS.

Mr. ADAMS then resumed his remarks on the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the annexation of Texas, under the motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. A. proceeded to comment upon the decision of the House last Saturday in declaring him out of order, and was drawing a parallel between that decision and what was called Mr. Patton's gag resolution, when the CHAIR again interposed; and Mr. A. then went on to review the history of the manner in which the Texas question had been brought before the House, by petitions and memorials. The first was one presented by himself, from certain women of Plymouth, Massachusetts, which he read, and then refered to several others, signed by women, defending with great earnestness, the right of women to petition. Without concluding, Mr. A. gave way to the orders of the day.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

Mr FOSTER then moved to reconsider the vote by which the Sub-Treasury bill was rejected.

The CHAIR said it would come up after the bills for reference were disposed of.

Mr. YELL gave notice that he should move to lay that motion on the table, if succeeded in.

Mr. FOSTER then called up his motion at the present time, to which no objection was made.

Mr. F. remarked that he did not rise for the purpose of inflicting a speech upon the House in relation to the subject which had so long occupied the time and attention of both Houses of Congress, because he had no doubt that each member had fully formed his opinion on the whole subject, and because the time of the House was too precious to be wasted by further discussion.

He desired merely to state the object which he had in view in making the motion to reconsider, so that his vote already given against the engrossment, and the one which he was about to give, might not be the subject of misconstruction; and even this he would not now do, had an opportunity for explanation occurred yesterday.

He would say that the vote which he yesterday gave was a deliberate one; and he desired to be understood that his motion to reconsider was not made in consequence of any change of his opinion, but simply that he might have an opportunity now (and which the previous question yesterday prevented) to move an amendment to the bill, to make it conform substantially to the provisions of the bill upon the same subject which passed the Senate some months since. Such an amendment would make the bill acceptable to him. But even though such an amendment should not be adopted, it was still important that the vote should be reconsidered, in order that some other measure for the collection, safe keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue might be adopted.

Mr. BRIGGS then rose, and said that, believing the important public business before the House required that they should proceed at once to its consideration, and that the country did desire this question should be set at rest, he moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. MALLORY said he did not rise to enter into the merits of the question yesterday decided by the House, and now purposed to be reconsidered. His object was simply to explain his own position, and the reason which induced him to vote against the bill. He would take occasion to declare, in the face of the House and the nation, that he heartily approved the principle of divorcing the public money from the banks of the country, and believed that the people of his district, and the State generally, would ultimately decide in favor of that doctrine. But having reason to believe that a majority of those whom he had the honor of representing, were at this time opposed to the particular measure under consideration, and no opportunity of perfecting its details being afforded, he felt virtually instructed to carry out their sentiments, and had voted accordingly. Thinking that no good could result from entertaining the proposition of the gentleman from New York, to reconsider the vote of yesterday, with a view of testing the sense of the House on the Senate's bill, he should vote against the motion. Mr. M. said he would content himself with this brief exposition of the motives which had influenced his action on this subject, as the approaching adjournment of Congress would furnish him with an opportunity of fully explaining his sentiments on this question to those to whom he was alone responsible for his conduct on this floor. Mr. M. stated it to be his intention to discuss this question before the people, on his return home, and he had no doubt they would sustain his opinions, and enable him, at some future day, to vote more in accordance with those opinions than he had done yesterday.

Mr. WISE requested the motion again to be withdrawn, as he wished to state why he should be compelled to vote against laying the motion on the table. Before the request was responded to—

Mr. MASON of Ohio, made this inquiry of the SPEAKER: Whether, if the motion to lay on the table should prevail, the bill would not cohere with it, and be subject to be taken up at any time during the present session?

The CHAIR replied that it would at any period when such a motion was in order.

Mr. MASON hoped then the gentleman from Massachusetts would withdraw his motion, and suffer the House to come to a direct vote by means of the previous question, or some other mode,

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky said if the gentleman would do so, he would instantly move the previous question.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn, and Mr. W. demanded the previous question.

Mr. HARLAN and Mr. SLADE simultaneously moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in till 231 members were ascertained to be present, when, on motion of Mr. CUSHMAN it was dispensed.

Mr. THOMAS appealed to the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw the motion for the previous question, that he might make a very brief explanation of the reasons which would govern the vote he was about to give.

Mr. WILLIAMS withdrew the motion, on condition that Mr. THOMAS would renew it.

Mr. THOMAS said that he had not participated in the debate on the bill it was now proposed to reconsider. He had proposed to do so; but it was now too late, as the House had ordered that the main question should be put on the bill, and it had been rejected. He was in favor of the bill, but he would now vote against the motion to reconsider. That his motives for this might not be misconstrued, he desired to explain.

This House is divided into two great parties, one of whom supports, and the other is opposed to the Administration. The great majority of the friends of the Administration, one hundred and eleven in number, have voted for the bill which has been rejected. About an equal number of the same party voted heretofore against the motion to lay on the table the bill from the Senate for the establishment of an Independent Treasury. Twelve or thirteen members of the House of the party friendly to the Administration, uniting with the Opposition, have laid upon the table the bill from the Senate, and have rejected the bill of this House.

The first measure contemplated the receipt of the notes of specie paying banks; the latter has in it what is familiarly called the specie clause. The sense of the House has been ascertained to-day on the proposition to make special deposites of the public money in the banks, and but seventy members have voted to permit such a measure even to be entertained; a majority of whom, we all know, although willing to entertain that proposition, are hostile to the whole scheme. Under these circumstances, what advantage can be gained by a vote to reconsider the bill that has been rejected? The vast majority of the Republican party will vote for no bill that does not authorize the public officers to manage the public money independently of the State banks. The Opposition go almost in solid column against any such measure, and with twelve or thirteen separated on this question from our ranks, they are found to be a majority. It is manifest, therefore, that nothing can be gained by reconsidering.

We are rapidly approaching the close of the session. We have much important business to transact, and no time to be consumed in idle debate. On this great question of a constitutional Independent Treasury we must go to the country; we must appeal to the people. Let them decide, through their agents, how, and by whom the Treasury Department is to be administered. Neither he, nor those with whom he was acting, had cause to dread the issue.

Mr. SERGEANT was proceeding to say that he should vote against the reconsideration, when the CHAIR reminded him that the previous question precluded debate.

The demand for the previous question was then seconded without a division, and the main question similarly ordered thereon; the yeas and nays were granted at the request of Mr. BRONSON, and they were—yeas 21, nays 205, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boon, Bronson, John Campbell, Chaney, Davee, Fairfield, Foster, Gallup, Grant, Gray, Hawkins, Keim, Kemble, McClellan, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Parker, Parmenter, Snyder, and Taylor—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Aycrigg, Banks, Beaty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Boad, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Buchanan, Bynum, William B Calhoun, John Calhoon, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Cleveland, Coffin, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, DeGraff, Dennis, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Farrington, Richard Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Halsted, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jenifer, H. Johnson, J. Johnson, William Cost Johnson, N. Jones, John W. Jones, Kennedy, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Lincoln, Logan, Lyon, Marvin, James M. Mason, Samson Mason, Martin, Maury, May, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Moore, Mathias Morris, Samuel W. Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Owens, Parris, Patterson, Paynter, Pearce, Peck, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Phillips, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Potts, Potter, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Reily, Rencher, Rhett, Richardson, Ridgway, Rives, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sawyer, Sergeant, Sheffer, A. H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sheplor, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Spencer, Stanley, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thomas, Thompson, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Jos. L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, Worthington, Yell, and Yorke—205.

So the House refused to reconsider.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. BOULDIN rose, and said he had been waiting for several days with the most perfect confidence in the justice of the House, for a favorable moment, when he should find himself and the House in a good humor to make a motion to the House to pay the time that they took from him, which was devoted to the business of the District of Columbia. They had given him but half a day, and had taken half of that from him; and he had no doubt that at some suitable time, they would return to him that time. Short as it was, he asked no more, and would ask the House to give the district business the balance of the evening, after the recess. He did not suppose it would take the whole evening. There were but few bills or matters of any kind on the District, and he had no idea they would take up much of the time of the House; he would not occupy the evening, unless other gentlemen compelled him, and said he would accept any other time that might be most agreeable to the House, if any gentleman would name it. He moved a suspension of the rules to make that motion, which was decided in the negative, by a vote of 112 to 64, not two thirds.

Mr. KENNEDY moved to take up the resolution submitted by him some time since, in relation to depositing the public moneys in State banks.

Mr. YELL objected, first on the ground that the better way to progress with the public business was to take it in its order; and next, because he would not consent to set aside the Army bill, which was of the greatest importance to the people of Arkansas and the whole Western frontier.

Mr. KENNEDY moved a suspension of the rules, and varied his motion so as to make the subject the special order for to-morrow, after 12 o'clock.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were, yeas 94; nays 110.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, covering a report of the architectural plans and drawings prepared under the order and for the use of that Department, since the 4th of July, 1836, he were employed for that purpose, and what compensation as paid for their services.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

SPECIAL DEPOSITE SYSTEM.

Mr. THOMPSON asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill for the collection, safe-keeping, and disbusement of the public money, embodying the following principles:

That all the dues to the Government shall hereafter be collected in gold and silver coin, Treasury notes of the United States, the and notes of sound specie-paying banks, under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed by act of Congress, or by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no bank notes shall be received as aforesaid, except such as the banks of deposite shall agree to receive, and credit as cash.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to select as special depositories of the public funds, and at such places as may be necessary, sound specie-paying banks, preferring, in all cases where such exist, banks owned in whole or in part by the States in which the same are situated.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to contract with the banks selected as depositories aforesaid, for the safe keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys, on such terms and for such compensation as he may deem right and proper; stipulating, in all cases, under such guarantees as he may think necessary, the public funds deposited with said banks shall be in no case used in the business, nor otherwise used, but in payment of drafts from the Treasury.

Objection being made to its reception,

Mr. THOMPSON moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays.

The House refused to order the yeas and nays upon a division, and the motion to suspend was rejected without a division.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, on leave, presented to the House a letter from the Postmaster General, in relation to the post route bill; which was ordered to be printed.

Some pension bills, returned from the Senate with amendments, were taken up, and the amendments concurred in Sundry bills from the Senate, lying on the SPEAKER's table, were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

Mr. SERGEANT then moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the Union.

Mr. THOMAS suggested that the motion be waived till after the recess.

Mr. SERGEANT did not apprehend the "Harbor bill," which he intended to move, would take up much time, and he could not consent to withdraw the motion.

The motion prevailed, without a division, and the House went into committee—Mr. POTTER in the Chair.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri moved to take up the Army bill.

Mr. SHIELDS moved the bill in relation to certain Tennessee land claims.

Mr. SERGEANT moved the Harbor bill.

The first motion being put, was agreed to—ayes 88, noes 69.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The committee accordingly took up the bill from the Senate to increase the military establishment of the United States.

After some conversation on the bill,

Mr. McKAY moved to lay it aside for the present, as some further information was required as to the number of regiments necessary on the frontier, when the Military Committee would be prepared; but subsequently withdrew that motion.

The bill having been read by the Clerk,

Mr. McKAY submitted a substitute, proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BELL again renewed the motion to lay the bill aside for the present.

Mr. BRONSON moved that the committee rise.

Mr. YELL would not yield his assent to lay the bill aside, for it might not be reached again.

The committee refusing to rise, the bill was further discussed till the hour arrived for taking the daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House convened at 3 o'clock, and went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. INGHAM in the Chair, resuming the consideration of the "bill to increase the military establishment of the United States."

The question pending was on the proposed substitute of the Committee on Military Affairs, as submitted by Mr. McKAY.

Mr. McK. went into a detailed statement of the provisions of the bill, but while doing so—

Mr. THOMPSON suggested that, as the measure was a very important one, certainly the most important one of the session, and as there was obviously nothing like a quorum present, the committee should rise and have a call of the House. The suggestion was assented to, the committee rose, and Mr. T. moved a call of the House.

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, (yeas 15, nays 53,) and were yeas 86, nays 24, so the call was ordered, and proceeded in for some time; when, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the call was dispensed with, ayes 78, noes not counted, and the House went into committee as before.

Mr. McKAY concluded his explanation of the provisions of the bill, going with much minuteness into all the various details connected with it, showing the expediency and necessity of its passage, illustrating it, as he went along, with a condensed historical review of the army at different periods of its existence, and the various propositions and plans of Mr. CALHOUN and others for its increase and improvement.

Mr. KEMBLE also addressed the committee at length in support of the substitute, and to prove the necessity of a competent armament on the frontiers.

Without taking the question, on motion of Mr. BRONSON, the committee rose and reported.

Sundry bills from the Senate, on the Speaker's table, were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

The bill to authorize the inhabitants of township 8 north, range No. 32, in Arkansas, to relinquish their 16th section and locate another, being taken up,

Mr. YELL moved that it be put on its passage.

Mr. HARLAN moved its commitment to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. YELL explained the provisions of the bill, and that it was purely for the benefit of the Government; but Mr. H. insisted on his motion, regarding it, he said, in the nature of a float.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri thought, if it was committed at all, it should go to the Military committee, though he himself did not deem its commitment necessary.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana opposed any reference as not at all required, for the bill made no appropriation.

Mr. BOON preferred the Committee on the Public Lands; for ever since he had been a member of that committee, (upwards of six years,) such bills had been invariably sent to that committee.

Mr. HARLAN modified his motion according to Mr. BOON'S suggestion.

After a few further remarks from Messrs. YELL and POPE, the bill was so committed.

On motion, at a quarter before 7 o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, June 26, 1838.

Mr. WEBSTER gave notice that he would to-morrow call up the bill introduced by him respecting the receipt of the paper of banks which issue notes less than five dollars for the public dues.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose and observed that he yesterday gave notice that he would to-day, immediately after the reading of the journal, call up the resolution of the House fixing the day of the adjournment of Congress. He now moved to take it up.

This motion having been carried, and the resolution being before the Senate,

Mr. BENTON said that he should move to postpone its further consideration until Monday next, and asked for the yeas and nays on that question. We have, said Mr. B. been here nearly seven months, and bills of the highest moment to the country were yet unacted on. He was, therefore, not willing to risk the loss of those bills by an adjournment to a day certain; and by retaining, said he, the resolution in our possession for this week, to see whether these bills will be acted on, we shall be just as far advanced on Monday as we now are. He had particularly in his eye the bill to increase the ranks of the army—a bill which they had seen the necessity of acting on for years. It was not usual to speak of what was done in the other house; but it was notorious, that at the last session, this bill having been kept back until almost the last moment, a member threatened, if it was touched, to speak out the week against it. There was also the graduation bill, another important measure, which he thought it important should be acted on. We are sent here, said Mr. B. to work, and not to sit here for a given number of days. He was for doing the public work, and after it was done, for adjourning; but he was utterly opposed to binding himself to adjourn by a certain day, and thus risk the loss of bills necessary for the service of the country, which were now ready for action. He asked for the yeas and nays on this question, in order that it might be seen that he was against risking the loss of bills important for the service of the country.

Mr. GRUNDY said it would be recollected that when the resolution fixing the period of adjournment had been introduced in the Senate, he was among the foremost in opposing its adoption. At that time he viewed it is an improper, or rather an ill-timed, measure. He was desirous that every thing material to the great interests of the nation should have been acted on before the adjournment was agitated. He considered that the introduction of such matters more appropriately belonged to the popular branch; and it best became the Senate to wait until that body said it could dispose of the public business. The House of Representatives has now informed us that it has finished its business, or at least will be ready to do so by the 9th of July. In relation to the subject mentioned by the honorable Senator from Missouri, he was as anxious that it should be matured as any man could be; but, said Mr. G. when the House has told us that it will finish all its business, and be ready to adjourn at the period specified, I do not see with what propriety we can vote for any further postponement.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he was glad that the Senator from Missouri had called for the yeas and nays, and he should most cheerfully vote for them. He believed, at the time, that if his friend from Alabama [Mr. KING] had prosecuted the resolution introduced by him, with his usual perseverance, and the day had been fixed for the adjournment, they would have been as ready to adjourn by that day as they now were, or should be by the 9th of August next, if they now postponed the resolution. One thing his experience had taught him: you never, said he, go earnestly and zealously to work till you know when the session is to terminate. Fix the day of adjournment now, and it would operate as an incentive to the two Houses to finish the business before them. He would be as sorry as any man that the army bill should be lost. But can we, said he, tell the House that they did not know the state of their own business when they passed this resolution; and, though it was passed by a majority of two to one, we will not agree to it—our refusal not being for the purpose of doing our own business, but for the purpose of giving them longer time to do theirs. If, said Mr. B. you postpone this resolution for one week, you necessarily postpone the adjournment, whereas if you take the House at its word, and pass the resolution now, they will go earnestly to work, and complete their business by the day fixed. This resolution was adopted in the House by a majority of two to one; and the plain construction of a refusal to adopt it here would be an intimation to that body that it did not know what time it would require to complete its own business. It would be virtually telling them, that by adjourning on the day they had fixed, they would violate their duty, and lose the army bill, as well as other bills important to the country For these reasons he was opposed to the postponement, and should vote against it.

Mr. BENTON said that the opinions advanced by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania were not, in his view, justified by experience. The theory of no work, until after the day of adjournment was fixed, was promptly contradicted by the existing state of facts. He might appeal to the Senate to sustain him in the assertion That body, without any day fixed, had made as great progress as though the day had long before been settled on; for months, he might say, they had been passing on, under easy sail, until all the business relating to the great and leading interests of the nation had been disposed of. With the other House there was a far different state of things. Early and late had that body been engaged; the stars of Heaven had found them in close attendance upon their public duties. Yes, sir, said Mr. B. never was House more laboriously occupied; the sessions continued from ten in the morning not unfrequently until midnight, until the health and spirits of the members have been broken down by those continued and exhausting sittings. Sir, that House has done all that it could do; and more progress could not have been made than has been by that body. If the resolution introduced here some weeks since had been adopted, (which the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to regret so much that it had not) he would undertake to say that it would have been an utter extermination of all the business of importance in which the Government and individuals were interested. He had before alluded to the army bill which had passed that body at the heel of a session, and, though reported by the committee in the other House, was never taken up, because a member said if it were taken up he would speak out the time. Now, sir, said Mr. B. I am against that risk. I am, for one, unwilling to jeopard any measure in which this country is so vitally interested, by leaving it to be defeated in any such manner. No injury could result from holding over the resolution until Monday next. It would then be seen what chance there would be of the House acting upon the army bill. With regard to our own body, we can finish all our business in four or five days. When this question is taken up, I shall call for the yeas and nays, as I, for one, am determined to record my name against its adoption at this time.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied, that he entirely differed from the Senator from Missouri, both as to his arguments and facts. He says, continued Mr. B. that my position is contradicted by existing facts, and that the Senate is ready to adjourn in two or three days. Now, he thought the Senate must work very hard to be able to adjourn in twice two or three days. According to the calendar, there were sixteen pages of titles of acts yet to be acted on; and they must proceed at a very rapid rate to get through these acts and adjourn by the day fixed by the House. If the day of adjournment had been fixed some time ago, the Senate would not have adjourned over from Friday to Monday, as it had often done, and would not have consumed so much time as they had in discussion. He knew that the sessions of the House had been very constant and laborious, though much of its time had been taken up by discussion. But what had they done? They have (said Mr. B.) several of our important bills before them, and they declare that they can finish their business and adjourn by the 9th. But there was another consideration. The Congress of the United States, against the theory of our institutions, had been in session, with the exception of six weeks, from the 4th of September to this day; and it was time they went home to their constituents and got their instructions, instead of remaining here to convert themselves into a sort of Rump Parliament. He entirely concurred with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY.] The House itself, the best judge of its own business, had fixed on the day; and let us, said he, agree to it promptly, by which means they will be stimulated to increased exertion. He was ready to show his constituents his desire to complete the business before him, and to return to them; and if any of the business should remain undone, it would be better that it should be so, than that Congress should sit the whole year round.

On taking the question, Mr. BENTON'S motion was rejected—yeas 8, nays 39, as follows;

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Linn, Lyon, Norvell, Sevier, Tipton, and Wright—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Trotter, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, and Young—39.

The resolution was then agreed to without a division.

Mr. YOUNG, on leave, introduced a bill to prevent defalcations by the collectors, receivers, and disbursing agents of the Government; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that, in consequence of the proceedings of the other House, he had prepared a bill, which he had intended to give notice of his intention to introduce, entitled a bill supplementary to the act to establish the Treasury Department; but as it was late in the session, he wished, if there was no objection, to offer it now, in order that it might be printed at once. It would come up to-morrow, and he should then probably say a few words in explanation of it.

Leave was accordingly given, and Mr. B. introduced the following bill, which was read:

[The bill was given in yesterday's Globe.]

The bill for the relief of the heirs of James Latham, deceased, was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the bill for the relief of the heirs of Pierre Menard was taken up, and after a debate, in which it was advocated by Messrs. CRITTENDEN, NORVELL, LINN, CLAY of Kentucky, ROANE, and WHITE, and opposed by Messrs. BAYARD, NILES, and KNIGHT, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, June 27, 1838.

Mr. HOWARD, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Public Buildings be directed to ascertain the plan, cost, and advantages of the mode proposed for ventilating the new parliament house in London, and report the same to this House, at the next session of Congress, together with his opinion of its applicability to the hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GRAY moved that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate bill for the relief of Richard P. Banks of Arkansas, (having been sent to that committee by mistake,) and that the same be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HARLAN at first objected, on the ground that he wanted that all the committees should have an opportunity of reporting.

Mr. RIVES appealed to Mr. GRAY to vary his motion accordingly, which he did at first, but on Mr. ADAMS stating that he only waived his right for the single motion Mr. G. renewed that, and it prevailing, the bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

At the suggestion of Mr. CRAIG and others, Mr. ADAMS waived his right to address the House to-day in continuation of his review of the Texas question, with the understanding that nothing was to interpose between his right for to-morrow, for the purpose of enabling the committees to report.

The committees were then called upon by the CHAIR.

On motion of Mr. M. the surveys of the War Department on the Winchester Railroad were ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE HALL.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Public Buildings, under the direction, and upon a plan to be previously approved by the SPEAKER, cause the Hall of the House of Representatives to be altered, during the recess of Congress, by changing the position of the Speaker's chair and Clerk's table to the opposite side of the Hall, and reversing the location of the desks of the members, elevating and conforming the floor to such order of arrangement, as, in the general design, to restore the arrangement of the chair and seats of members to the state in which they existed previous to the alteration authorized by the House of Representatives, in the first session of the Twenty-second Congress; and that the expenses be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that it had often occurred to him that whatever change might be made in the floor, the best would be to make the floor flat; for it was tested by experience, that members could hear much better from those who were on the same level with themselves, than from either those who sat lower or more elevated.

Mr. SERGEANT thought otherwise.

Mr. HARLAN thought there was no time to go on with such a discussion as this now, and therefore he demanded the previous question; which was carried.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia said, believing this question ought not to be disposed of till after the next census, he moved to lay the resolution on the table.

This motion was disagreed to without a division, and the resolution was concurred in by a large majority.

Mr. MERCER reported Senate bill making appropriations for certain roads in the Territory of Wisconsin.

The bill originally came from the Senate, was passed by the House with certain amendments, to which the Senate disagreed; the Committee on Roads and Canals now recommended that the House insist upon all their amendments; which was agreed to.

Mr. PEARCE, from the select committee appointed on the memorial of Thomas Coyle, made a report thereon; which was laid on the table.

Mr. HOLT, from the select committee appointed on the memorial of sundry citizens of Connecticut, praying for the erection of a monument to the memory of Capt. Mr. H. also reported Senate bill, with an amendment, (a substitute) to confirm certain purchases of public lands under the act of the 19th of June, 1834, (in Mississippi) and moved its being concurred in.

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of directing patents to be issued to James Nevils and Luther Gleason, William Powell and Robert Grignon, Ebenezer Childs and Francis Laventure, or their legal assignees, for certain lands in the Territory of Wisconsin, alleged to have been purchased by them under the pre-emption law, passed June 19, 1834; and that said committee be authorized to receive testimony in support of, or in opposition to, the issuing of said patents.

REMISSION OF STEAMBOAT IRON DUTIES.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported a bill to remit certain duties upon iron imported for the construction of iron steamboats.

Mr. A. moved that this and another bill on the same subject be made the special order on Saturday next, for one hour, after the recess, which was agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to amend the joint resolution to lease lands for the cultivation of the mulberry and sugar beet, the bill for the propagation of seeds, and the bill to promote the cultivation of tropical plants, the special order for one hour on Saturday, after Mr. ADAMS's special order should be disposed of, but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported, with amendment, Senate bill in relation to the appointment of commissioners to adjust the disputed land claims under the Choctaw treaty, the consideration of which was postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. B. also reported a bill to provide an allowance of invalid pensions to certain Cherokee, under the 14th article of the treaty of 1825, which was also postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following bills:

A bill for the relief of Ann Tilden.

A bill for the relief of Jesse Seymour, or his legal representatives, and in alteration of an act entitled "An act respecting the late officers and crew of the sloop of war Wasp," approved the 20th April, 1816.

A bill for the relief of Charles Rockwell.

A bill for the relief of the widow of Thomas Kibby.

A bill for the relief of John G. Mozart.

Mr. INGHAM then moved to set apart Monday next for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said there were some very important appropriation bills yet to be acted on.

Others also objecting—

Mr. INGHAM asked a suspension of the rules; remarking that not a single naval bill had been yet acted on, and all he asked was one day. The motion did not prevail—79 to 48—not two-thirds.

Mr. WISE expressed a hope that the House would set apart some day, for the Committee on Naval Affairs had not had a days for five years.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolution of the House, adopted on the 28th of May ultimo, "requiring" the Judiciary Committee to report on certain resolutions and petitions, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. T. explained that this resolution, (which reported a resolution originally introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana,) was brought in on the ground that for a due investigation into the affair there was not time to summon witnesses, etc.

The resolution was then concurred in.

Mr. THOMAS then reported a bill to increase and regulate the terms of the District Court of the Northern District of New York.

Mr. T. moved that it be put on its passage.

Mr. LOOMIS moved its commitment.

Mr. BRONSON begged his colleague to withraw the motion, as it was equivalent to a rejection of the bill.

Mr. LOOMIS replied that he was not prepared to vote on the bill one way or the other, nor did he believe his colleagues were sufficiently cognizant of the matter without further examination.

Mr. THOMAS was about to proceed, when

Mr. McKAY and Mr. YELL called for the orders of the day.

Mr. THOMAS begged the gentlemen to waive them for a moment.

Mr. YELL said he should do no such thing, for the army bill was of more importance to him than any thing else.

At a subsequent period of the day, however, on motion of Mr. RIVES, the bill was committed.

The motion for the orders prevailed, ayes 110, noes not counted.

Bills from the Senate on the SPEAKER's table were read twice and referred.

ARMY BILL.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, the House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Union, Mr. INGHAM in the chair, on the bill to increase the military establishment of the United States.

The question was on the substitute of the Committee on Military Affairs, which proposed to increase the army to about 12,500, the Senate bill augmenting it to upwards of 14,000.

Mr. BRONSON addressed the House at length on the merits of the bill, going at large into the condition of our Western and Northern frontiers, with a view to demonstrate the necessity of its passage. Mr. B. also went into a mass of minute details contrasting the expenses of militia or volunteers and regular soldiers, being a difference of about from four (or perhaps six) to one, without reference to the question of efficiency, and the more indirect loss to the country from taking men suddenly from their ordinary pursuits. Mr. B. said that, though he was favor of the larger number, yet he preferred the bill recommended by the House committee, as being more perfect in its provisions.

Before the question was taken, the period arrived for the House to take its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

As soon as the House convened, it went into committee, resuming the consideration of the

ARMY BILL.

Mr. BRONSON concluded his remarks in support of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri, was opposed to the amendment of the Military Committee, as altogether inadequate for the object contemplated. It would be insufficient to provide for the protection of the Western frontier. Mr. H. was, however, opposed to proceeding in so thin a House, with scarcely fifty members present.

Mr. MASON of Ohio, suggested that they either proceed or take the question on the amendment.

The question was then taken on the substitute to the first clause, when it was agreed to.

Mr. McKAY, under instructions from the Military Committee, moved an amendment to the second clause, providing for an additional regiment of infantry.

Mr. HARRISON moved a further amendment to raise a regiment of riflemen in addition thereto; and proceeded to give his reasons for the superior efficiency of such a corps.

Mr. McKAY cited a section of the bill intended to meet the very object the gentleman had in view, for the President was thereby authorized to convert any of the regiments of infantry into one of riflemen, whenever it should be deemed expedient.

Mr. HARRISON rejoined that such a substitution would not ensure the requisite skill and efficiency. He was not for giving this discretion to the President, but for having the corps organized at the start.

Mr. CRARY inquired if there were any riflemen or light infantry at present belonging to the army?

Mr. McKAY replied that they were not, though that description of force was contemplated in the section he had just referred to.

Mr. CRARY then was of opinion that Mr. HARRISON's amendment was a very proper one, for that description of force could alone be effective against Indians.

Mr. GRENNELL opposed the amendment as altogether unnecessary from the provision referred to.

Mr. THOMPSON went into the general merits of the bill, and expressed his decided opposition to any further increase of the army than was absolutely necessary, and his objections would have still greater weight, but for the confidence he had in the present Secretary of War, to whom he had always been opposed in politics, and most probably always should. The bill, and the substitute of the military committee, proposed too great an augmentation. Mr. T. was for filling up the present regiments in rank and file, and gave notice of an amendment he intended to move, which would make an aggregate increase of 2,500 men only. The ordnance company ought to be increased, but not by abstracting from the artillery corps, as proposed, which could not spare any diminution. He was opposed also to an increase of the officers, except that of major-general of the army, for the present office was merely a ministerial one, for a minister for the army to reside near the Government of the United States.

Mr. POPE was opposed to raising a large military force under the influence of imaginary danger for he could not bring himself to believe we wer going to have an Indian war on the Western frontier, nor a British one on the North. He thought the number proposed by Mr. THOMPSON to be sufficient, and they were at least as many as could be raised during the present year. For the protection of the Western frontier, he was in favor of a cordon of posts from the extreme Northwest to the Sabine.

Mr. MERCER was in favor of part riflemen, and of dismounting one regiment of cavalry for that purpose.

Mr. REED was in favor of the smallest number that was necessary, for he was opposed to a large increase of the standing army.

Mr. WISE was opposed to the existing bill altogether, and gave notice of some amendments he intended to move at the proper stage. He did not deem any increase of the standing army to be at all necessary, for he believed that all the reports of apprehensions of war were merely got up by the Administration and those interested, to augment the army. He concurred with Mr. THOMPSON that an increase of the rank and file might be expedient, but he, too, should oppose any addition to the officers.

Mr. YELL was as much opposed to a needless increase of the army as any one, or to an overgrown standing army, and would be the first to resist it when it shall be shown to be dangerous to the liberties of the country; yet the condition of the country, and the Western frontier in particular, imperiously demanded it. The same arguments now urged were used against this measure two years ago, when there was no more prospect of a war in Florida than there was at present on the frontier. It was well known that the Indians were making preparations for hostilities, and, as in Florida, we should get into a war before we were prepared for it, unless the army was increased with a sufficient force to keep the Indians in awe. He was not, however, in favor of a very large increase, nor of an augmentation of the staff; but he did desire to see the rank and file, the musketry, the bone and sinew, increased. This was indispensable; for the Government had placed between sixty and seventy thousand Indian warriors on the Western frontier, well armed with rifles and ammunition; and it now became its duty, the duty both of the Administration and the Opposition, to devise means for protecting its own citizens. Mr. Y. expatiated upon these points at some length, and stated that about 3,400 troops, composed of dragoons and light infantry, properly distributed along the frontier, might be sufficient; and he warmly urged upon the House the necessity of passing upon some such measure, and that speedily.

Mr. JENIFER advocated also an increase to a much greater extent than was proposed by some of the opponents of the bill.

Mr. BELL expressing a wish to address the committee at length, and presuming the question would not be taken to-night, but would be to-morrow moved that the committee rise.

Mr. WISE presented his amendment informally.

Mr. McKAY and Mr. YELL severally said they should oppose the committee's rising, unless with the general understanding that the question should be taken to-morrow. (Cries of "agreed," "agreed," from all parts of the hall.)

The committee then rose—ayes 64, noes 56, and

On motion of Mr. BRIGG, the bill and amendments were ordered to be printed.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

The bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved the 26th of May, 1824, and an act amending the same, was taken up as the special order; and after a long debate, in which Messrs. LINN, SEVIER, BENTON, BAYARD, SOUTHARD, DAVIS, and others participated, the bill was amended, and laid on the table, in order that the amendments might be printed.

The bill to divide the State of Delaware into two collection districts, was taken up and discussed at length between Messrs. BAYARD, CLAYTON, KING, BUCHANAN, and NILES, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

At a few moments before 5,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, June 28, 1838.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio suggested that, as the journal of yesterday was a very lengthy one, its reading be dispensed with, and the House would gain half an hour's time thereby.

Mr. MERCER objected.

Mr. TOLAND, on leave, laid on the table the following amendatory joint rule of the two Houses:

Resolved, That the following shall be a standing joint rule of the two Houses: That after six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session (except the final session) of any Congress, all bills and joint resolutions which shall have passed in one House, and which remain undetermined in the other, shall be resumed and acted on as if an adjournment had not taken place.

Mr. TAYLOR asked leave to report two invalid pension bills, but Mr. RICE GARLAND objected to it, unless the leave should be made a general one.

One or two similar requests were made by other gentlemen, but they were also objected to.

Mr. ADAMS continued his remarks in opposition to the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the annexation of Texas. [The committee had moved to be discharged from the subject, and Mr. CUSHING moved to recommit their report with instructions to report definitively against, and Mr. THOMPSON moved an amendment to report for, the annexation of that Republic.]

Mr. A's remarks this morning were in defence of the rights of women to petition Congress, when he again gave way, without concluding, to the orders of the day.

SMALL NOTE RESTRICTION.

Mr. KILGORE moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by him on the 11th instant:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the operation of so much of the act of June 23d, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money" as prohibits the receipt of the notes or bills of specie paying banks which have issued since the 4th of March, 1836, notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars, be, and the same is hereby, suspended for the period of two years.

And be it further resolved, That the operation of the 2d section of the act of April 14, 1836, entitled "An act making appropriation for the payment of the Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1836," be, and the same is hereby, suspended for the period of two years.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 101, nays 81. So the rules were not suspended, requiring a vote of two-thirds.

SMITHSONIAN BEQUEST.

Mr. RENCHER, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means inquire into the expediency of authorizing a temporary investment of the Smithsonian legacy, as soon as it shall be received by the President of the United States.

ARMY BILL.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, the House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. INGHAM in the chair, resuming the consideration of the Senate bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States and for other purposes.

The question pending was on the following amendment, proposed by Mr. McKAY from the Committee on Military Affairs, as a second section to the bill:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be raised and organized, under the direction of the President of the United States, one regiment of infantry, to be composed of the same number and rank of officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, composing the regiments of infantry now in the service of the United States, who shall receive the same pay and allowances, and be subject to the same rules and regulations which now apply to other regiments of infantry, as provided for in this act.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri moved, last evening, to add to the above the following:

And there shall also be one regiment of riflemen raised, to be officered and organized as regiments of infantry herein provided for.

Mr. BELL, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at length on the merits of the bill. He adverted to the great importance of the measure, and the little time left for its consideration, for it involved principles fraught with immense consequences to the country, either for good or for evil. He would go for some increase, but rather in deference to what seemed to be almost the universal feeling, on the Western frontier particularly, and in some other exposed sections of the country, than from any conviction of its necessity. But, if a large increase should be authorized, little could be done executively during the recess, except the initiatory preparations of the recruiting service: and therefore, the most advisable course would probably be to postpone the measure till next session. Mr. B. admitted that a western frontier guard was necessary, both to awe the Indians, and to coerce our own settlers to an obedience of the laws; and for this purpose, he thought all the estimates of the War Department to be too extravagant; and he quoted authorities to prove that a single regiment was enough to cover that line, by the erection of military posts, from the lakes to the lower boundary of Missouri, for to authorize a very large military force would, with unfaithful agents, relax the restraints under which the whites were held at present. For the whole frontier, 2,500 would be entirely adequate, and much more effective than a very large number. Mr. B. went on at length to give other reasons against so great an increase as that proposed, such as the probable cessation of the Florida war, the peaceable character of the older and richer Indians on the frontier, the abandonment of a number of useless military posts, &c. and defended the character of the militia and volunteers from the allegations of inefficiency and difference of expense, brought by regular officers and others.

The House then took its daily recess.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
THURSDAY, June 28, 1838.
EVENING SESSION.

The House met again, pursuant to order, at half-past three o'clock, and went into committee on the

ARMY BILL.

The question pending being on the amendment of Mr. HARRISON, as stated in the morning proceedings, to raise a regiment of riflemen,

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina addressed the committee for some time in opposition to the bill, first, on the ground that injustice had been done to the militia, which was the only kind of military force for a republic in time of peace; and next, that there were no real apprehensions of war.

Mr. LINCOLN supported the bill, both as a measure called for on our western and northern frontiers, and from the superior efficiency of the regulars over the militia, in the present mode in which the latter were organized.

Mr. GRENNELL gave his reasons for being in favor of the House bill, and also of the additional regiment proposed by the military committee, and went into a review of the late censurable conduct of our citizens on the northern frontier in aiding and abetting the disturbances there, and defying the civil power, which rendered an increase of the military force absolutely necessary.

Mr. EVERETT was against the employment of a military force on the Northern frontier, for the people were able to protect themselves, and any increase of the army must be made up chiefly from an enlistment of foreigners, and he never hoped to see that day when Irishmen, Englishmen, and other aliens should be organized and armed to keep the citizens of his State in order.

Mr. EVANS contended that the military force of the country should be enlarged, especially with reference to the frontier of his State, and adverted, with some severity, to the recent proceedings in Vermont to show a military force necessary.

Mr. BRIGGS preferred waiting till the next session, as the recess was so short; nor did he believe that any contingency would require so large an increase.

Mr. HARRISON made an energetic defence of his amendment, and insisted that that description of force was absolutely indispensable for an effective defence of the Indian frontier. The citizens of that region were able to protect themselves, but could they devote all their time to watch a vigilant and cautious enemy? Moreover, the General Government had sent some sixty or seventy thousand armed savages there against their will, and therefore the Government was bound to protect its citizens so situated. It would be too late, as in the Florida case, to send an army when half the citizens were butchered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana defended the bill on similar grounds.

Mr ROBERTSON was opposed to any increase whatever in the standing army. As for the Canada border, it was utterly unnecessary, for the civil force was competent to repress violations of the law. It was ridiculous to say that New York, with upwards of two millions of people, could not enforce the civil law, but that we must have a military police. Nor was it required in Maine, for such were the relations between our Government and Great Britain, that there was no possibility of a collision in that quarter. As to the Western frontier, let all the superfluous military from the interior be sent there, and appropriate some money to keep the Indians from starving, instead of expending $3,000,000 a year, which the proposed increase would cost. He cautioned the House to beware of the principle it was about to establish.

Mr. EVANS adverted to the consistency of the opponents of this bill, who were now urging the employment and efficiency of the civil power alone; while, but a short time ago, when the frontier bill was under consideration, gentlemen opposed it because they said the President should use the military force. It was not designed, Mr. E. said, to supersede the civil power, but to protect and sustain it.

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont had intended to give a silent vote upon this bill; but after what had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GRENNELL] and the observations of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] he should do violence to his own feelings, and great injustice to his constituents, to remain longer silent. He was not going to Missouri nor Arkansas, nor was he about to make a tour along the Atlantic coast. He should confine himself to what concerned him and his constituents directly. He was from Vermont, a frontier State. He had the honor to represent a frontier district; that section which had been here reported as disturbed by faction. It was against his district that these charges had been made; it was against the institutions of his State that these accusations were directed; and if he did not repel them here in his place, he should be unworthy of representing freemen.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had said he wanted to increase the military force, and for what? For the purpose of having a military police on the Vermont frontier. Was not this the first time such doctrine had been raised in this hall? Mr. F. asked when was it, in the history of this Republican Government, that a standing army was asked for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the Union? Why yesterday it fell for the first time from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BRONSON,] and astonished indeed was Mr. F. to hear him proclaim it, and not less so to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GRENNELL] follow it up. This doctrine was not to be found in the Constitution: that provides directly for the "calling forth of the militia to execute the laws of the Union." It no where, even by implication, provides for calling the regular troops to the aid of the magistrate. He understood the gentleman distinctly to lay down the position, that it was necessary to raise two regiments for the purpose of establishing upon the Northern frontier a military police. As to New York and the Indian frontier he should say nothing; and he again asked when was this doctrine first advanced? Was not this a constitutional question? Was it not time to pause on a proposition to raise a standing army to supersede the present civil police of the country, and in its stead establish a military police. He regretted that the lateness of the hour, and the reasonable impatience of the committee, would not permit him to follow out the proposition into all its consequences.

We had been told that there was excitement along the northern border. Admitted. But what had occasioned it. Was not all peace and tranquillity until the barbarous attack upon the steamer Caroline, when British assassins, ay, assassins, like the stealthy Indian, shielded by darkness, invaded our territory, destroyed our property, murdered our defenceless and slumbering citizens, and then, for the purpose of obliterating their cowardly and murderous deed, set fire to the ill-fated boat, and sent her blazing over the cataract of Niagara? Was not this enough to arouse the citizens of the vicinity? But add to this the insults, contumely, and threats, with which the Government papers of Canada were loaded; add to this the honors heaped upon the gallant knight Sir Allen McNab, for this brave and heroic, and brilliant midnight piracy. And what could they expect? How did they know but their own houses would be the next point of attack, their families butchered, and property destroyed, by the same midnight gang of British heroes, who had gallantly boarded the Caroline, and taken a little boy prisoner? This it was that first aroused them, and they very naturally expected their Government to notice this outrage; and, in room of having your General sent there to disarm them, they expected him to redress their grievances. But they were disappointed; and then it was that the murmur of discontent was heard, not only in New York, but across Vermont. A warlike spirit prevailed, not for the purpose of disregarding the laws, but to redress the insults and aggressions to which they had been subjected. If the Government had seen fit to call upon them to guard and protect their frontier, they would cheerfully have obeyed the call, and not a word of complaint would have been heard from any one.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has questioned the patriotism of the citizens of Vermont. He said he did not know how our militia were organized, how disciplined, nor how far they might be relied upon. This comes with an ill grace from the gentleman from Massachusetts. He might have known our organization and discipline by simply consulting the history of the fields of Saratoga, Bennington, Plattsburg, Ticonderoga and Crown Point, and of the whole period of the late war. He would have learned there that two regiments of Vermont militia were raised, who served throughout the war. I can tell him still farther, that never yet did a British flag float over any section of Vermont, and return to its original abode. He would scorn to draw any invidious comparisons, but he would say he regretted the gentleman could not say as much for his own State.

The resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, and the military demonstrations at Castine, during the late war, have become portions the history, and will not soon be forgotten. When their country required their services, when have the Vermont militia refused them? No, sir: history has a bright page in which are recorded the deeds of the Green Mountain Boys.

One other point he would refer to, and he regretted that the advanced hour of the evening forbade his replying more fully than he should to the insinuations cast upon Vermont. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] had said that the grand jury, at their late session at Windsor, did not find indictments against Drs. Nelson and Coti and other of the Canadian refugees, and insinuated that they had been derelict in their duty. This was a grave charge, and should not be made here, in the face of the nation, without the most plenary and satisfactory proof of the fact? Did the gentleman inform us what was the testimony before that jury? Did he know himself? Does he mean to say they were guilty of perjury or corruption? Mr. F. could scarcely repress his indignation; but this he would say, that the institutions of his State were as respectable, and the people of Vermont bowed to them with as much deference, as the people of any other State; he would not say as the people of the State of Maine. If those persons were not indicted, was it not a fair presumption that the evidence before the jury was insufficient? The gentleman may have heard that it was sufficient; but let me tell him that, before he brings charges as serious as this, it was his duty to bring with them the facts upon which the charges were founded.

The gentleman had made much parade about the dinner given to Dr. Nelson at Montpelier; and what of it? Had not the citizens of Vermont, or any portion of them, a right to give a dinner to any stranger travelling through their State? Was the character of the State to be reproached and stigmatised because a stranger had been greeted with a public dinner? Was this treason? Were not similar dinners given elsewhere, without exciting the reproach of the Congress of the United States? Suppose Mr. WEBSTER or Mr. CLAY was travelling through Vermont, had not the citizens of Vermont a right to feast them, if they pleased? Was there any breach of the laws in this? Did it require the interposition of the civil arm to arrest it? Was a mere act of hospitality sufficient to justify a military police?

As to the toasts given on that occasion, had not those who gave the dinner a right to toast whom they pleased? And was this an evidence of a predisposition to violate the laws of their country? Mr. F. must say that he considered these aspersions unfounded, ungenerous and unjust. When had Vermont ever refused to do her duty? He would defy any gentleman to point to a single instance in which she had failed.

He had only risen to defend the character of his State against the aspersions so ungenerously cast upon it, and not for the purpose of making a speech. He had done.

Mr. BRONSON said that after what had fallen from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. FLETCHER,] he felt it due to himself to explain. He had been misunderstood entirely. Gentlemen had charged him with having advocated new and alarming propositions, of urging the necessity of keeping up an armed Government force to execute the civil laws at the point of the bayonet. Mr. B. had said no such thing—nothing like it. He had advocated a moderate increase of the army as necessary for the exigency of the times, and for the proper protection of the frontiers. As to the Northern or Canada frontier, he had insisted upon sending United States troops there, and of increasing the army by this bill, so as to enable the Secretary of War to place a proper force on that frontier. The citizens residing on that frontier, had of late called loudly for United States troops. The Governor of New York recommended it, and Mr. B. read an extract from the letter of the Governor to the Secretary of War, dated in his [Mr. B's] district on the 3d June instant, saying that the inhabitants there are very anxious, if possible, to have some regular troops stationed in that neighborhood; that they would have more reliance on that description of force, than on a detachment of militia residing along the lines.

Mr. B. said he had also received many letters from his own district, and from other parts of the frontier, to the same effect; but he had not said or intimated that the presence of United States troops was necessary, merely to enforce the execution of the laws, or that the courts of justice could not execute their duties without the aid of the bayonet. As to the courts or civil tribunals of Vermont, he left it to the gentleman from Vermont to defend them as he best might; but, Mr. B. said, he had yet to learn that the civil tribunals of New York had failed to do their duty. He knew of no instance in which grand juries had failed to indict upon proper testimony, or the courts to enforce the laws. When the New York courts or juries should fail in the discharge of their duties, it would be time enough then to raise the cry against them. He had no fears of any such event. But sir, said Mr. B. although courts and juries may punish offenders, they cannot prevent the commission of offences. A military force, properly stationed on the northern frontier, might do much to prevent the commission of such crimes as had recently been committed, to repress disturbances, and restore quiet, and, at the same time, to preserve our neutrality, and enforce a rigid observance of our treaty stipulations. For these reasons, as well as to afford adequate and proper protection to that frontier, Mr. B. said he had, and should continue, to urge the necessity of a regular military force upon the northern frontier.

Mr. HARRISON'S amendment was then rejected; and the question recurring upon the amendment of the committee,

Mr. H. moved to amend it so that the regiment therein provided for should be composed of riflemen: lost.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was then agreed to.

Some other amendments were then agreed to, all in reference to the details of the bill.

The following amendment was taken up:

That, from and after the passing of this act, all enlistments in the army of the United States shall be for five years, and that the monthly pay of non-commissioned officers and soldiers shall be as follows: to each sergeant major, quartermaster sergeant, and chief musician, seventeen dollars; to each first sergeant of a company, sixteen dollars; to all other sergeants, thirteen dollars; to each artificer, eleven dollars; to each corporal, nine dollars; and to each musician and private soldier, seven dollars.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend it by giving the soldiers twenty-five cents a day extra when at work on roads, &c.: lost.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to strike out "seven," and insert "eight," as the pay of the "musicians and private soldiers."

Mr. McKAY said the pay of the privates had been increased of late years from five to seven dollars.

Mr. CUSHMAN did not consider seven dollars to be enough.

Mr. C's amendment was agreed to, and the original amendment was agreed to, and the original amendment as amended also.

Some further amendments were acted on, when the committee rose for want of a quorum voting.

Mr. BRIGGS moved an adjournment: lost, 54 to 67; and a quorum being present, the House again went into committee.

The following proposed section was stricken out:

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to allow and pay to the district paymasters of the army, who have or may be employed in making payments to the militia and volunteers ordered into the service of the United States, a commission on the sums respectively paid by them, not exceeding one per cent. upon the amounts.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved the following amendment, submitted yesterday by Mr. WISE, but it was disagreed to.

Strike out sections 2d, 4th, 5th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 11th, and 13th.

Amendments to the Committee's amendments.

Strike out all after the words "extra pay" in 6th line of section 31.

Strike out section 35.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the Committee rose and reported the bill and amendments, mem. dis.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the bill as amended, was ordered to be printed.

TREASURY BUILDING.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message, received in the course of the day from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution passed by the House of Representatives, on the 23d instant, in respect to the new Treasury Building, I submit the enclosed report from the Commissioner, charged with a general superintendence of the work, and which, with the documents annexed, is believed to contain all the information desired.

JUNE 28, 1838. (Signed) M. VAN BUREN.

On motion of Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD, referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, covering a statement of the amount of public expenditures for the last year; which, on motion of Mr. BRIGGS, was laid on the table.

Mr. WORD, on leave, presented a petition; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion, at 9 o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,
THURSDAY, June 27, 1838.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented sundry tables connected with the bill reported by him the other day from the Committee on Finance to classify the clerks in the Executive Departments and Bureaus; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, Charles Gordon was authorized to make certain additions to the maps of the public lands.

The bill to divide the State of Delaware into two collection districts, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, the Senate resolved to insist in the non-concurrence with the amendments of the House to the bill making appropriations for certain roads in Wisconsin, and to ask the House to consent to a committee of conference on the subject.

On motion by Mr. NICHOLAS, the bill to authorize vessels bound to ports in Mexico, and turned off by the blockading squadron to enter and secure their cargoes was taken up, and considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, the bill supplementary to the act entitled an act to establish branches of the Mint of the United States, approved the 3d of March, 1835, was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate took up the joint resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee to take into consideration, and report at the next session of Congress, upon the expediency of requiring the commissioners for taking the next census to make detailed statements of the commerce, agriculture, and manufactures of the United States.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend it, by requiring the commissioners to include in their statements the quantity and value of stock in the United States.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was then laid on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred the joint resolution from the House of Representatives, authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain surveys to be made, reported the same with an amendment.

The resolution was then taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment being agreed to, it was ordered to a third reading.

On motion by Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate took up the bill introduced by him, making furt er provision for the collection of the public revenue, the question being on the amendment or substitute, offered by Mr. BUCHANAN,

Mr CLAY of Alabama offered an amendment to the amendment to prevent the banks from discounting upon, or otherwise us ng the money that may be placed with them upon special deposite, or otherwise using the same; which was agreed to.

Mr. CALHOUN rose, and addressed the Senate at length, in opposition to the amendment and the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN followed in reply, and the debate was further continued by Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, STRANGE, BUCHANAN, and CALHOUN, (to be given hereafter;) after which,

On motion by Mr. WEBSTER, the bill and amendments were laid on the table until to-morrow; and

The bill to purchase the right to use the vapor bath, invented by Dr. Boyd Reilly, in the army and navy of the United States, was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LINN explained the object of the bill, which was, that the Government should purchase the right to use this invention in the army and navy of the United States. The machine had been reported on favorably by all the medical men who had examined into its usefulness. It was, in his opinion, a very great desideratum to the army and navy, having proved so eminently useful in the removal of almost every species of cutaneous disease, rheumatism, &c. to which sailors and soldiers were subject. Mr. L. said he spoke of it as a medical man, and would pronounce it one of the very best machines in the land for the purpose for which it was intended. He desired that every man who so successfully added to the means of relieving the infirmities of humanity, should receive the patronage of the Government. He was well aware that the present embarrassed state of the Treasury might operate against the passage of the bill; but should a measure of such interest to the poor afflicted soldier and sailor be lost on that account? He trusted not. While up, he would state that this invention had received the sanction of almost every army and navy surgeon; had received the sanction of the Faculty at Paris, and of all the medical gentlemen who from time to time, had been honored with seats in the Senate.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and lost—yeas 15, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Fulton, Grundy, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Sevier, and Swift—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—20.

The bill to repeal in part the act entitled an act to provide for the safe keeping of the acts, records, and seal of the United States, and for other purposes, was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and After a brief explanation from Mr. GRUNDY, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain William Williams, late of the State of North Carolina, deceased, was taken up; and, after a debate, laid on the table.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Lieut. Col. John Cropper, was discussed at length by Messrs. WHITE, PRENTISS, ROANE, RIVES, HUBBARD, and PIERCE; and on the question of engrossment, the bill was rejected—yeas 11, nays 26.

On motion of Mr. TROTTER, the bill to establish a new land district in the State of Mississippi was taken up; and after being explained and advocated by Mr. T. was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business; after which,

It adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, June 29, 1838.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to continue in force all laws which will expire at the close of the present session, until the close of the first session of the next Congress; and that the committee give the titles of said laws which shall so expire.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia said it would be useless to refer the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary, as that committee had already as much business as they could attend to.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana moved to insert the "Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business," which Mr. JOHNSON accepting, the resolution, so modified, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, the resolution submitted by him some time since in relation to the public lands, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NAYLOR, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported a bill imposing a duty on starch.

Mr. HAMER, on leave, submitted the following resolution.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the payment of the certificates of deposite to the amount of seven hundred dollars, issued by the Treasury Department on the 8th of September, 1836, to Lewis S. Craig, and which have been issued by him to the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati.

Mr. H. stated that the certificates were not transferrable, except by authority of special legislation.

The resolution was then agreed to.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

On motion of Mr. BOULDIN, by general consent, the House took up sundry bills relating to the District of Columbia, as follows:

The bill to extend the charter of the Bank of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, and the same was ordered to a third reading, and then read a third time, and passed.

Also, the bill for the relief of the heirs of Lewis Grant Davidson, of Georgetown; which was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the erection of a court-house in Alexandria, was taken up, the amendments concurred in, and the bill, as amended, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

The bill making an appropriation for the support of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia, was also taken up, the amendment concurred in, and the bill passed.

The amendments to the bill to provide for the construction of a free bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, were severally concurred in, and the bill passed.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the bill establishing certain collection districts, and creating ports of entry therein.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to authorize the issuing of patents to certain reservations under the treaty between the United States and Creek Indians, of the 24th of March, 1832, and moved its third reading; which, after some remarks from Messrs. E. WHITTLESEY, EVERETT, CHAPMAN, and LEWIS, was agreed to, and the same was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved the House to take up the resolutions submitted by him on the 25th instant, calling for certain information in relation to the public lands, (as printed in the Globe of that night;) but it was objected to.

Mr. ADAMS again continued his remarks on the subject of Texas till the hour was expired.

Mr. SHIELDS asked the House to set apart to-morrow from half past four to the Tennessee land bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, objected, for the bill would occupy more time than the House could spare to it this session, for it proposed to relinquish the title to all the United States lands in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS stated that such was not the fact, and he moved a suspension of the rules, and called for the yeas and nays, but the House refusing, the question was taken by tellers, the rules suspended, 95 to 46, and the motion agreed to.

After some conversation as to the order of business, between Messrs. CAMBRELENG and E. WHITTLESEY, on motion of Mr. C. the House agreed to take up the army bill.

STEAM ACCIDENTS.

Mr. SERGEANT, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to collect and report to Congress, on the first day of the next session, all the information that can be obtained as to the use of steam engines in the United States, and the accidents and loss of life or property which has attended their use; and especially that he ascertain and report:

1. The whole number of steam engines in the United States, and by whom they were constructed, where they are used, how long they have been used, their capacity and power respectively, and the purposes or uses to which applied, and whether high or low pressure.

2. The explosions or other disasters which have happened to such engines, when and where, with as many of the circumstances attending the same as can be collected.

3. The causes, as far as they can be ascertained, of such explosions, or other disasters.

4. The loss of life or property, or injury to persons or property, which has ensued in each case, distinguishing the mode of injury, by burning, scalding, wounding, drowning, or otherwise.

5. The disasters to steamboats, when, where, and how they have occurred, by explosion, collision, fire, or otherwise; the size, capacity, or burthen of the boats; their age, and where and by whom built.

6. How such steamboats were manned, and whether intoxicating liquor was served out to, or permitted to be used by, the hands and persons employed on board the same.

7. The names of the owners and masters or commanders of the boats to which such disasters have happened, and of the officers and crews thereof.

8. In case of boats to which no disasters have happened, the burthen and size of the same; when, where, and by whom built; and the names of the owners and masters, or commanders and engineers.

9. Any such other information as may seem to him material.

Mr. DAVIS called up the amendment to the rules, submitted by him yesterday, to the effect that all bills passing one House and not acted upon in the other at the end of a session, should take their place on the calenders as if a mere adjournment only had taken place, after the first six days of the session. Mr. D. having made a verbal modification to the resolution, it was then agreed to.

Mr. CUSHMAN made an ineffectual attempt to report back the light-house bill.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, a committee of conference on the part of the House, in relation to the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill making appropriations for the construction of certain roads in Wisconsin, was appointed.

RELATONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. BIDDLE wished to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations as to the present posture of our relations with Mexico. An individual (Mr. John Baldwin) having one of the largest and most flagrant claims upon that Government, was a native of his district, and, after a residence of twenty years in Mexico, had been stripped of every thing, and had returned home in a state of destitution. The enormity of his case was established by authentic documents, as well as by the letters of Mr. Ellis. It would be recollected that the President, in accepting the overture as to an arbitrament, had stated that the action of Congress was not to be thereby suspended. Yet, practically, such seemed to be its effect. Mr. B. found no fault with this; but it was obvious that whilst matters remained in such a position, any quickening impulse to the negotiation must come from this House. He had understood that the time had more than passed within which a final and definite reply ought to have been received from Mexico. Under such circumstances, the claimants could not but feel the deepest uneasiness at the approaching rise of Congress. Mr. B. wished to learn on what grounds the committee forebore to act, more especially as the language of the President led the Mexican authorities to look with anxiety to nothing but a movement in Congress. After the adjournment, the arbitration might be suffered by Mexico to fall through, without any just complaint, on our part, of evasion or trifling, inasmuch as the President had expressly and anxiously reserved the right to act, as if no overture had been made.

Mr. HOWARD begged to settle a preliminary question with the gentleman from Pennsylvania before replying to the interrogatory. He wished to know whether it was put as a matter of right, or of courtesy.

Mr. BIDDLE said entirely of courtesy.

Mr. HOWARD said that he might have felt it to be a duty to resist a claim of right; but would answer the question with great pleasure as it now stood. The gentleman from Pennsylvania must be aware that the aspect of our relations with Mexico had been changed more than once since the commencement of the session. It was changed by the official communication of the decree of the Government of Mexico, upon the subject of an arbitration of the matters in dispute between the two nations, which decree was not before the President when he sent his opening message. It was changed again by a proposition founded upon that decree to appoint an arbiter, which had been accepted by the President. Now, although the gentleman from Pennsylvania was perfectly right in saying that the President had expressly refused to withdraw the subject from Congress, in whose charge he had placed it, yet it would occur to him, that if a convention were to be executed between the two Governments, appointing an arbiter, the question before Congress would be essentially varied. According to the best of his (Mr H's) information, the Mexican Minister was found not to be in possession of the necessary powers for the execution of such a convention, and was obliged to apply to his Government for additional powers. The answer of Mexico to this demand was not known to the Government of the United States. The Mexican Minister had not been in Washington during the whole winter, and it was time that we should know whether Mexico intended to proceed in this matter or not.

As far as his individual opinion went, he [Mr. H.] thought still as he had always thought since his attention had been directed to our relations with Mexico, that we should never have justice done to our Government or people, until we manifested a determination to enforce it; and we moreover thought that the recent movement by Mexico, was only intended to baffle the proceedings of Congress, by holding out a prospect of amicable settlement, which he feared would prove illusory. Of the opinion of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, he had no right to speak; but they would soon be obliged to consider the question, whether the continued delay of Mexico in clothing her Minister with the necessary power to execute a convention, ought or ought not to be considered as evidence of her indisposition to prosecute the arbitration.

Before the session of Congress terminated, he hoped the committee would express their opinion upon this point.

Mr. BIDDLE. Then we may anticipate a report from the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

The conversation then dropped.

ARMY BILL.

The House then took up the "bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes," reported last night from the Committee of the Whole, with amendments; and the question was on concurring therein.

The first amendment was the following substitute for the first section of the Senate's bill:

"That there shall be added to each of the four regiments of artillery, one company, to be organized in the same manner as authorized by existing laws, with the exceptions hereafter mentioned; that there be added to every company of artillery sixteen privates, and to every company of infantry one sergeant and thirty-eight privates, and that the number of second lieutenants of a company of artillery be reduced to one, and that this reduction be so made, in connection with the appointment of officers to the four additional companies authorized as aforesaid, and the transfer to the ordnance department hereafter directed, that all the present second lieutenants shall be retained in service; and there shall be raised and organized, under the direction of the President of the United States, one regiment of infantry, to be composed of the same number and rank of officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, composing the regiments of infantry now in the service of the United States, who shall receive the same pay and allowances, and be subject to the same rules and regulations which now apply to other regiments of infantry, as provided for in this act."

Mr. HARRISON moved to strike out the word "infantry," in the 32d line, and insert, in lieu thereof, the word "riflemen;" and warmly advocated that proposition.

After some discussion, in which Messrs. HAYNES, POPE, FILLMORE, GLASCOCK, THOMPSON, and COLES, participated, the amendment was disagreed to—ayes 56, noes not counted.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to strike out all after the word "service," in the 30th line.

Mr. MILLER, of Missouri, asked for the yeas and nays on this motion, which were ordered.

Mr. PETRIKIN gave the reasons which would induce him to vote for an increase of the musketry, on account of the apprehension of hostilities; but he should oppose both an augmentation of the number of officers and of their salaries, and if those propositions were engrafted on the bill, he should be compelled to vote against it altogether. Mr. P. said, in substance, that, representing, as he did, a constituency opposed to establishing a standing army in time of peace, it behooved him briefly to state the reasons for the votes he should give on the amendments offered to the bill then before the House. Although his constituents were opposed to a standing army in time of peace, they were always ready and willing to enable the Government to defend the distant and weaker parts of the frontier when threatened by hostile invasion, as was the case at present on the Western and Southwestern frontier of the States of Arkansas, Missouri, and Louisiana; but they were opposed to creating a large number of unnecessary officers, and they were opposed to raising the salaries of officers whose salaries were already quite large enough to pay them well for all the services they rendered to the country.

He would vote for the first section of the bill, filling up the skeleton of the present army, and also for the additional regiment proposed to be raised for the defence of the Northern frontier, believing that the present exigencies of the country required this addition to the regular army, and which added but a small number to the officers already in commission, under the present army establishment; but he should not vote for the amendments increasing the number of officers in the staff and other departments, nor would he vote to increase the salaries of officers who lounged about the cities, already enjoying very high salaries, much larger in proportion than those who did duty in the Army, and endured the hardships of field and fort. If those amendments should be adopted, he should be compelled to vote against the whole bill. At this late period of the session, time was precious, and he should close, having given all the views necessary to defend him from the charge of inconsistency in voting as he should do on this bill.

Mr. MASON of Ohio addressed the House at length in opposition to the bill, as unnecessary and uncalled for, since there were no real grounds of war; and if there were, our present force was ample to repress them at the outset, though he avowed himself desirous and willing to do all that was proper for the protection of the western frontier. The fault there, he contended, lay with our own people; and he went on to insist that the Indians were the oppressed party, etc.

Mr. CRARY could not admit the justice of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MASON,] so far as his constituents were concerned. He believed they had uniformly treaty the Indians with kindness, and not as fit subjects for examination, or even for abuse.

Mr. MERCER remarked that the whole question resolved itself into the mode in which the army should be increased; that is, whether they should merely increase the private soldiers without increasing the number of officers; and the latter he thought altogether unnecessary.

Mr. McKAY explained the apparent inconsistency that he should vote against an amendment which he had himself moved. He had submitted it under the instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, but in the committee he had voted against it, and so he should in the House; and had expected some member of the majority would have moved it. Mr. McK. however, cited the reasons of the Secretary of War, recommending the additional regiment, and admitted, himself, that, if authorized, it would not enlarge the army more, perhaps, than was necessary; though he was anxious to keep it within bounds.

Mr. MILLER then moved a call of the House, as the attendance was very thin, but it was ineffectual.

The question was then taken on Mr. BRIGGS's amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 88.

So the clause for the additional regiment of infantry was nonconcurred in by the House.

The question then recurring on the amendment as thus amended.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana asked for the yeas and nays thereon, but they were refused, and the amendment was agreed to without a division.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso from the second section, which was agreed to:

Provided, That no officer of the said corps shall be employed in any service for any State or company for which he shall receive any compensation, except his pay from the United States.

The amendment to the 7th section to strike out "four," and insert "two," Assistant Adjutants General was also concurred.

Some other verbal amendments were also concurred in.

The House took its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House convened again, according to order, at half past three o'clock, and resumed the consideration of the

ARMY BILL.

The question pending, being on an amendment to the thirteenth section, by a transfer of lieutenants instead of the appointment of new ones,

It was discussed for some time by Messrs. THOMPSON, YELL, McKAY, KEMBLE, ADAMS, UNDERWOOD, COLES, EVANS, GRENNELL, BIDDLE, RANDOLPH, and CALHOUN of Massachusetts, when it was verbally modified on motion of Mr. ADAMS, and then concurred in.

Some other amendments having been also concurred in, the House proceeded to consider the following substitute of the 16th section.

SEC. 16. That, from and after the passing of this act, all enlistments in the army of the United States shall be for five years, and that the monthly pay of non-commissioned officers and soldiers shall be as follows: to each sergeant major, quartermaster sergeant, and chief musician, seventeen dollars; to each first sergeant of a company, sixteen dollars, to all other sergeants, thirteen dollars; to each artificer, eleven dollars; to each corporal, nine dollars; and to each musician and private soldier, eight dollars.

The Committee on Military Affairs had recommended "seven dollars" as the pay of the "musician and private soldier," but it had been augmented to "eight" by the Committee of the Whole, on motion of Mr. CUSHMAN.

Mr. McKAY moved to restore it to "seven."

Mr. CUSHMAN advocated the larger sum, and it was retained by the House.

Mr. PETRIKIN renewed the following amendment to this section:

"And an additional allowance of twenty-five cents shall be paid to each private soldier, for each day he shall be employed in making military roads or building forts; a regular roll of such day's works hall be kept by the commanding officer of each company or detachment of men thus employed, which shall be attached to the general muster pay-roll."

Mr P. briefly advocated his amendment, and it was opposed by Mr. MERCER, when Mr. PETRIKIN modified it by substituting fifteen cents.

Mr. MASON of Ohio, in view of the increase of the soldier's pay to eight dollars a month, and of his other bounties, did not deem this amendment at all necessary.

After some further remarks from Messrs. KEMBLE, EVANS, and MERCER, the amendment was rejected.

Mr REED moved to include the "marines" in the increased pay of "eight" dollars a month.

Mr. COLES objected to it on the ground of incongruity, for they might then as well provide for the sailors.

The amendment was rejected without a division.

Mr. CHILDS moved that $2 a month of the soldier's pay be retained till he left the service; which was agreed to,

The clause, as amended, was then concurred in

Mr. EVERETT then moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had non-concurred in the substitute of the first section of the bill (see morning's proceedings.)

Mr. BRONSON and Mr. UNDERWOOD simultaneously asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 103, nays 81.

So the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. EVERETT then moved to reconsider the vote by which the following clause was striken from that substitute.

"And there shall be raised and organized, under the direction of the President of the United States, one regiment of infantry, to be composed of the same number and rank of officers, noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates, composing the regiments of infantry now in the service of the United States, who shall receive the same pay and allowances, and be subject to the same rules and regulations which now apply to other regiments of infantry, as provided for in this act."

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina moved a call of the House: lost.

Mr. W. then asked for the yeas and nays on Mr. EVERETT's motion which were ordered.

Mr. FILLMORE explained that he had voted for the reconsideration, but he should vote against the proposed substitute, if this clause should be engrafted upon it.

Mr. EWING stated that he had it from officers of the army, that no increase was at all needed, or asked for, except by those about the precincts of the White House.

The question was then taken, and the vote was reconsidered—yeas 100 nays 91, and the question recurred upon the motion originally prevailing to strike this clause from the section.

Mr. MERCER gave notice of an amendment he should move when in order, to reduce a regiment of cavalry to infantry.

After some remarks from Messrs. BRIGGS, MERCER, and REED against the proposed amendment, and by Messrs. EVANS and CUSHING, (both gentleman most warmly in favor of it,) and Mr. BRONSON, when

Mr BRIGGS called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and were—yeas 95, nays 104.

So the House refused to strike out the clause.

Mr. PETRIKIN then moved a proviso to the clause, that not more than one-half the commissioned officers should be appointed from the graduates at West Point: lost.

Amendments were also moved by Messrs. MERCER and EVANS, which were disagreed to.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana moved a proviso, that all the officers required for the additional regiment, above the rank of lieutenant, should be taken from those now attached to the army; and after some remarks from Messrs. GARLAND, UNDERWOOD, GLASCOCK, and McKAY,

Mr. G asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused; and the amendment was rejected—ayes 60, noes 89.

Mr. BOND moved an adjournment: lost.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended, was agreed to.

The following substitute for the 17th section was agreed to, without a division.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the fifth section of the aforesaid last mentioned act shall be, and the same hereby is, repealed; and that the premium to officers for enlisting recruits, and the bounty to recruits, shall hereafter be the same as before the passage of that act: but the payment of one-half the bounty shall be deferred until the recruit shall have joined the corps in which he is to serve.

The amendment to the 19th section, making it the duty of the chaplain to perform the duties of schoolmaster, was concurred in.

The following additional sections reported by the Committee of the Whole, were then taken up.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That hereafter the officers of the pay and medical departments of the army shall receive the pay and emoluments of officers of cavalry, of the same grades respectively, according to which they are now paid by existing laws.

After some conversation between Messrs. CARTER, THOMPSON, and McKAY. Mr. C. moved to reduce the pay, by striking out the words "of officers of cavalry, of the same grades respectively," and made some remarks in favor of his motion, and generally against any increase of staff pay.

Mr. MALLORY replied, and said the medical officers were the worst paid in the army.

The amendment was rejected, and the section concurred.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That when volunteers or militia are called into the service of the United States, so that the paymasters authorized by law shall not be deemed sufficient to enable them to pay the troops with proper punctuality, it shall be lawful for the President to appoint as many additional paymasters as he shall deem necessary, who shall perform the same duty, give the same bond, be subject to the same liability, and receive the same pay and emoluments, as are now provided for paymasters of the army: Provided, however, That the numberso appointed shall not exceed one for every two regiments of militia or volunteers: And provided, also, That the persons so appointed shall continue in service only so long as their services are required to pay militia and volunteers.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That the compensation hereafter to be allowed to such ordnance storekeepers as shall be designated as paymasters, shall not exceed the pay and emoluments of a captain of ordnance.

SEC. 29. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the engineer superintending the construction of a fortification, or engaged about the execution of any other public work, to disburse the moneys applicable to the same; and as a compensation therefor, may be allowed by the Secretary of War at the rate of two dollars per diem, during the continuance of such disbursements: Provided, That the whole amount of emolument shall not exceed one per cent. on the sum disbursed.

SEC. 30. And be it further enacted, That the term for which cadets hereafter admitted into the Military Academy at West Point shall engage to serve, be, and the same is hereby, increased to eight years, unless sooner discharged.

SEC. 31. And be it further enacted, That, in lieu of the bounty now provided by law for re-enlistment, every able-bodied non-commissioned officer, musician, or private soldier, who may re-enlist into his company or regiment within two months before or one month after the expiration of his term of service, shall receive three months' extra pay; and also, any non-commissioned officer or soldier who shall have served ten consecutive years and shall obtain from the commanding officer of his company, battalion, or regiment, a certificate that he had faithfully performed his duty whilst in service, shall be allowed one hundred and sixty acres of land, to be designated, surveyed, and laid off at the public expense, in such manner and upon such condition as may be provided by law."

Mr. MASON of Ohio moved to strike out all after the word "pay," in the fifth line of this section: lost.

Mr. CHILDS moved to strike out all the provision giving land, and insert in lieu, "one hundred dollars:" lost.

Mr. McKAY moved to amend the 6th line, by making it read officer or soldier "who shall serve," instead of "who shall have served;" which was agreed to.

Subsequently, Mr. KEMBLE moved a reconsideration of this amendment; but the House refused to assent to the motion.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to insert after the word "land," in the 9th line, the words "fit for cultivation," so as not, he said, to make it a mere mockery: lost.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio moved to add at the end of the section the words, "which land shall be patented to the soldier or his heirs," so as to exclude the assignees under the existing laws.

After some discussion between Messrs. WHITTLESEY, McKAY, POPE, and UNDERWOOD, this amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERCER moved a further addition: "and be not assignable till patented:" agreed to.

The section, as amended, was then agreed to.

SEC. 32. And be it further enacted, That so much of the eleventh section of the act of the sixteenth March, eighteen hundred and two, and so much of the fifth section of the act of the twelfth of April, eighteen hundred and eight, as fix the height of enlisted men at five feet six inches, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 33. And be it further enacted, That the officers of the army shall not be separated from their regiments and corps for employment on civil works of internal improvement, or be allowed to engage in the service of incorporated companies; and no officer of the line of the army shall hereafter be employed as acting paymaster or disbursing agent for the Indian department, if such extra employment require that he be separated from his regiment or company, or otherwise interfere with the performance of the military duties proper: Provided, That where officers of the army are now employed on civil works or in the Indian or pay departments as contemplated in this section, they may be continued therein one year, unless the convenience of the service will admit of their withdrawal sooner.

SEC. 34. And be it further enacted, That the superintendents of the armories of Springfield and Harper's ferry shall hereafter receive each the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, and rations, fuel, and quarters, as at present authorized; and that the master armorers of the same shall each receive the sum of twelve hundred dollars, and fuel and quarters as at present authorized; and that the aforesaid sums and allowances to the officers aforesaid shall be in full compensation for their services respectively.

SEC. 35. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint seven additional surgeons; and that the officers whose appointment is authorized in this section, shall receive the pay and allowances of officers of the same grades respectively.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to amend the last section, by limiting the period of the additional regiment authorized under the first section, to two years: lost.

Mr. THOMPSON then submitted an amendment to the 15th section, extending the principle of the rations to the officers of tee marine corps, as well as the army.

Mr. CRAIG then rose and said, that being persuaded the bill was in as good a shape as it could be made, he therefore demanded the previous question.

Mr. THOMPSON and Mr. RIVES made earnest appeals to Mr. C. to withdraw that motion, each stating they had important amendments to offer.

Mr. CRAIG withdrew the motion, and

Mr. BOON renewed it.

Mr. RENCHER moved an adjournment: lost.

Mr. HOFFMAN begged the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw the motion, to enable him to submit an additional section, of great importance to the service.

Mr. BOON did not withdraw the motion, and the House seconded it, being counted off by tellers—ayes 92, noes 61; and the main question having been ordered,

Mr. GRANT and Mr. MONTGOMERY simultaneously called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 107, nays 77, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Boon, Brodhead, Bronson, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Clark, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Cushing, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Evans, Farrington, Fairfield, Richard Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, Grant, Gray, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. So the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

On motion, at 9 o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 29, 1838.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making appropriations for sundry light-houses, buoys, etc.; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WRIGHT presented certain tables, showing the expenditures of the Government from its commencement to the year 1837; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed; and

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, two thousand extra copies were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which the subject was referred by a resolution of the Senate, reported a bill allowing compensation to certain agents and attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made under the several treaties with foreign powers: read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. KING, and by general consent, the bill was then read the second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. DAVIS presented several petitions against the admission of Texas; which were laid on the table.

Also, a petition praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia: question of reception laid on the table.

The following bills were severally read the third time, and passed:

The bill supplementary to the act entitled an act for the establishment of branches of the United States Mint, approved 3d March, 1835.

The bill to allow vessels bound to ports in Mexico, and ordered off by the blockading squadron, to enter and secure their cargoes.

The bill to repeal, in part, the act entitled an act to provide for the safe-keeping of the acts, records, and seal of the United States.

The bill to create an additional land district in Mississippi; and

The joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain surveys to be made.

The Senate took up the joint resolution from the other House, instituting a joint committee of inquiry as to the expediency of so taking the next census as to collect information in detail in regard to the agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, of the United States.

Mr. SEVIER said it was a very novel mode of proceeding, that of specifying the manner of taking the census so much in advance; he would, therefore, move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BENTON suggested to the Senator from Arkansas to vary his motion to one for an indefinite postponement. He had no objection to the principle contained in the resolution; but he objected to the appointment of a committee to sit during the recess to do that which could be done during the regular sessions.

Mr. SEVIER accordingly moved to postpone the resolution indefinitely; which motion was adopted.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Committee on the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of sundry citizens of Washington for the improvement of Pennsylvania avenue.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON, the bill for the relief of Gen. Roger Jones was taken up, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the further consideration of the bill introduced by Mr. WEBSTER making further provision for the collection of the public revenue. The question being on the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN,

Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate at length in favor of the bill, and against the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied at length in favor of his amendment; after which,

Mr. TALLMADGE made some observations in favor of the bill, and against the substitute.

Mr. STRANGE, after some remarks, offered several amendments, as follows:

1st. To strike out the word "not" in the first line of the second section, and the words "either" and "general" in the fourth line of same section, so as to allow the Treasurer of the United States to authorize the collectors and receivers to make special deposits of bank notes with the deposite banks for the term of sixty days, at the end of which they were to be converted into specie.

2. To strike out in the 14th and 15th line, 2d section, the words "and for the payment of which the holders thereof may elect to receive bank notes."

3. Requiring payments of the public creditors to be made by the officers of the Government, and not by banks.

On taking the question, Mr. STRANGE'S first amendment was rejected, yeas 21, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—21.

The second amendment was then decided in the negative, yeas 22, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wall, Webster, Wright, and Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, King, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, White, and Williams—24.

And the third amendment of Mr. STRANGE was also lost, yeas 19, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wall, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Brown, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Grundy, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White, Williams, and Young—29.

Mr STRANGE submitted a fourth amendment, but withdrew it on the decision of the first three.

Mr. NILES, after some remarks in favor of the substitute, offered an amendment, but withdrew it at the suggestion of Mr. BUCHANAN.

After some remarks by Mr. RIVES in favor of the bill and against the substitute, and a reply by Mr. BUCHANAN, the question was taken on Mr. BUCHANAN'S substitute, and it was adopted—yeas 26, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—26.

Mr. WRIGHT then gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill to modify the last clause of the fifth section of the deposite act of 1836.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, June 30, 1838.

Mr. ADAMS being entitled to the floor, on the Texas subject, yielded it for a moment to Mr. CUSHMAN, who asked leave to report the light-house bill from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana objected, unless all the committees could have a similar privilege.

Mr. HARLAN begged the gentleman to yield it for that purpose.

Mr. ADAMS would do so if it would not deprive him of his right to close.

The CHAIR said, under the rule, if the gentleman yielded, and the reports extended beyond the morning hour, it would be equal to an absolute relinquishment for the day.

Mr ADAMS then proceeded.

Mr. POTTER made an explanation of the action on the subject of Texas in the Pennsylvania Legislature, where it was indefinitely postponed. [This was similar to the course recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives, which Mr. ADAMS was reviewing.]

Mr. A. continued his remarks, and referred to the statements of two ladies of South Carolina on the subject of slavery in the South, and he appealed to the delegation from that State to affirm or disaffirm them.

Mr. PICKENS rose and explained that as the delegation from South Carolina had been specially appealed to, and for fear their silence might be construed into an assent to the truth of the statements referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, he would state that he had seen them, and a greater tissue of misrepresentation and prejudice, as related to the general operation of slavery in the South, had never been promulgated.

Mr. ADAMS proceeded still further on the subject of slavery, when

Mr. LEGARE raised the point of order, whether the discussion of this topic was pertinent to the question before the House.

Mr. ELMORE hoped his colleague would not press the point, but suffer the gentleman to go on with his insane ravings.

The CHAIR ruled the discussion in order, as showing the influence or effect of the annexation of Texas.

Mr. ADAMS then proceeded till the orders of the day were announced.

REGULATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. NOYES asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That, to the end of the present session, no member shall be allowed to speak more than fifteen minutes at one time, and not more than once to the same question, without leave of the House; and it shall be the duty of the Speaker of the House, and the chairman of the committee, to call the member to order who violates this rule.

Loud cries of "Agreed! agreed!" followed the reading of this resolution, with a few objections.

Mr. N. moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. LEGARE hoped the gentleman would except the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in replying to the extraordinary speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts. (A laugh.)

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, on so extraordinary a proposition, as he called it, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ELMORE moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which was agreed to.

SMALL NOTE RESTRICTION.

Mr. KILGORE moved to take up his resolution for a suspension of the five dollar restriction, stating that he had modified it so as to limit the period to the 4th of March next.

Objection being made, Mr. K. moved a suspension of the rules for one hour, and called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered—were 105, to 86.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. CUSHMAN made an ineffectual attempt to get a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of calling the committees for reports.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the information called for [by a resolution of Mr. UNDERWOOD,] in relation to the kind of funds furnished the pension agents of Arkansas.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, laid on the table.

The joint resolution of the House, amended by the Senate, authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain surveys to be made, was, on motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Sundry bills from the Senate on the SPEAKER'S table were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

MEXICAN BLOCKADE.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, the House passed through all its stages, the bill from the Senate to authorize vessels bound for ports in Mexico, and prevented from completing their voyages in consequence of the existing blockade of those ports, to enter and store their cargoes in ports of the United States.

ARMY BILL.

Mr McKAY moved the House to take up the Army bill, ordered to a third reading last night.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY would not consent to have all the private business sacrificed, and therefore he objected.

Mr. McKAY moved a suspension of the rules, which prevailed—111 to 48; and the bill was put on its passage.

A verbal amendment was made by general consent on motion of Mr. FILLMORE.

Mr. CARTER then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to strike out all the provisions proposing to increase the officers of the army, all the provisions going to increase the pay of those officers, and also that provision proposing to raise an additional regiment.

Mr. C. went into some statements, showing the enormous increase, in some instances amounting to as much as forty per cent. of the pay of the officers of the army in this bill, and that too in the most objectionable form, not by specific items, but in a general mode, and by extra rations, &c.

Mr. McKAY explained that the increase was not the work of the Military Committee of the House, but came down in the Senate's bill.

Mr. CARTER rejoined that the committee should have cut it down, and went on to demonstrate that, instead of augmenting the annual expenses of the Government a million and a half, as contemplated by the committee, it would amount to upwards of four millions. Mr. C. explained his position, that he was willing to vote for an increase of the rank and file, rather, however, in deference to the wishes of his frontier friends, than that he himself believed it either expedient, advisable, or called for.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio sustained most of the positions of Mr. C.; and referring to the language of the bill, expressed his conviction that, by the construction that would be put upon it, the officers would receive much more than the military committee contemplated. Moreover, it was made retrospective, instead of only prospective, the provision in relation to additional rations after certain terms of service, being in the past, as well as future tense.

Mr. HARRISON thought this bill had been discussed long enough; and therefore, he demanded the previous question.

Mr. MARTIN said, as the attendance was very thin, he would move a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in for some time, when, on motion of Mr YELL, it was dispensed with.

The House refused to second the demand for the previous question; only 41 voting for it.

Mr. GRENNELL did not believe that any such construction as that referred to by Mr. WHITTLESEY, would be put upon the ration clause, especially as it was contrary to the intent of every member of the committee; and he had no doubt of every member of the House too. Mr. G. then contended that the pay of the officers ought to be increased, for the existing rate was fixed some forty years ago, since which all the civil service had been augmented.

Mr. BOON had been as anxious as any one to have made a speech on this bill, but he had yielded his right to the entreaties of others, when in Committee of the Whole, and he now respectfully implored gentlemen to vote, and not keep back all the other important business at this late period of the session.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio suggested an amendment to meet his objection, so as to preclude the operation of the ration clause from being retrospective, but it requiring unanimous consent, and objection being made, it was not entertained.

Mr. McKAY earnestly appealed to the House to permit this amendment to be engrafted on the bill, but the objections were renewed.

Mr. RIVES then moved a further instruction to the Military Committee, authorizing the Secretary of War to allow, at his discretion, a commission to paymasters of the army, not exceeding one per cent. on all disbursements made by them, agreeably to the provisions of the act of '32.

Mr. CUSHMAN said he would make a motion which he thought would meet the unanimous assent of the House. It was to strike out the 15th section of the bill.

Mr. MERCER, however, objected.

Mr. RIVES, Mr. SIBLEY, and Mr. HOFFMAN, spoke warmly in favor of the amendment of Mr. R.

Mr. PARMENTER moved a proviso to the amendment that the commission should not exceed $1,000 in any one year, and went on to say that, as a general rule, this would be an ample, and even a liberal, allowance.

This amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RENCHER moved further to instruct the committee to strike out the 19th section, [that relating to the chaplain,] on the ground, as stated by him, that it introduced a new principle into this Government, viz: a connection between Government and the clergy. Having increased the pay both of the officers and privates, they had better be left to the selection of the regiments themselves. The converse practice had been wisely abolished by the British Government, and a radical improvement had been proved to be the result; in proof of which Mr. R. cited some British reports on the subject.

Mr. BOON said he was favorably inclined to the gentleman's object, and he would suggest to him the propriety, if his object was to complete the separation of Church and State, to commence with the body of which they were members.

Mr. McKAY suggested that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Whole, where, if the House desired, it might be amended in five minutes.

The CHAIR remarked that the pending amendment must first be disposed of.

Mr. RENCHER inquired of the chairman of the Military Committee, if he could inform the House what expense this clergy clause would involve.

Mr. McKAY understood about seventy chaplains at a thousand dollars each, say from sixty-nine to seventy-one thousand dollars a year.

Mr. BRONSON said, to put an end to the embarrassment, he would move to reconsider the vote by which the bill had been ordered to a third reading.

Several other suggestions were made by Messrs. RANDOLPH, YELL, NAYLOR, WHITE of Indiana, POPE, and THOMPSON; when, without taking any question,

The time having arrived,

The House took its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

DUTIES ON STEAMBOAT IRON.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, in pursuance of the special order, (Mr. OWENS in the Chair,) and took up Senate bills 175, 147, 237, and 238, and House bills 832 and 854, being bills remitting duties on iron imported for the construction of steamboats by certain corporations and individuals.

They were all reported to the House without amendment, excepting 854, to remit certain duties upon iron imported for the construction of iron steamboats.

The Senate bill 147, to authorize Day and Butts to import iron steamboats, being taken up, as reported,

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to lay the same on the table.

Mr. LYON of Alabama begged that the motion might be withdrawn for one moment, as he wished to make an explanation in regard to an amendment offered at his instance by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. The motion being withdrawn, Mr. LYON expressed a hope that the bill would not be opposed. He said that Capt. Fry of Mobile, a most enterprising and useful man, and one who had had much experience in steam navigation, proposed to attempt the navigation of the rivers in Alabama with an iron steamboat. He was disposed to make the experiment at his own risk and expense, and had only asked the Government to remit the duties on its importation. The attempt was one in which the country was much interested. He believed the object of Capt. Fry was to test the utility of iron steamboats for summer navigation in the Southern waters. It was well known to every gentleman acquainted with the Southern rivers that, in the summer, they were generally low, and difficult of navigation by ordinary steamboats. Accidents had often occurred, during low stages of the water, from snags and other impediments, to which iron steamboats would not be liable. Iron steamboats were understood to be of less draught of water than such as we now had in use; and, if they could be successfully used, he had no doubt their introduction would be of very great benefit to the country. The speedy transportion of the mail might be insured if such boats were employed as could safely navigate Southern rivers at low stages of the water. He said Congress had remitted the duties on railroad iron, and he was surprised that an objection should be raised to remitting the duties on an iron steamboat. He recollected to have noticed that the British Government had promised much more ample aid to the company formed to navigate the Atlantic by steam-ships than was asked by Captain Fry and others, who proposed to import each an iron steamboat. The Atlantic Steam Navigation Company had, he believed, a guaranty from their Government that their experiment should not involve them in expense or loss. In the cases before the House, no aid or guaranty as to loss is asked of the Government, although the experiment is one which, if successful, will be of much benefit to the country, and perhaps save the loss of much property. It was simply asked that the duties on the importation of the boats, and such implements as might be necessary to keep them in repair, should be remitted; and he repeated the hope that all opposition to the bill might be withdrawn.

Mr. L. then renewed the motion to lay on the table, and

The yeas and nays being ordered, this motion prevailed by the following vote: Yeas 82, nays 58.

The hour for which this subject had been made the special order being expired, and another special order having been called for—

Mr. ADAMS moved to suspend the rules for another hour; which motion was lost.

TENNESSEE LAND BILL.

The House then, according to the order, went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same," passed the 18th April, 1806.

Mr. SHIELDS moved that the bill be reported to the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina hoped not, without discussion.

Mr. SHIELDS said that the bill had been a good while before the House. Several committees had reported in favor of it; and he believed the House had become perfectly well acquainted with its merits. Still, if necessary, he would be perfectly free to meet any objections which might be brought against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina objected, at some length, to the bill, as conveying a mere naked gift to Tennessee, there being no obligation upon the Government to make the required cession.

Mr. BELL made some statements to show that the United States were indebted to the State of Tennessee more than a million of dollars for satisfying land warrants, &c.

Mr. WILLIAMS said there were no such claims in the compact between Tennessee and the United States.

Mr. BELL said, "Not in the bond?"

Mr. WILLIAMS went on: He did not mean to use the argument of Shylock. He was opposed, in principle, to the bill, and should oppose it, as being unjust and inexpedient.

Mr. CONNOR said a few words on the same side with his colleague, and in reply to the argument of Mr. BELL, as to the indebtedness of the United States to Tennessee. He offered the following proviso, which was subsequently withdrawn:

"Provided, That the State of Tennessee shall adopt and settle any claim or claims for military services that may be due to the citizens of North Carolina.

Mr. SHIELDS went into a general defence of the bill, against the objections of Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS followed on the same side.

Mr. MONTGOMERY was opposed to the bill, and

Mr. CROCKETT supported it.

And the debate was continued by Messrs. CARTER, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, TILLINGHAST, (who was of opinion that the land in question, if ceded at all, ought to be returned back again as of no value, but not as a gift,) and RENCHER.

Mr. YELL warmly advocated the bill as an act of but sheer justice to the State of Tennessee, though, he said, the lands were worthless, and a whole county of them not worth a good section in Arkansas.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill: lost.

Mr. McKENNAN moved that the committee rise, and report the bill; which motion prevailed.

The bill having been reported to the House, and the question recurring upon its engrossment,

Mr. CHAS. SHEPARD, of North Carolina, made some remarks against the bill.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS demanded the previous question; but withdrew it by request of several members.

Mr. STANLY moved to lay the bill on the table: lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved a call of the House: lost.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Tennessee, made some remarks in support of the bill, and in reply to Mr. SHEPARD.

Mr. YELL moved the previous question.

Mr. DAWSON moved that the House adjourn: ayes 58, noes 79.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

On ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time,

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the motion for the engrossment and third reading was rejected by a vote of 51 yeas to 91 nays.

Mr. MARTIN of Alabama gave notice that, on Monday next, he should move a reconsideration of that vote.

On motion of Mr. GRIFFIN, at 7 o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, June 30, 1838.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the petition of Mr. Origen Bachelor, asking that the good offices of the United States might be interposed to settle the affairs of Mexico and France; referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, from an individual, in relation to a confirmation of a land warrant; referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a remonstrance of the Navy Yard Bridge company against the establishing of a free bridge over the Eastern Branch.

Bill for the relief of Levi M. Roberts.

Bill for the relief of Elijah Blodget.

Mr. PIERCE also asked to be discharged from the bill for the relief of Eleanor Clark, as her case is provided for by general act, already reported.

Mr. STRANGE asked, and obtained leave, by general consent, to introduce a bill for the relief of the widow of John A. Cameron.

Mr. S. explained, at some length, the history of the melancholy bereavement of the widow whose husband was lost in the Pulaski steamboat. It appeared he was a judge of the United States Court in Florida; and on that ground, Mr. S. had been urged by her friends to introduce the bill allowing her half-pay of her late husband's salary.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he felt, as much as any man could do, for the unfortunate event, but was unwilling to sanction, by his vote, such a departure from established principles; and he must, therefore, ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. STRANGE pointed to the case of the widow of the late General Brown, and read a portion of the act showing that it was the same in principle.

Mr. CLAY said we might have military pensioners, but no civil ones.

The yeas and nays were then taken, when there appeared —for the bill 2; against it 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Preston and Strange—2.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—32.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama introduced a bill for the removal of the pension agency to Huntsville; which, by general consent, was read twice, and ordered to its third reading.

Mr. WRIGHT asked leave, agreeably to notice, to introduce a bill to modify the last clause of the fifth section of the deposite act of 1836, which prohibits the reception, by the Government, of the notes of such banks as may have issued notes of less denomination than 35.

On this subject Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate at some length, and was replied to by Mr. WRIGHT; after which the bill was introduced.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved to amend the bill, by inserting the following clause as a second section:

"That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury hereafter to select and employ, as depositaries of the public money, according to the provisions of said act, any bank which shall redeem its notes and bills on demand in specie, notwithstanding it may have, since the 4th of July, 1836, issued or paid out notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars; provided, however, that this provision shall not extend to any bank which shall issue or pay out any note or bill of less denomination than five dollars, after the time mentioned in the last clause of the preceding section of this act."

Mr. STRANGE spoke at length in opposition to the amendment, and Messrs. RIVES, TALLMADGE, and CLAY of Kentucky, in favor of it; when

Mr. WRIGHT moved to amend the amendment by inserting the following:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the first twelve sections of the act entitled an act to regulate the deposites of the public money, approved on the 23d day of June, 1836, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, except so far as is provided, and to enable the Treasury Department to collect any debts which may be due or owing from the late deposite banks."

On this question a long and animated debate ensued, the amendment being sustained by Messrs. WRIGHT, NILES, STRANGE, and others, and warmly opposed by Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, RIVES, TALLMADGE, and others.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. WRIGHT by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—21.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT rose and said: The Senate having fixed the day of adjournment for Monday week, he felt it his duty to inform them that he should not again occupy the chair for the remainder of the session. He should retire for the purpose of enabling the Senate to elect, according to custom, a temporary presiding officer. It had been his object, he said, during this long and arduous session, to discharge the duties of his station with perfect fidelity and impartiality; and if in that object he had not been successful, he felt that no reflection would be made against him by any member of the body. He could not take his leave of the Senate without saying that he felt the highest obligations to the members of the body for the kindness, constant generosity, and indulgence which had been extended to him while in the performance of his duties. He hoped it would not be improper for him, at this period of the session, to retire from the duties of his station.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, July 2, 1838.

TENNESSEE LAND BILL.

Mr. MARTIN submitted the motion, of which he had given notice on Saturday evening, to reconsider the vote of the House rejecting the Tennessee land bill.

Mr. M. moved its present consideration.

Mr. ADAMS said he should move to lay it on the table.

Mr. SHIELDS had no desire to press its consideration now, but let it take its place on the calendar.

The motion was accordingly ordered to be entered on the journal.

This being petition day,

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY suggested that the call of the States be omitted, and that the members having petitions lay them on the Clerk's table.

Mr. LEGARE wished to have an opportunity of presenting a memorial from citizens of Charleston, in relation to the late calamitous conflagration there.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he must object to Mr. WHITTLESEY'S motion, as petitions might then go on the journal which the House might have refused to receive.

Mr. BOON moved a suspension of the rule, which was agreed to, and an order pursuant thereto adopted.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then remarked, that it must be obvious to every one, that unless the committees could report every morning, it would be very detrimental to the business of the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to provide for the investment of money received under the will of the late James Smithson, of London.

Mr. C. also reported a bill providing for the payment of the salaries and compensation of the officers of the customs, and making additional appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1838.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill to authorize the accounting officers to settle certain claims, arising under the military operations in Georgia, Alabama, &c.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the light-house bill

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, the bill to establish a port of entry at Indian Key, in Florida, was recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOULDIN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a resolution in favor of removing the market-house at the east of the Capitol; which was concurred in.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to incorporate the Navy Yard Beneficial Society.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committeee on Revoltionary Claims, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Sarah Angel, and the other heirs at law of Benjamin King, deceased.

Mr. J. L WILLIAMS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the representatives of Ann Lenacher de Van Brun.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the same committee, reported against the petition of the Wyeming claimants.

Mr. HARPER, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions: R. Paulett, the heirs of John Stephenson, Elizabeth Weitzell, Philip Van Rensellaer, Samuel A. Barker, John Green, John Tubbs, Margaret Willis, heirs of Thomas West, of James Piper, Daniel Redfield, R. P. Waller, John Haughy, and Margaret Price; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported Senate bill for the relief of Col. Charles Morgan, with a recommendation that it do not pass; and, on Mr. H's motion, the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. H. from the same committee, reported Senate bill for the relief of Gurdon S. Hubbard, asssignee of Jacques and Louis Veaux, and the bill to settle contested claims that have arisen under the pre-emption law, with a recommendation that they do not pass, which two bills were committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Juan Belgar.

Also, with amendments, Senate bill to transfer to the citizens of the parish of Concordia, in the State of Louisiana, the interest of the United States to a certain tract of land.

Mr. DEBERRY, from the Committee on Agriculture, report d the following resolution, which was non-concurred in:

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate, No. 241, to encourage the introduction and promote the cultivation of tropical plants in the United States, and the bill No. 663, in addition to the act to promote the progress of the useful arts and for other purposes, and the joint resolution to authorize the leasing of a part of the public lands for the cultivation of the mulberry and the sugar beet, reported by the Committee on Agriculture, be made the special order of this House for one hour on Wednesday next, from half past 3 o'clock, p. m.

Mr. E. also reported a bill to repeal a part of the second section of the act to provide for the organization of the Department of Indian Affairs, (abolishing the office of a resident Superintendent at St. Louis,) and it was ordered to a third reading to-day.

At a subsequent period of the day, this bill was passed.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the settlement of the claim of the State of New York for the services of her volunteers and militia in 1837, and the same was ordered to a third reading to-day, and, at a subsequent period, read a third time, and passed.

MR. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Sarah Lamb, widow of the late Joshua Lamb, of the Revolutionary army.

Mr. M. also reported, without amendment, Senate bill granting a pension to L. White.

Mr. EWING, reported a resolution to make three pension bills the special order for a future day, which was rejected very few members rising in its favor.

MR MALLORY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions reported, without amendment,

An act for the relief of John M'Cloud

An act for granting a pension to Jonathan Crow.

Mr. STANLY, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of George Cassedy.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported the following resolution, which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the report recently made by Major Turnbull on the operations upon the Potomac aqueduct, and the explanatory drawings accompanying the same, be printed, under the direction of the Chief of the Corps of Topographical Engineers; and that one hundred extra copies thereof be printed and placed at his disposal for the use of that corps.

Mr. HEROD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, asked to be discharged from the cases of Hugh McDonald, Peter Amblar, and Lambert L. Van Valkenburg.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the new arrangement of the hall, ordered by the House, the members of the House shall be entitled, as far as may be, during the present Congress, to the same relative positions to the Chair which they now occupy, and that the Clerk designate the seats accordingly.

Mr. EVERETT moved to amend, by providing that the seats should be selected by lot.

After some remarks from Messrs. MERCER, CRAIG, L. WILLIAMS, and TALIAFERRO,

Mr. HARLAN moved to lay the resolution on the table, which was not agreed to—ayes 77, noes 82.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the previous question, which prevailed, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SOUTHGATE, from the select committee, to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Col. Daniel Boon, deceased.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the select committee on the subject of a revision of the naturalization laws, and the introduction of foreign paupers, reported two bills on those subjects.

The first bill was on the introduction of paupers.

Mr. BEATTY, for reasons stated by him, asked for time to submit a counter report, in response to the monstrous doctrines which, he said, were contained in the report. They were the doctrines of '98 revived in full force. He stated that the gentleman from New York had had the whole session to prepare his report, and had only presented it now on the eve of the session.

After some remarks from Messrs. HAMER, GARLAND, RHETT, (who dissented from the views of the majority,) LINCOLN, (who assented to them,) REED, HOFFMAN, and RUSSELL.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved the previous question; which prevailing, the bill was committed.

The bill to amend the naturalization laws, was then read twice, and committed.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported Senate bill, without amendment, to grant to Cherokee county, Alabama, the tract of land on which the seat of justice is located; and, on Mr. C's motion, it was put on its passage, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. TOUCEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Abijah Wool.

Mr. BOON said he would submit a motion that would save one day of the present session. He moved to suspend the rules for the remainder of the session, setting apart the morning hour for the consideration of reports and resolutions.

The motion was not agreed to—ayes 101, noes 54; not being two-thirds.

ARMY BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the Army bill, under the motion to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to a third reading.

After some remarks by Messrs THOMPSON, MERCER, JOHNSON of Louisiana, MASON of Ohio, and McKAY—

Mr. GRANT said, that believing no good could possibly arise from the further discussion of this bill, and as it was keeping back all the other public business, he demanded the previous question on the motion to reconsider; which was seconded—ayes 100, noes not counted; and the main question being ordered thereon,

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana asked for the yeas and nays, which, being ordered, were—yeas 94, nays 95.

So the House refused to r consider.

[Before the decision was announced, Mr. EWING asked leave to record his vote, stating that he was in the post office when his name was called. The request was received with a burst of laughter, and unanimously refused.]

The question then recurring upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRONSON moved the previous question, which was seconded, 88 to 51.

Mr. RENCHER called for the yeas and nays upon ordering the main question to be put; which, being ordered, were—yeas 101, nays 76.

Mr. CARTER asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, which were ordered, and were—yeas 112, nays 80.

So the bill was passed.

The title of the bill was as follows: "an act to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana moved to amend the title by adding, after the word States, the following: "the pay of the officers and privates, the patronage of the Executive," and asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GLASCOCK demanded the previous question, which prevailed, and the original title was agreed to.

The bill to confirm certain entries of land in Arkansas, permitted to be entered under the belief that they had been offered for sale, was read a third time, and passed.

HARBOR BILL.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Union, Mr. MASON of Virginia in the Chair.

Mr. S. moved to take up the harbor bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to take up the bill to extend the pension system.

The first motion prevailing, the House accordingly took up the "bill to provide for certain harbors, and for the removal of obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, during the year 1838."

The bill having been read through by the Clerk, was taken up by sections.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana moved an amendment to the item for the harbor at Michigan City, Indiana, merely as a modification of the plan laid down in the bill.

Mr. MERCER objected to it.

MR. SERGEANT joined in the objection on the ground of its incongruity, and an innovation in this bill.

MR. WHITE rejoined, but the time having arrived the House took its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House met at the appointed time of half past 3 o'clock, and went again into Committee of the Whole, Mr. MASON of Virginia in the Chair, the subject under consideration being the

HARBOR BILL.

The following amendment was moved by Mr. WHITE of Indiana to the item for Michigan City, and rejected:

Insert the following: "So much of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors therein mentioned, for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and for other purposes,' approved July 4, 1836, as prescribes the plan of said harbor, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the plan of the same shall be determined by the Secretary of War."

Mr. CRARY proposed to increase the appropriation for River Raisin harbor to $31,450, and assigned his reasons therefor.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LYON of Alabama submitted the following:

For continuing the improvement at Dog river bar and Choctaw pass, in Mobile harbor, $50,000.

Mr. L. explained at length the nature of the improvement, the amount heretofore appropriated for the work, its present state, &c. and urged that, unless a further sum was appropriated this session, the work would have to be discontinued before the next session. He called for the reading of the report from the Engineer Department, upon which the improvement was authorized to be made; and for the reading of the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Mobile, setting forth the necessity and importance of the improvement proposed to be made in the navigation of the bay of Mobile, by deepening the channel across Dog river bar and at Choctaw pass. He commented, also, upon what he supposed to be the causes why the Committee of Ways and Means had omitted to recommend an appropriation for continuing the work now in progress in the harbor of Mobile, and called upon the chairman of the committee to state whether he had assigned the true cause.

He also appealed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT,] having the present charge of the bill, to say whether the documents submitted by him to the House did not authorize the appropriation he had asked. He accounted for the fact that the committee had lost sight of the improvement in the bay of Mobile, by reminding the House that Mr. McKIM had charge of the Harbor bill, and he had brought the subject to his notice, and supposed it would have received attention but for his death.

He urged the House to decide his amendment upon its merits, and not to reject it because the case had escaped the notice of the committee, and said it had not decided against it.

The question being taken on the adoption of the amendment, it was decided in the affirmative.

This amendment was debated at much length, opening the general merits of the bill, by Messrs. LYON, CAMBRELENG, ADAMS, FOSTER, SERGEANT, GRENNELL, MERCER CUSHMAN, PHILLIPS, SIBLEY, and E. WHITTLESEY.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved an item of $20,000 for the improvement of the Cumberland river above Nashville,

Mr. BOON, moved to amend the amendment by appropriating $20,000, for the improvement of the Wabash, from its juncture with the Ohio to Delphi.

Mr. B. briefly addressed the committee, in an earnest support of his amendment, and drew their attention to the fact that it had twice received the sanction of both branches of Congress, and had only failed for want of the approval of the Executive. The Wabash was becoming one of the most important rivers of the West, winding through one of the most fertile valleys on this continent, and its commerce was daily increasing.

The amendment was disagreed to, and Mr. WILLIAMS'S agreed to—66 to 62.

Mr. MARTIN moved an item of $56,700, for completing the canal round the Muscle shoals; and, after some remarks from Mr. M. and Mr. DAWSON,

Mr. GRAVES moved to amend, by appropriating the Government stock in the Louisville and Portland canal to purchase out the private stockholders, and making that passage free of toll; which, after some remarks by Mr G. Messrs. MARTIN, SERGEANT, CUSHMAN, EVANS, BELL, GARLAND of Louisiana, and POPE; when

Mr. MALLORY moved that the committee rise; but no quorum voting, the committee rose in consequence thereof.

Mr. MALLORY moved an adjournment.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY asked for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 61, nays 77.

So the House refused to adjourn, and a quorum being present, the House went again into committee.

The amendment was further discussed by Messrs. GRAVES, BIDDLE, POPE, GRAHAM of Indiana, and CUSHMAN, when it was rejected without a division.

Mr. GRAHAM of Indiana moved an amendment, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase out the stock of the Jefferson and New Albany Canal, on equitable conditions: lost.

Mr. MARTIN'S amendment was also disagreed to.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Connecticut moved an item of $10,000 for completing the harbor at Bridgeport, Connecticut: lost.

Mr. McKENNAN moved the usual annual sum of $20,000 (afterwerds varied to $30,000) for expenses incident to making examinations, surveys, &c.: lost.

Mr. GOODE submitted a proposition of $15,000 for the improvement of the Maumee river, and $10,000 for Manhattan harbor: lost.

Mr. BIDDLE moved the amendments which had been reported by the Committee on Roads and Canals to the New Harbor bill: lost.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved an item of $5000, for completing the navigation in Cocheco river, New Hampshire: lost.

Mr. HUNTER of Ohio moved to increase the item for the improvement of Huron river, Ohio, from $5000 to $10,000: lost.

Mr. JENIFER moved an item for removing the wreck sunk in the harbor of Alexandria, District of Columbia, $3000: lost

Mr. ROBERTSON, for improving the harbor of Richmond, Virginia, $63,200.

Mr. MALLORY, for the navigation of the Dismal Swamp Canal, $29,000: lost.

Mr. FILLMORE, to increase the item for Buffalo harbor, from $20 500 to $68,000: lost.

Mr. EVANS moved to strike out the clause appropriating $8,000 for continuing the pier at Kennebunk, Maine; which was agreed to.

Mr. WISE moved $100,000 for clearing and improving the creeks, &c. of Chesapeake Bay: lost.

Mr. HARRISON moved to increase the item for the improvement of the Mississippi river, above the mouth of the Ohio, and of Missouri river, $20,000 to $30,000: lost.

Mr. H. also moved $15,000 for removing the sand bar at St. Louis. lost.

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS offered the following amendment, which was disagreed to:

To improve that portion of the Tennessee and Holston rivers, which was surveyed by Col. S. H. Long of the United States Topographical Corps, in the year 1832, and for the completion of the improvements already begun, under said survey $50,000.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved an additional section, providing that no part of the appropriations made in this bill shall be paid, until the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that the ordinary appropriations for the support of Government for the present year, will not be embarrassed thereby.

Mr. M. said he hoped that if this bill did pass, it should be as unexceptionable as possible: and surely gentlemen in the Opposition, who were daily charging loudly about the bankruptcy of the Administration, would not vote to appropriate $2,000,000 in this bill for harbors, "in addition to $3,600,000 that had been appropriated in the last four years, making $5,600,000;" when they, by their loud declarations, have declared that the Government is bankrupt, and cannot carry on its ordinary operations for want of money, without borrowing by the issue of Treasury notes. Surely those gentlemen who proclaimed the Government bankrupt, and still refused to vote the issue of Treasury notes to pay the ordinary expenses, would not now vote two millions of dollars for extraordinary expenses. Will gentlemen vote millions to be paid for extraordinary expenses, and refuse one dollar for even ordinary expenses? Do they not know that this money cannot be paid?

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ELMORE moved an item for closing the passage of Hog Island, and preserving Sullivan's Island, $100,000: lost.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the committee rose and reported the bill and amendments.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, at quarter before 11 o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, July 2, 1838.

The SECRETARY of the Senate having asked if it was the pleasure of the Senate to ballot for a president pro. tem.; the Senate accordingly proceeded to ballot, when there appeared for Mr. KING, 37 votes. Having been declared duly elected, Mr. KING was escorted to the chair by Mr. KNIGHT, from whence he returned his thanks in a neat and appropriate manner for the additional mark of respect and confidence extended to him, and announced his determination to discharge the duties to the best of his ability.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, the usual messages were sent to the President of the United States and the House of Representatives, informing them that the Senate had, in the absence of the Vice-President, elected the honorable WILLIAM R. KING of Alabama its president pro. tem.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial of H. R. Pinckney, mayor of Charleston, praying legislative measures to ensure the safety of passengers in steamboats: ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Ezra Chapman, Sydney Forrow, and James Barcroft.

Mr. P. from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the following House bills:

Bill for the relief of Stephen Appleby.

Bill for the relief of Matthew Wiley.

Bill for the relief of Sylvester Nash.

Bill for the relief of Levi Colmus.

Bill for the relief of Simeon Knight.

Bill for the relief of William Sloan.

Mr. WEBSTER, on leave, introduced a bill making further provision for the discharge of debenture bonds in certain cases; which was read twice, and, after a debate, in which Messrs. WEBSTER, BUCHANAN, and WRIGHT took part, it was laid on the table.

The following bills from the House, were severally read twice, and referred:

The bill to provide a free bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac.

The bill for the relief of the widow and heirs at law of the late Lewis Grant Davidson, deceased.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia.

The bill for the erection of a court house in Alexandria, in the District of Columbia.

The bill to modify the last clause of the fifth section of the act to regulate the deposites of the public money, was taken up on its third reading; when

Mr. WEBSTER said, there is no time to discuss this measure further—at least, I do not feel called upon to pursue the discussion further—but I will ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments, while I explain what the state of things will be, according to my understanding, if this bill shall become a law.

First, then, after the first day of October next, no bank bill, great or small, can be received at the post office, or the land office, or the custom-house, if the bank which issued it issues bills less than five dollars

This will necessarily exclude the paper of nearly all the banks in the Northern and Eastern States, and several others. All this has been already repeatedly shown.

In the second place, no bill of any bank can be received at the post office, the land office, or the custom-house, which bill is of a less denomination than twenty dollars. This is prescribed by the last Treasury circular. Now, sir, what is the plain consequence of this? How are postages, or small postage accounts, to be paid in twenty dollar bills? How are postmasters to pay back the change? If the deputy post officers in the country obey this circular, it will be the occasion of perpetual embarrassment to themselves and to the public.

I have supposed, also, that this would be found very inconvenient in the operations at the land offices. If I have been rightly informed, it is not, in some of the new States, always easy to obtain bills of a denomination of twenty dollars, or upwards. And I have supposed, especially, that the poor people who purchase forty-acre tracts would be put to considerable inconvenience. In the bill which I introduced into the Senate a section was contained remedying this inconvenience, and allowing smaller bills, if they were the bills of specie-paying banks, to be received. This provision, however, was rejected, together with all others which the bill contained. Having spoken, sir, the other day of my bill having been overlaid by that of the honorable member from Pennsylvania, or of his being used as an instrument to displace mine, I wish to say that I meant no complaint at all against the manner in which that gentleman brought forward his measure. His course was entirely fair, as he intended to support, and did support, the system which he proposed, throughout. His object, certainly, was to pass his own bill, not to displace mine; yet, my bill being displaced, there was a majority against his.

In the third place, sir, it is evident that the repeal of the deposite act leaves the public moneys in the entire control of the Treasury Department and the President, in the same manner as this control existed in their hands after the removal of the deposites, and before Congress provided any regulation on the subject. By the act of 1789, so much relied on, the Treasurer is to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, but the Secretary of the Treasury is to superintend the collection of revenue; and it was the well-known doctrine and practice of the last Administration that all these officers, in the discharge of their duties, are under the immediate direction of the President, and are but his agents and instruments. So that the public moneys are now to be received, kept, and disbursed, as the President may see fit to order.

In the last place, sir, it is quite obvious that the Secretary of the Treasury, under direction of the President, may, if this bill shall pass, use any State banks he chooses, whether they be specie-paying banks or not; whether they issue small notes or not, or whatever may be their character or condition. He will not be obliged to use banks; but he may use them, and may select them at his pleasure. We repeal all limitations, we dispense with all securities, and leave the whole matter to the Department and to the President. I believe, sir, that the collectors now deposite the public moneys in banks, and have no doubt they will continue to do so. If they shall be called on to pay money to the Treasurer, the Treasurer will keep that money also in the banks, or some of them. What else can he do with it? While we thus repeal all legal connection with the banks, guarded as that connection has been, by many provisions for the security of the public money, we are likely to see a connection renewed, without legal sanction or authority, with no provisions whatever for security, and to be extended just as far as the Executive Government may choose. This is the point, then, to which we have now arrived, in the process of separating the concerns of the Government from the concerns of the banks, and keeping the money of the people out of the hands of corporations and individuals.

Mr. PRESTON said when the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] introduced a bill the other day in relation to the currency, it spoke something like a departure from the trammels of party, and for doing which that gentleman, at least, had his thanks. He regretted that some common ground had not been devised on which all parties might have met to do something for the relief of the public. He was anxious to take the whole matter from the vortex of party in which it had been whirled. The Senator from North Carolina, in some remarks the other day, had spoken of party triumphs in a manner which would induce us to suppose that feeling uppermost in his bosom, and thus, said Mr. P. they go on, waging war for political ascendancy, while the interests of the country are overlooked. He desired gentlemen to act in a spirit of compromise and conciliation, and with the full swell of patriotism in their bosoms, forget, for a moment, party strife and party bickering, and meet on the common altar of the country.

Mr. P. then dwelt for some time on the common struggle, and common effort which had been made by the party in which he had enlisted as a soldier, to defeat Executive usurpation; and now at the end of five years we find ourselves [he said] about to be driven back to the precise situation we were in, when the audacious act of that most reckless Executive seized the revenue of the country and placed it under his own control. Mr. P. said there was no politician that did not tremble, and the public mind was stupyfied at the audacity of that act, We find him offering reasons for his conduct, by telling us that he did not conceive the public money safe in its legitimate deposite; and he calls upon us to tie his hands; [here Mr. P. read from the message of President Jackson;] and now we propose to do that for Mr. Martin Van Buren what Gen. Jackson with all his boldness was afraid of; to wit: the responsibility of the control of the currency; it was saying, in fact, in so many words, we surrender to your discretion the Treasury of the country, and constitute you supreme dictator at once.

This was from a spirit of party which would sacrifice any thing, so that it might triumph—a party that was willing throw itself upon all descriptions, even down to Slam, Bang and Co. and Fanny Wright. Look to the power that such unlimited discretion would bestow upon the President. In the South they liked hard money—and the answer was "hard money" you shall have. To the North "you want bank paper, and paper you shall have!" And thus they were seizing on all they could bring to their aid, whether by the arm or leg, to sustain them in their tottering. Why did not gentlemen listen to the still small voice of reason, rather than to passion and prejudice, or if they would not listen to that, would they take no warnings from the popular voice, which had been made to ring in their ears on so many occasions?

Mr. STRANGE briefly replied. He said when he addressed the Senate on Saturday last, he hoped he had done with the matter; but the Senator from South Carolina has represented him as using language which he never did use, and had imputed motives to him which he never entertained. The Senator had spoken as though he were not connected with party, or party men, and yet he had told us that he had entered as a private soldier in his party; but he [Mr. S.] had not yet learned what bounty he had received. Mr. S. said his party was engaged in a glorious struggle, and which was right, the Senator or himself, was left to the people to decide. It had not been his habit to impute improper motives to any Senator, however widely he might differ from him as to the best means of administering the Government for the public good. The party to which he [Mr. S.] was attached, believed the Independent Treasury to be the very best system that could be adopted; while on the other side they maintain that it will be ruinous. On that question they were at issue, and the country would decide. As for charging the party to which he was attached of being ready to sacrifice the interests of the country to party triumphs, eh did not believe there was a man in the community that indulged such a purpose. It did not characterize the party to which he belonged; that party had never sought to disconnect itself with the interests of the country for political aggrandisement.

The Senator from South Carolina had asked why we had not listened to the still, small voice of reason, rather than of passion and party prejudice. Where were they to hear it? Certainly not from the other side; from that quarter they had plenty of declamation and bitter invective, but not the voice of reason. The favorite measure of his party was a separation of the Government from all banks; and that had been pursued openly and avowedly. While, said Mr. S. we would give some power to the Executive, we do not seek to give him all power. We desire to regulate the Treasury by law, and not by the banks. Let the gentlemen from the other side propose any measure, so that they did not seek to place the Government at the beck of the banks, State or United States, and it would meet his hearty concurrence, if he believed it to militate in favor of the public good. Mr. S. defended with much zeal the late and present Presidents, from the aspersions thrown out. The late President, he said, though one of the greatest men living in the world, was nevertheless liable to error; and experience had convinced him that neither State banks or United States Bank were to be trusted as public depositories for the Treasury of the nation. The present President had all the strength necessary to administer the Government wisely, and carry it triumphantly through the present crisis. He had strength of head and strength of heart to sustain him in the conflict now waging between the banks and the people; and Mr. S. said he regretted that the Senator from South Carola had descended to the use of such newspaper trash as that of "Slam, Bang and Co. and Fanny Wright." The President of the United States had his own high resources within himself, and the confidence and the affections of the American people; he sought to throw himself on no one, and certainly would not throw himself upon Fanny Wright. That gentleman sought only to place the Government above the control of corporations, and thereby to make the nation prosperous and happy. That was the charm and only magic which he had used to lure the confidence of his countrymen. Mr. S professed himself as ready as the Senator, or any other man, to regulate the matter by law, but by wholesome law; and where discretion was necessary, he greatly preferred Executive discretion to that of the banks.

Mr. PRESTON regretted tha a catch phrase of a newspaper should be so offensive, and sound so unmusical to the ear of the Senator. Whatever might be thought of those names, they represented a great and growing principle, which had risen up like a mist from a noxious fen, and was now seen curling about the avenue, and had enveloped the Capitol of the country.

Mr. STRANGE responded; when

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said, had this question been under consideration at an earlier period of the session, he would have felt justified in detaining the Senate while he gave his reasons upon it. He was aware, however, at this period of the session, he could render his State and the country greater service by remaining silent, and saving the time he might occupy in discussion, to be employed in useful action, than by any thing he could say on this subject at this period of the session. It was not speeches, but action, that was wanted; the session had arrived at the last week, and much important business remained to be transacted, in which his State, and the other States of the Union, were deeply interested; and, however much it would have gratified his feelings to have shown the odiousness of a proposition to unite, without control, the purse and the sword in the hands of the Executive, he would forego that pleasure, and content himself with asking that the question on the passage of the bill should be taken by ayes and noes, as he desired to have his name recorded against it at every step.

Mr. CALHOUN said, I rise to explain the views I entertain in relation to this bill, and the grounds on which I intend to place my vote.

It was my misfortune not to have heard the discussion on Saturday, when the bill was introduced; having been detained from my seat by an engagement with which I could not dispense.

It is far from being agreeable to me to be compelled so often to disagree with those with whom I act on the important subject which has engrossed so much of our time; and I regret that another question should arise on which I shall again be compelled to differ, without reversing the dictates of my deliberate judgment.

If the effects of the passage of this bill would be, as it seems to be supposed, to restore the act of 1789, no one would give it a more cordial support than myself. That act established the Constitutional Treasury. It provided that the dues of the Government should be collected in its own currency, as established by law under the Constitution, and kept and disbursed by its own responsible officers, regularly appointed for the purpose.

This is the great principle for which I contend, and which, for the good of the country, I would rejoice to see restored. But I fear that the passage of this bill would not re-establish the act of '89. There are intermediate acts that would still remain unsuperseded. The resolution of 1816, which authorizes the receipt of bank notes in the public dues, would not be repealed; nor would the usage of the Government employing banks as depositories of the public revenue, be reversed. What, then, would be the effects of the passage of this bill? It would, according to my opinion, give the President almost unlimited power over the collection and keeping of the revenue. If the act of '36 be repealed, as proposed by the bill, he would be left free to order the public money to be kept by the Treasurer and the collectors, or to be placed in banks; and, under the resolution of '16, in conjunction with the bill introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts this session, and which has since become a law by the unanimous vote of those on the other side of the chamber, he may order, at his pleasure, the collection to be made in gold and siver, or bank notes, provided no discrimination be made in different branches of the revenue. He might, in a word, either restore the act of '89, or supersede it, as he might think best for the public good. It is, sir, a great and high responsibility to be imposed on any individual, and which I, who am, and have ever been, opposed to discretionary power, am unwilling to impose.

But should the bill become a law, and the Chief Magistrate, in the exercise of this high discretion, should supersede the practice of putting the public funds in possession of the banks, and restore the act of 1789, he shall receive my decided and cordial support. A departure from the true intention and meaning of that act, has been the source of all our woes; and its restoration is a consummation devoutly to be wished; but on the other hand, if he should decline the exercise of so high and responsible a power, and renew the deposite system, it would make a most unfortunate and dangerous change in the issue between us and those who are opposed to us on this important question. It would be no longer between a bank and the constituted Treasury as it now is; but between a deposite system with and without law, as it was prior to the passage of the deposite act of '36, in which our opponents would have the advantage of advocating law against discretion. It is a position which we could not maintain, and on which I do not choose to be put.

What course the Chief Magistrate might take if this bill should become a law, I have no means of knowing or conjecturing; but if he should act in the spirit of his messages at the opening of this and the extra sessions, he would not hesitate, be the responsibility what it may; and as I have no reason to doubt his sincerity on this great question, I hope and trust he would so act, should Congress give him the power. It would close the door against many a calamity about to rush into the State, and do more than has ever been done by an Executive act to restore the ascendency of the laws and Constitution. But be his determination what it may, I cannot agree to vote for the bill. My principles have been long fixed and acted on in relation to discretionary power; and in voting against this measure, I but act in conformity to them.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, when there appeared, for the bill 27, against it 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wall, Williams, Wright and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—22.

The bill to authorize the payment of commissions to the agents of persons in whose favor awards have been made under treaties with foreign powers in certain cases, was read the third time and passed.

The bill to amend the act authorizing the establishment of a pension agency in the northern part of the State of Alabama, was also read the third time and passed.

The amendments of the House to the bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States were taken up; and after some remarks from Messrs. BENTON, WHITE, and HUBBARD, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the bill making an appropriation for a compilation of the laws of the Territory of Florida, was taken up and considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, the bill making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacon lights, and buoys, and for making certain surveys, was taken up and considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. LYON, the bill to establish a Surveyor General's office for the State of Michigan, was taken up, the question being on the amendment of Mr. CLAY of Alabama to discontinue the several surveyor generals' office in the different States as soon as the surveys are completed, and the records made up, transferring the records of each office to the authorities of the State in which it is situated.

Mr. TIPTON moved to amend the bill, by a provision to transfer the office at Cincinnati, Ohio, to St. Josephs, in Michigan; which motion, after a short discussion, was carried by yeas 2[illegible], nays 16.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to postpone the bill indefinitely which motion was lost—ayas 12, noes not counted.

The amendment of Mr. CLAY of Alabama having been agreed to, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to continue in force the act to provide payment for horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States, was considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, July 3, 1838.

Mr. NAYLOR renewed his motion to print 3,000 extra copies of the report on the steam frigate Fulton, but it was ineffectual.

NATIONAL FOUNDRY.

Mr. SLADE, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on so much of the President's Message as relates to a National Foundry, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a foundry at the city of Vergennes, in the State of Vermont.

Mr. KEIM of Pennsylvania begged leave to ask the chairman of the select committee, or any of the members who may have the kindness to answer, whether the House might expect a report on the subject of a national foundry before the close of the session. He begged leave to make the inquiry in order to be prepared to show the claims of his section of country; and would state the fact, that more crude and refined iron was manufactured in his district than in any same extent of territory in the United States. He would be able also to show, as well from an advantageous locality as from the superior quality of their iron, that they would be strongly entitled to have the contemplated establishment within their limits.

Mr. PARKER of New York said, as a member of the select committee, and in the necessary absence of its chairman, he would answer the question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The House must be aware that a great number of petitions and resolutions had been referred to the select committee, requiring them "to inquire into the expediency of locating a national foundry" at many different places. To sustain these various applications, a great number of documents had been submitted, requiring a very laborious and difficult examination on the part of the committee. Mr. P. proceeded to express his opinion that it would not be in the power of the committee to complete this investigation in such a manner as to do justice to these different applications and to the public, and make their report at the present session. He was not authorized to speak for the other members of the committee, but he believed they would concur with him in saying it would not be practicable to report before the next session of Congress.

Mr. GOODE asked leave to move to discharge the committee of the Whole from the bill to authorize the sale of the alternate sections of the Wabash and Erie canal lands. It was desirable on all hands that these lands should be disposed of; but the Commissioner of the Land Office had doubts of the power to do so, unless by a special act of Congress. His object was to bring the bill into the House for action.

Mr. HOWARD reluctantly felt compelled to object, as he should do to any other proposition to arrest the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, for he was unwilling that that speech should go forth to the country without a reply.

Mr. ADAMS then resumed and continued his remarks on the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on the subject of Texas, till the orders of the day were called for.

Bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred.

The act amendatory of the act to authorize the Secretary of War to establish a pension agency at Huntsville, Alabama, was, on motion of Mr. MARTIN, advanced through all its stages, and passed.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The act to modify the deposite act of 1836 was taken up.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that it be read at large; which having been done,

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained its provisions and the necessity of the measure, called for by the existing circumstances of the State banks conflicting with the imperative restrictions of the deposite act of '36.

Mr. MENEFEE replied, and quoted Mr. WRIGHT's report to prove that the Secretary of the Treasury had the power to designate other depositories than those which had already been employed, in which opinion Mr. M. expressed his own concurrence, and went on at length to oppose the bill; the effect of which, he insisted, was to put the whole finances of the country within the arbitrary control of the Executive.

Mr. LEGARE stated his belief that a more extraordinary proposition had never been presented to that body for its consideration, and gave very briefly the reasons that would induce him to vote against it. He moved to refer the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WISE also opposed the bill; the ghost, as it was, in a more hideous form, of the defunct Sub-Treasury bill. In the course of his remarks, he said that the friends of liberty now rallied round a Bank of the United States as the only effective bulwark against Executive usurpation.

Mr. CUSHMAN inquired what the main question would be.

The CHAIR replied, on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. CUSHMAN said the SPEAKER's table was now loaded down with subjects of the greatest importance, awaiting the action of the House; and, as this measure had been debated at great length for the last year, both in this and in the other branch, he therefore demanded the previous question.

Mr. TILLINGHAST asked Mr. C. to withdraw the motion, to enable him to submit a proposition. (Cries of "No! no!" from all parts of the hall.)

Mr. DUNCAN made a similar request, for the reason that he been twice prevented, once by his own courtesy, and again by the operation of the previous question, from delivering his views on the principles of the measure to divorce the Government from banks.

Mr. CUSHMAN felt compelled to decline acceding to these requests, for the same reasons that had induced him to move the previous question.

Mr. CURTIS moved a called of the House, which was ordered, and proceeded in for some time; when

Mr. GRANT moved to dispense with it.

Mr HAYNES asked for the yeas and nays, which being ordered, were—yeas 164, nays 45, so the call was dispensed with.

The previous question was not seconded—yeas 97, nays 105.

Mr. DUNCAN then proceeded to address the House at length, in support of the divorce scheme, and in defence of the Democratic party, and the Administration from the false charge brought against both of an effort to break down the banks in the country. Neither its friends designed it, nor would the measure effect it. After dwelling on these positions for some time, the hour arrived for the House to take its daily recess, and Mr. D. gave way for that purpose.

EVENING SESSION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following messages from the President of the United States; which were laid on the table:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, together with the documents therein refered to, in answer to their resolution of the 28th May last.

(Signed) M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, July 2d, 1838.

To the House of Representatives.

I transmit a report from the War Department, in relation to the investigations of the allegations of fraud committed on the Creek Indians, in the sales of their reservations, authorized by the resolutions of that body, of the 1st July, 1836.

(Signed) M. VAN BUREN

WASHINGTON, July 3d, 1838.

The act to establish a criminal court in the District of Columbia, was read a third time and passed.

WABASH AND ERIE LANDS

Mr. GOODE moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole, from the bill to authorize the sale of the Wabash and Erie canal lands; which was agreed to, the bill brought into the House, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the message of the President of the United States, of the 30th May, 1838, relative to the claim, in the case of the ship Mary and cargo, of Baltimore, made a report accompanied by the following resolution; which was concurred in.

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the President of the United States be requested to continue to urge the Dutch Government to a prompt adjustment of the claim.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate "to modify the last clause of the 5th section of the deposite act of the 23d June, 1836, and for other purposes."

The pending questions were on its third reading, and on the motion of Mr. LEGARE, to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DUNCAN concluded his remarks in support of the system to dissolve Governments and banks.

Mr. LEGARE then withdrew his motion to commit, and moved to strike out the second section of the bill, which was as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the first twelve sections of the act entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money," approved 23d June, 1836, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, except so far as is above provided, and to enable the Treasury Department to collect any debts which may be due or owing from the late deposite banks.

Mr. ROBERTSON then had an amendment read, which he proposed to submit at the proper time, providing for the collection of the public revenue according to the law of 1816, and for its special deposite in State banks on certain conditions, [substantially the same, we believe, as that he offered to the Independent Treasury bill some time since.] Mr. R. made some remarks in support of his proposition, and then moved it in the form of a substitute.

Mr. TILLINGHAST gave notice of an amendment he intended to move at the proper stage, [similar to Mr. WEBSTER'S proposition offered in the Senate.] He hoped the previous question (which he was in favor of this morning) would not be moved, but that the House would have an opportunity of voting upon the different amendments that might be presented.

Mr. GRANT said he was very sorry that he could not accommodate the gentleman from Rhode Island; but it seemed utterly impossible to get any amendment to this bill. [Several members, Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky and others, exclaimed, "Oh, move the previous question; I'll support it."] He, for one, was desirous that the bill should be amended in some particulars; but it appeared as though the subject was going to be interminable; and believing that to be the case, and that it was unnecessary to waste any more of the important time of this session, he therefore demanded the previous question. ["Agreed, agreed," from all parts of the hall.]

Mr. NAYLOR moved a call of the House, which was ordered—ayes 75; and, after being proceeded in for some time, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, it was dispensed with—156 to 63.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia asked the mover of the previous question to withdraw it, with the general understanding that the question be taken, without any further debate, upon the proposition of Mr. LEGARE.

Mr. GRANT said his only object was to progress with the other pressing business before the House, and with that understanding, he withdrew it.

Mr. TILLINGHAST was the only one objecting. Whereupon,

Mr. GRAY renewed the demand for the previous question; but it was not seconded—ayes 96, noes 102.

The question was then taken on Mr. LEGARE's motion to strike out the second section; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 119, nays 100, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hall, Hamer, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jenifer, Kennedy, Kilgore, Legare, Lincoln, Lyon, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, Samson Mason, Maury, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Phillips, Pope, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Joseph L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—119.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Chapman, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grant, Gray, Haley, Hammond, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Samuel W. Morris, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Pettikin, Phelps, Plumer, Potter, John H. Prentiss, Reily, Rhett, Richardson, Rives, Sawyer, Sheffer, Snyder, Spencer, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—100.

Mr. CURTIS moved the following additional section:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury hereafter to select and employ as depositories of the public money, according to the provisions of the said act of June, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money," any bank which shall redeem its notes and bills on demand in specie, notwithstanding it may have, since the 4th July, 1836, issued or paid out bills of a less denomination than five dollars.

And that the operation of the 2d section of the act of April 14, 1836, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 18[illegible]6," be, and the same is hereby, suspended until further order of Congress.

Mr. CONNOR then demanded the previous question, (the main question would be on ordering the balance of the bill to a third reading,) but it was not seconded—ayes 94, noes 104.

Mr. UNDERWOOD remarked, that the amendment would not meet the views the majority had in view, and suggested such an alteration of it as would merely repeal the fifth section of the act of 23d June, 1836, and modify the second section. This could be reached by striking out the first section of the bill under consideration, and amending Mr. CURTIS's amendment.

The CHAIR remarked that Mr. CURTIS's amendment would take precedence.

Mr. CLARK of New York moved to insert the following proviso in the seventh line, after the word "dollars:"

Provided, however, That this provision shall not extend to any bank which shall issue or pay out any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars after the 4th July, 1839.

Mr. CURTIS accepted this as a modification of his amendment.

Mr. BRONSON moved to amend the last line, by striking out the word "until the further order of Congress," and insert, in lieu thereof, "for two years from the passage of this act."

Mr. RIVES then moved to commit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, "with instructions so to amend the same as to dispense with the agency of banks in the fiscal operations of the Goverement."

Mr. R. remarked that these instructions were the same as those moved by his colleague from Richmond, (Mr. ROBERTSON,) two years ago, and as the best, the ablest, the most conclusive argument that could be offered in their behalf, he would ask to have read his colleague's speech on that occasion. This being objected to, Mr. R. proceeded to sustain the motion himself, with reference to the existing state of things, and went on to demonstrate the expediency and constitutionality of such a measure as that proposed. He was in favor of a hard money currency, and wished to bring it about by gradual means. He believed a majority of that House was in favor of the divorce scheme, and he wanted to test the question; and let those who are for perpetuating the connection between the Government and the banks come up to the mark. He adverted to the change of his colleague's [Mr. ROBERTSON] position, and examined Mr. Ritchie's project, now advocated by his colleague, of a special deposite system, demonstrating it to be the most objectionable of all the schemes devised or agitated. After some further remarks, Mr. R. called for the yeas and nays on his amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he should not then join issue with his colleague on the question of consistency; for he did not hold himself infallible, and admitted that his opinions had undergone a change. He had witnessed a battle of this kind in the Senate, between two much mere prominent men than themselves, which resulted in each exposing inconsistencies on the part of the other. He might ask his colleague how it was that he now differed from the declared opinions of the gods of his idolatry at that day, General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, but he would not pursue the inquiry.

The question was then taken, and the motion disagreed to—yeas 97, nays 113, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Chaney, Chapman, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hawkins, Holsey, Holt, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Mallory, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Samuel W. Morris, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Plumer, Potter, John H. Prentiss, Reily, Rhett, Richardson, Rives, Sawyer, Sheffer, Snyder, Spencer, Taylor, Thomas, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—97.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, James Garland, Rice Garland, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Hamer, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Howard, Jenifer, Kennedy, Kilgore, Legare, Lincoln, Lyon, Marvin, James M. Mason, Samson Mason, Maury, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Phillips, Pope, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, A. H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanley, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—113.

So the motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. BRONSON withdrew his amendment.

Mr. CRAIG then said that, presuming it was the desire of every member of that House, as well as of the country at large, that no bank should be used as a depository of the public moneys, which was not sound, according to the most generally received principles of banking, he therefore moved a proviso that no bank should be selected or used as a depository of the public moneys which should not, at all times, keep on hand one dollar in specie for every three of its liabilities, and asked for the yeas and nays thereon, which were ordered.

Mr. CLARKE remarked that, under the act of '36, the Secretary of the Treasury had a discretionary power, that if in his judgment they did not keep on hand a fair proporion of specie to their liabilities, he could remove the deposites.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said it was impracticable.

Mr. BOON humorously remarked, that they had been spending the whole of that day in speaking and voting upon a subject that was dead and buried; he would add, signed, sealed, and delivered to its fate; and as speaking seemed to be the order of the day, it might not, perhaps, be considered intrusive in him if he also should avail himself of this opportunity of speaking two or three hours about nothing at all, especially as he had waived his right on the Independent Treasury bill to accommodate the public business. [Cries of "Go on," "Go on."] Mr. B. said the unfeigned respect he entertained for that House would restrain him from going on at such length, but he did desire to set himself right as to his course on the rescision of the Specie Circular. If, however, he could have any thing like an assurance that gentlemen would vote, and not talk, he would, in the exigency of the public business, again forego his right. [Cries of "Agreed," "Agreed."]

The question was then taken, and Mr. CRAIG's amendment rejected—yeas 86, nays 114, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, ANDREWS, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Chaney, Chapman, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Robert M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, John W. Jones, Kenn, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Mallory, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Samuel W. Morris, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Plumer, John H. Prentiss, Reily, Rhett, Richardson, Rives, Sawyer, Sheffer, Snyder, Spencer, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Towns, Turney, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Jared W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, James Garland, Rice Garland, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Hamer, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Howard, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Kennedy, Kilgore, Legare, Lincoln, Lyon, Marvin, James M. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—114.

Mr. PARRIS then moved to amend the amendment by the addition of a proviso that no bank shall be a depository of the moneys of the Government which shall not keep in its vaults one dollar in specie to every bill in circulation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina moved to commit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions so to amend it as to provide that the Government deposites shall not be used for banking purposes.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. STEUART called for a division of the question, so as to take it first on the commitment, and then on the instructions.

Mr. CAMBRELENG inquired if the motion to commit should be decided in the negative, whether the instructions would not fall?

The CHAIR replied they would.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then said, a rejection of the motion to commit, rejects the instructions against using the public money for banking purposes.

Mr. RICE GARLAND. To be sure: it don't take a wizard to tell us that.

The motion to commit was decided in the negative—yeas 97, nays 111, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Chaney, Chapman, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Howard, Hubley, William H. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Bauldin, Briggs, William B. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—111.

Mr. PARRIS then modified his amendment to read "one dollar in specie to five in liabilities."

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON said he would vote for the gentleman's proposition, and pledge every member of the House also to vote for it, if he would make a reasonable showing that it was possible.

Mr. FOSTER then moved to commit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill for the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue.

Mr. MERCER called for a division of the question, so as again to take it only on the question to commit.

Mr. HOPKINS inquired if it would be in order to move the previous question.

The CHAIR. It would.

Mr. HOPKINS accordingly made that motion, but it was not seconded.

The CHAIR then ruled Mr. FOSTER's amendment to be out of order, on the ground of its identity with Mr. RIVES's already rejected, and the question recurring upon Mr. PARRIS's amendment.

Mr. BELL said it must be manifest now, that a decided majority were in favor of removing the disability that exists in the act of 1836. That seemed to him the main and particular intention and object of the majority of the House. Now it was also manifest that any movement by which this bill should be sent to the Committee of Ways and Means must be fatal to it, and he meant that remark to apply also to the repeated motions to amend in this way, at this period of the session; a course of proceeding which, if prosecuted, would also be fatal to the bill. Many of these propositions might, perhaps, be proper, if they were digesting a complete system; but this was not the time to adopt them, and for this reason, therefore, the votes against them must not be interpreted as against all the principle involved in them. He hoped every one of them would be voted down, of whatever nature they or either of them might be.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina asked Mr. PARRIS to accept, as a modification, this proviso: That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize the use of the public money for banking purposes; which Mr. P. accepted.

Mr. ATHERTON called for a division of the question, and it was taken on the first branch, or Mr. PARRIS's amendment, and disagreed to—yeas 91, nays 109, as follows:

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana moved the following proviso:

Provided no bank shall be selected as a depository which shall not keep in its vaults an amount of specie, which, together with the balance of all its accounts with specie-paying banks, shall be equal to one-fifth of the amount of its notes and bills in circulation, and its public and private deposites.

Mr. G. asked for the yeas and nays upon its adoption, which were ordered.

Mr. R. GARLAND proceeded to address the House, and to read from the journals the votes given by the friends of the Administration in 1834 or 1836, and among them the name of Mr. HAMER.

Mr. HAMER, thereupon, rose and said that if the gentleman from Louisiana had read his name for the purpose of shewing any inconsistency in his votes, he was greatly mistaken. Upon the occasion alluded to by the gentleman, he (Mr. H.) had voted against the amendment now offered; and he should vote against it now. He was in favor of the bill as originally reported in the Senate, and had, therefore, voted to strike out the second section. He should vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CURTIS,] and against all other amendments, and amendments to amendments, no matter by whom offered, or of what character they might be. Such had been his course throughout the evening and he should continue it till the subject was disposed of, believing, as he did, that this was the best mode of saving the original bill as reported in the Senate.

After some remarks from Messrs. WISE, BELL, and UNDERWOOD, the last gentleman moved an adjournment, (at 10 o'clock, p. m.) which prevailed, and so

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,
TUESDAY, July 3, 1838.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported, without amendment, the bills from the House making an appropriation to build a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac; for the erection of a court-house at Alexandria, D. C. and, with an amendment, the bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of the late Lewis Grant Davidson.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the executor of William B. Cheever.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which the same had been referred, reported unfavorably, and without amendment, the bills from the House for the relief of Lieut. John Allison; for the relief of John Saybrook; for the relief of Job Halsay; for the relief of Stephen Olney; and favorably, with an amendment, the bills from the House for the relief of Henry Burton; for the relief of Henry Challer; and for the relief of Charles Vattier.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, the select committee appointed on the subject, was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the citizens of Georgetown, D. C. and that part of Washington county lying west of Rock creek, praying a retrocession to the State of Maryland.

Mr. TALLMADGE, from the Naval Committee, to which had been referred the memorial of Doctor Sherwood relative to the discovery of the longitude by the dip of the needle, made a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. T. then, at the suggestion of Mr. PRESTON, moved for the printing of 5000 extra copies of said report; which motion was agreed to, after a short discussion between Messrs. PRESTON, TALLMADGE, WEBSTER, BUCHANAN, and SOUTHARD.

Mr. PRESTON presented the petition of the Marine Band, praying for increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims unfavorable to the petitions of the heirs of General Jacob Payne, deceased, and the heirs of James Caldwell, were severally considered and agreed to.

The resolution submitted by Mr. SOUTHARD, relative to the naval general order on the subject of the Exploring Expedition, was taken up, and after some remarks from Messrs. SOUTHARD and WRIGHT, laid on the table.

The following bills from the House were severally read twice, and referred:

Bill to provide for the settlement of the claim of the State of New York, for the services of her militia.

The bill to repeal part of the second section of the act to provide for the organization of the Department of Indian Affairs.

The amendments of the House to the bill to confirm certain entries of public lands permitted to be made by the registers and receivers, were considered, and, on motion of Mr. FULTON, the amendments were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the memorial of ——, stating that he has discovered a method of preventing the explosion of steamboat boilers, and asking for the passage of a law to appoint suitable persons to examine the value of said discovery, and to provide for compensating him, if it is found worthy of the patronage of Congress: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NORVELL called the attention of the Senate to the bill, which he had introduced two or three weeks ago, making certain grants of public lands, and for other purposes. He had endeavored to obtain an opportunity of calling for its second reading and consideration, with a view to its reference to an appropriate committee. It had also been his intention to present to the Senate an exposition of the objects of the bill, and of the views and principles which had led to its introduction; but the pressing business of the Senate had daily prevented the execution of his purpose; and now the present session was too near its close to authorize a hope that the action of the body could be had upon it until the next session. He should then press its consideration, as he believed the bill to be one of the most important and beneficial to the whole Union that could have been brought up. Its first great object was to grant to the other new States the same quantity of public land which had been granted to Ohio for purposes of internal improvement. This was but fair, just, and equal. The next object was to grant to the old States as much land, according to their aggregate geographical surface, or number of square miles, as the new States had received, for common schools and academies; and to give to each of them, without reference to their size or population, two townships of land for the support of universities and colleges. The next provision of the bill authorized the States of Mississippi and Alabama to apply to the construction of roads and canals, within their limits, the two per cent. fund which had been reserved for making roads leading to those States. The fourth provision was to surrender to Virginia the United States stock in the Dismal Swamp Canal; to Kentucky our subscription in the Louisville and Portland Canal; to Maryland our subscription in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal; and to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company our subscription to stock in that canal. The conditions of these transfers were, that Maryland should pledge her faith to complete the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to the river Ohio, and that United States property and troops should forever pass free of charge along the whole of these canals. His desire was to dissolve the connection of this Government with all subscriptions of money to improvements within the States, and to let the States construct their own roads and canals. The bill was free from sectional inequality. It extended the grants of public land to all the States, for different purposes, to as nearly an equal extent as possible. It was free from the constitutional objections urged by the late President to the distribution bill. He had carefully examined those objections, and had avoided running counter to them in framing the bill. The improvement of the new States by roads and canals, and the extension of the means of the old States for educating their people, were, he considered, objects of vast and beneficial magnitude, and would exert a happy influence over the whole Union, in all time to come. Far more glorious would it be to Congressional legislation to effect these great objects, without exacting a cent in the shape of taxation from the people, than it was to the master of the Roman Empire, who, to establish an eternal monument of the glories of his reign, erected its eastern capitol at the expense of the labor, the money, and all that then remained of the genius of obedient millions of his subjects. Present and future generations would bless a measure such as he considered this bill, replete with lasting benefit to every part of this growing Confederacy of free Republics.

Mr. N. then moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday in December next, on the ground of its being too late to have any definite action at the present session.

This motion was agreed to.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill making an appropriation for a compilation of the laws of the Territory of Florida;

The bill making an appropriation for building light houses, light boats, beacon lights, buoys, and for making surveys, for the year 1838;

The bill to continue in force the act to provide payments for horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States;

The bill to change the location of the office of the Surveyor General for the district composed of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan; and

The bill to provide for the defence of the western frontier.

On motion of Mr. TROTTER, the bill to authorize the State of Mississippi to invest the two per cent. fund belonging to that State was taken up.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to strike out "fifty cents," and insert "the minimum price," but subsequently modified it to a motion to strike out the mode of investment.

Mr. TROTTER said; In reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I will observe, Mr. President, that the bill before the Senate proposes to relinquish to Mississippi the amount of the two per cent. fund which has accrued from the sale of the public lands in that State, and to authorize her Legislature to invest it in such railroads in the State as they may think proper. This proposition is in strict conformity to the practice which has recently been adopted by Congress. A bill has passed the Senate during the present session, to permit the State of Alabama to appropriate the two per cent. fund which has accrued from the sales of her public lands in the construction of a great railroad in that State; and the same privilege has been extended to Arkansas, Michigan, and Louisiana. By the terms of the compact of 1817 between the United States and the State of Mississippi, five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the State was reserved; three per cent. of which was to be appropriated by the State to objects of internal improvement within her limits, and the remaining two per cent. by Congress to the making of a road leading to the State. We believe that the reasons which then existed for making this designation of the purposes to which the two per cent. should be applied have long since ceased, and that the control of it by Congress should cease also. The principle of the bill, it will thus be perceived, is to relinquish this fund to the State, and to place it under her control, limiting its application to roads and railroads. Upon this general proposition, there can arise, as I conceive, no controversy, because the principle of it has been already frequently acquiesced in, and fully established. The bill, however, makes a further provision that the amount of this fund now on hand, as well as that which may hereafter accrue, may be invested in lands, subject to private sale or entry at fifty cents an acre. This is asked with the view to increase the means thus placed at the disposal of the State, to effect those great purposes of internal improvement which it is the sole design of the measure to accomplish, and which are so loudly demanded by the condition of the State; and as this is, perhaps, the first time Congress has been called upon to act upon such a proposition, I will proceed to state, as concisely as I can consistently with the nature of the subject, the grounds upon which we urge its adoption. The five per cent. fund reserved under the terms of the compact of 1817, was evidently intended to be a consideration for the relinquishment which the State was compelled to make of her claim to the waste and unappropriated lands within her limits, and of her right to tax the same within five years after their sale by the United States. I say the State was compelled to adopt the ordinance by which this relinquishment was made, because it was made a condition of her admission into the Union, and an indispensable one, and that it should likewise be irrevocable without the consent of Congress. It must, then, be confessed that the reservation of the five per cent. was a very paltry and inadequate consideration for the immense sacrifice not only of her pecuniary interest, but of her sovereign powers of legislation, which the State was thus forced to make. The amount of the sales of her lands, reaching already the enormous sum of near $13,000,000, afford abundant proof of this, if proof were wanting. This compact has, however, never been disturbed, and I am sure I do not design to do so at this time. The Government itself appears to have become sensible of the hardships and injustice which the several new States suffered by the operation of this and similar ordinances, and has already taken steps to lessen the severity of them, by restoring to these States the taxing power so unjustly withheld, and by permitting the States of Arkansas and Michigan to enter the Union, without this restriction upon their constitutional rights. There is not perhaps in the whole history of the operations of the Federal Government, a more obnoxious and arbitrary exercise of power, than that which exacted the surrender of which I am speaking. A surrender which necessarily carried with it the highest and most essential attribute of sovereignty and jurisdiction. A surrender which, in principle, abandoned the freedom and independence of the States, and the exercise of a most important integral portion of their municipal powers. Yes, sir, it abridged their rights trippled their resources, and laid them under a degrading contribution to the Federal Government. Its tendency was not only to cramp and paralyse their energies; but to place them in a most humiliating contrast with their sister States. Under the provisions of the Constitution, they were entitled to admission into the Union, upon the same terms with the original States; and Congress had no power to abate one jot or tittle of their inherent sovereignty, freedom, and independence. But I will not pursue this subject, further than to remark, that whatever may be the issue of the question which respects the right of the States to the dominion of the lands within their chartered limits, there can yet be no doubt as to the injustice and illegality of the prohibition to tax them, after they have been sold, and become a part of the mass of private property. If this prohibition could be rightfully extended five years after the lands are sold, why not fifty, or a thousand, or ad infinitum? But no one will insist that a permanent restriction of this sort would be tolerated, for a moment, by any State that deserves to be ranked as such amongst the members of our glorious Confederacy. The United States possessed just the same power to inhibit the exercise of the taxing power of the States over any other species of private property within their limits. Yet no one will pretend, I imagine, that if this restriction had gone to this extent, that it would not have been an effectual prostration of their sovereignty and political integrity; nay, that it would not have been fatal to their very existence. But where is the difference in principle between the two cases? Between the right to tax private land, and slaves, money, or merchandise? Sir, the Government had no power to make such a compact with a State of this Union. The State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, has much cause to complain of the operation of this restriction, not only for the reasons already suggested, but because it has been the means of curtailing her lawful resources. To what extent her revenue has been diminished by its operation, it is impossible at this time to determine with accuracy. [That the amount has been very considerable, there is, however, no doubt; and will be found, I dare say, quite equal to, if it does not exceed, the extent of the privileges sought by this bill. Yes, sir, I have but little doubt, that if all we ask is conceded, we shall not receive more than upon just principles of restitution, we are entitled to. Restore us to our rights, which have been withheld, violated, outraged, by the hard and cruel policy of the Government. This is what we ask.

But there are other grounds, far less debatable, upon which t rest the success of this bill, and rest i twith entire confidence. It is upon the broad principle of equal justice. You are asked lo do for Mississippi what you have done for the other new States, for Alabama, Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio We do not ask you to do this, however, by a direct grant of the public lands to the extent of those which have been made to these States, but by a simple reduction of the price to fifty cents an acre, so that we may be permitted to purchase at that price to the extent of the fund which has accrued or may hereafter accrue to us. It is true, we may be mistaken when we suppose, as we do, that in this way we shall be put upon terms of something like equality with the enumerated States. For it may turn out that in paying fifty cents an acre for these lands, (being only allowed to purchase such as are subject to private entry,) we may give for them as much as they are worth, and in that event we gain nothing by the bill. We are willing, however, to take it in this way, leaving its confirmation to the Legislature of the State. And it remains for me to show, that by the most favorable calculation of results, we will barely receive our just proportion of the public lands.

It will be recollected by the Senate that the United States have granted to the State of Alabama 400,000 acres of the public lands for purposes of internal improvement; to Indiana 434,000; to Illinois 480,000; and to Ohio 1,050,000, for similar purposes; whilst not one acre has ever been granted to the State of Mississippi; and yet she has already paid into the National Treasury nearly $13,000,000, the proceeds of the sale of her lands. It is interesting and instructive to examine the official tables of the aggregate sales of the public lands in the several new States, and to contrast them with the tables, also official, of the grants made to the same:

In Ohio, the sales up to the 30th Sept. last are	$21,777,692 95
Indiana	17,569,450 39
Illinois	11,610,024 72
Alabama	16,466,849 03
Mississippi	12,538,606 13

Thus we discover that Mississippi has paid to the United States nearly a million of dollars more than Illinois, and only a few millions less than the other States included in the enumeration, whilst in the table of grants, and favors and donations, she stands exactly in the proportion of 000,000 acres to 400,000 to Alabama, 434,000 to Indiana, 480,000 to Illinois, and 1,050,000 to Ohio. Is this just—is it consonant with those principles of equality which lie at the foundation of our Republican institutions? I am sure there can be but one answer to this question. But I do not complain of the Government for this; for I am not apprised that whilst this distribution of privileges was in progress, Mississippi brought forward her claim to any portion of the public lands for similar purposes. It remains to be seen whether she will have just cause to tax the partiality and injustice of Congress on this subject.

I now propose to show that the adoption of this bill will barely, under the most favorable anticipation of results, bring the State of Mississippi up by the side of the other States. The amount of the two per cent. fund which has already accrued from the sale of the lands in Mississippi, is $274,518. If this sum shall be invested in land, at fifty cents an acre, as proposed by the bill, it will purchase 549,036 acres. This will exceed the quantity granted to Alabama 149,036 acres, that to Indiana 115,036, to Illinois 69,036, and will fall short of that granted to Ohio 501,000. From this estimate, however, it is necessary to deduct the value of the purchase money, which is the property of the State. The sum of $274,518, which the State will pay for the quantity of land above mentioned, will, at the average price of the sales heretofore made by the Government, of the whole 75,000,000 acres which have been disposed of, and which is $1 26¼ an acre, purchase about 217,000 acres of land. In order, therefore, to adjust the balances fairly between Mississippi and the other States, it is proper to deduct the 217,000 acres, the value of the fund on hand, from the 549,036 acres; and, when this is done, it will be perceived that Mississippi will receive upon the principles of a grant, and upon the terms of the donations to the other States, only the quantity of 332,036 acres. This will be less than Alabama has received by 67,964 acres, than Indiana by 82,036, than Illinois by 147,036, and than Ohio by 718,000! So far, sir, the calculation is based upon official data None can mistake them or the results which flow from them. The Senate will perceive that we are yet greatly behind the other States; and the bill proposes to obviate this inequality by anticipating the future sales in Mississippi. It proposes to invest the amount which shall hereafter accrue, in the same manner and upon the same terms with that which has already accrued. The difficulty which arises here is in ascertaining what the amount of the future sales will be; and in the pursuit of this inquiry all our estimates must be conjectural, of course.

There have been sold in the State 9,235,945 acres of land, for the aggregate sum, as I before remarked, of $12,538,606 13. There yet remain unsold and undisposed of, 11,274,474 acres; in which is included, however, the quantity subject to resident Choctaw locations; and it will also be recollected by the Senate that of this amount still remaining unsold, there are within the Augusta land district alone nearly seven millions of acres, and in the adjoining Washington district upwards of two millions more; making the entire quantity in these two districts of about 9,000,000 of acres. The Senate will also remember that in the Augusta district, which contains 7,429,887 acres, there have as yet been sold only 662,620 acres; and in the Washington district, which contains 3,507,368 acres, only 1,361,441 acres; making the total of the sales in these two districts during all the time the lands have been in market, 2,023,000 acres. The situation of the greater portion of the section of country embraced in these two districts, is probably known to some of the members of the Senate. It is, for the most part, a continuation of pine barrens and sterile sandy plains, thinly inhabited. But the sales afford abundant proof, if proof were wanting, to show the poverty of these lands and the slight demand which exists for them; and I verily believe, that if the Government could sell them all at an average price of 12½ cents an acre, it would be an advantageous bargain. It is possible that, at some very distant day, when the population in the State shall become crowded, this most healthy and delightful region of country may become desirable for other than mere planting purposes; in which event, the lands will sell for a better price than I have supposed. It is probable that some of them may continue to sell at one dollar and twenty-five cents; and out of that portion in the Augusta district, embraced within the limits of the late Choctaw cession, many sales will no doubt be effected. Of the quantity undisposed of in the other districts, it is impossible for me to say with any certainty what portion can be sold. All the best sections have been long since taken up by settlers, and those who have had capital to invest on speculation. These lands have been culled with that vigilance and sagacity which characterize those who make it a business to deal in lands for profit. Very few tracts of choice land, I venture to say, can at this day be found in any townships which have been brought into market. Upon the whole, I take it that the future sales, for the purposes of this argument, may be set down at a sum not exceeding four millions of dollars; especially if the graduation bill, which has already passed the Senate, shall become a law. Taking $4,000,000 as the amount, and the future fund to be invested will be $80,000. This will purchase 160,000 acres, according to the terms of this bill; but from this estimate it is proper to deduct, as before, the value of the purchase money; and as the future sales cannot, in my opinion, average more than one dollar per acre, this fund will purchase 80,000 acres, which, subtracted from the 160,000, will leave only 80,000 to be added to the 332,036 already mentioned. This will secure to us only 412,0.0 acres, which is more than the quantity granted to Alabama by 12,000, less than to Indiana 22,009, than to Illinois 68,000, and Ohio 638,000 acres; so that we shall still be behind these States a quantity averaging 140,000 acres. In this estimate, I may be incorrect. I do not profess to be versed in this sort of calculation. If I have erred, however, I am sure the Senate will believe it to be unintentional. Of one thing I am sure; and that is, that no calculation which can be made will place us in advance of the other States; and the question now arises, whether you will pass this bill? Sir, I cannot permit myself to doubt for a moment the disposition of this body to do justice to Mississippi upon this subject. I have already shown you how unequal and humiliating is the contrast in which she is made to stand to other new States of the Union; and I have shown you by official facts, also, the extent of the revenue which she has furnished to the Government. Is, there, can there be, any reason or pretext for refusing to do as much for her in aiding her to improve her internal condition, as has been done for the other States? Have not her citizens performed as many meritorious services for this Government as those of the other new States? Have they not endured the same hardships and privations in settling and improving the wild lands which you claim in her territory? Have they not, like the pioneers of the other new States, given increased value to the public lands by their exertions and their sacrifices? Did they not submit to the labor and the difficulties of opening the way to these lands? Yes, sir, I ask you if they did not expose themselves, too, to all the perils of savage war, experience every species of suffering and privation, become exiles from their country and their homes, abandon all the blessings of society, the endearments of friends and neighbors, and of kindred, and commit themselves and their destiny to the dark, deep bosom of the wilderness? Sir, if any man doubts these things, or believes that I have been drawing upon my imagination to form this picture, let me tell him that he is greatly mistaken. I have witnessed the exposure, the hardships, the actual sufferings and privations of many worthy families, in forcing their way through our immense wilds to some choice place, on which they have erected their temporary camp, exposed for weeks and for months to all the inclemencies of the weather—I have seen the hard toils of the new settler to erect his dwelling, and to remove the tangled forests which surrounded him. But I have not time to pursue this topic. I feel proud to know that the Government has been enabled properly to appreciate the services of the early settler in our western wilds, and the claims which they have created by these services to the justice of their country, and that there are few, very few, who now regard them in the light of a "lawless rabble." On these grounds, Mississippi has her claims—as strong, I dare say, as those of any other new State—to the privileges asked for by this bill. She demands them, too, sir, by the immensity of her resources, already greater than those of any other State in the Union. She needs all the means to which she is entitled, to aid her in her purposes of internal improvement, to develope these resources. Her population, which in 1820 was only seventy-five thousand souls, and in 1830 only one hundred and sixty-one thousand, now numbers nearly four hundred thousand, and it is rapidly and daily increasing. The tide which set into Mississippi a few years since, with a sweeping current, is still pouring in upon us, and it may be said to acquire additional force and volume as it rolls forward. The amount of the product of the State in cotton alone, during the last year, was about 350,000 bales, worth near $15,000,000; and yet Mississippi is in its infancy, struggling with difficulties. The reverses and troubles of the times have fallen with peculiar severity upon this young State, owing to causes which I need not repeat, but which, I trust, will soon cease. She will soon rise superior to all her difficulties, and stand amongst her sisters with a credit as fair, and a strength as mighty, as any State in this Confederacy. Her destiny must be a proud one, and she only needs the aid of provident and wise legislation in hastening the development of the elements of her prosperity to bring that destiny to a speedy consummation. We ask you, then, sir, to give us at once the means which we think we are so justly entitled to. Let us no longer stand so far behind our sister States. Sir, we shall have just cause of complaint if we are refused this grant. We can complain, and will complain, of your partiality and your favoritism. We do not wish to do this; we love and venerate this Union, and respect our sister States. Do justice to us, then, sir. You will lose nothing by this course; no, but you will gain that, compared with which mere dollars and cents are but trash, fit to be thrown, like Shakspeare's physic, to the dogs. You will gain the confidence and the affections of your citizens, the only safeguard, at last, for the perpetuity of our institutions. Yes, the Government may enrich itself at the expense of its citizens, but the power which it thereby acquires, though it may invest it with the means of exerting a magnificent bounty, or an overshadowing patronage, is at last but the source of its weakness and premature decay. I was very forcibly struck with the remarks of a very sensible writer in one of our papers, which fell in my way a few days since, and as they are well adapted to illustrate the principles which I have been urging upon the Senate, I must ask their indulgence to recur to them at this time. This writer is speaking of the philosophy of civil government, and is contrasting the philosophy of the present day in France with that of her Revolution, and he concludes the contrast by remarking that:

"The philosophy of the present day speaks in another tone, and presents a different aspect. It is not conservative, but constructive. It wishes not to destroy, but to build, and profiting by the experience of the past, strives to lay the foundations of our social edifice where alone they can securely rest—in the affections of the popular heart, and in the primal indestructible truths which lie at the bottom of that heart. It no longer seeks to throw the different members of the body politic into confusion and uproar, but would rather clasp them all in bonds of kindred sympathy, equal rights, and a common destiny. These principles are well suited to this country, because their tendency is to give us faith in the principles on which our popular institutions rest. We need that faith. The strongest thinker of antiquity, who had perhaps the greatest intellect the world has ever known, declared that Government to be the best which showed the greatest number of citizens who were neither rich nor poor. Herein lies the secret of our strength and glory. Power, in this country, is destined to follow land. This is that true balance of which theoretical writers make so much account; and so long as they who hold that balance are neither rich nor poor, the Commonwealth may oscillate, but it is self-poised, and cannot be overturned."

I invoke the Senate to apply the excellent principles of the philosophy here spoken of to the measure now under consideration, and give us the benefit of the application. Sir, I trust the Government of this country may never lose sight of these great principles, for, if steadily adhered to, they cannot fail to conduct us forward to ultimate prosperity and happiness. These principles desecrate monopolies, because they result in inequality, and consequent aristocracies, more or less oppressive, according to the extent of the exclusive favors conferred. They are especially opposed to monopolies of the soil, that best gift of God to man. They recommend the diffusion of the benefits of the public lands amongst the greatest practical number of the people—all possessing, none monopolizing.

These principles are violated by any partial and unequal distribution of the public favors, because so soon as it is discovered that the Government is administered upon a system of favoritism, the confidence and affections of the citizens in and for it are lost, their attachment ceases, and it can only rely for support upon adventitious aid. But when that happens, the days of our Republic may be considered as numbered. In administering a Government like ours, we should never lose sight of these considerations. There is a spirit peculiar to every species of human Government. The spirit of our Government is equality, and its basis is public virtue, and all our acts of public legislation should be steadily regulated by this great principle. This strict attention to the leading and fundamental spirit of their form of Government, is rigidly adhered to in other countries. Fear is the principle of a purely despotic Government, and accordingly we find that all the edicts of the ruling despot are designed to foster this spirit. The natural hatred of the subjects of such a power is forced to conceal itself beneath the summary and the bloody code which exacts their obedience to its odious and oppressive mandates. It is the interest of such a Government to make itself rich and powerful, and to keep its subjects in poverty and ignorance. It deals out its favors with profusion to the few who are its favorites, and its ministers and minions, whilst it seizes with rapacity upon the property of its miserable subjects. But it is not so, thank God, with us. Equality of rights, civil, political, and religious, is, or should be, our leading object; and the favors, as well as the protection, of this Government, should be extended alike to all. With these remarks, I submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama also addressed the Senate for some time in favor of the general views of the Senator from Mississippi; and concluded by offering an amendment for the original bill, which was accepted by Mr. TROTTER, under the assurance from those who opposed the details of the original bill, that if an express grant of land were asked for Mississippi equal to that made to other States, that it would be granted.

Mr. TROTTER then gave notice that he would, on the next day, ask leave to introduce a bill for that purpose.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Indiana, the bill for the benefit of the Mount Carmel Railroad Company was taken up; and after some remarks from Messrs. SMITH, TIPTON, and CLAY of Alabama, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill explanatory of the act regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet officers, approved April 16, 1816, was taken up as the general order; and after a debate, in which the bill was advocated by Mr. PRESTON, and opposed by Mr. HUBBARD, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 20, nays 18.

The bill to authorize a subscription for stock in the Jefferson and New Albany Canal Company, was, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, laid on the table.

The bill to direct the investment of certain funds belonging to Indian tribes in certain State stocks, was taken up and considered, and, after some remarks from Messrs. WHITE and WRIGHT; laid on the table.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, the Senate took the bill for the relief of William Crooks and James Crooks; and after a debate, in which it was advocated by Messrs. MERRICK, CLAYTON, LINN, and BAYARD, and opposed by Messrs. CLAY, of Alabama, HUBBARD, WHITE, and NILES, it was rejected—yeas 13, nays 21.

On motion of Mr CLAY of Alabama, the bill for the relief of William Jones was taken up; and after a brief explanation from Mr. C. it was amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of William Fuller was taken up, and explained by Mr. ROBERTSON, and after a brief discussion, was rejected.

And the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, July 4, 1838.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, moved their discharge from the various memorials not reported on by that committee; which was agreed to.

Mr. C. also reported Senate bill for the relief of the heirs of Francis Newman, late collector of internal revenue in Maryland, with a recommendation that it be rejected; and it was laid on the table.

Mr. C. also reported Senate bill supplementary to the act establishing branch mints of the United States; and it was also laid on the table.

Mr. C. also reported, without amendment, Senate bill to authorize the sale of certain [the Bank of the United States] bonds belonging to the United States; and the same was committed.

On motion of Mr. C. the committee had leave to sit during the sessions of the House for the remainder of the session.

Mr. C. said he felt it his duty to announce to the House that to-day and to-morrow were the last days during which they could send any bills to the Senate originating in this body. There were four important appropriation bills not yet reached, and he should be under the necessity of asking the House to go into Committee of the Whole thereupon to-day or to-morrow.

THE LATE DUEL.

Mr. PRENTISS of Mississippi rose, he said, at the request of the parties implicated, and also from his own sense of the propriety and importance of the subject, notwithstanding the late period of the session, to call the attention of the House to the duelling report. As a question of privilege, he believed he had a right to submit a motion in relation to it at any time, and he should move to take it up. He did so from the fact that members of that House were deeply implicated, and the House ought not to adjourn with such an indictment, or inquest, or verdict, with judgment pronounced, impending over the heads of those gentlemen. Mr. P. then submitted his motion.

Mr. GRANTLAND would inform the gentleman, that if his object was to get a vote upon the resolutions, Mr. G. believed he could easily attain it.

The CHAIR would entertain the motion as a privileged question, but it was still in the power of the House to decide whether they would take it up or not.

Mr. GRAY inquired if it would be in order to move to lay the motion on the table.

The CHAIR. It would.

Mr. GRAY made that motion, stating that he did so, because there was not time to act upon it at this period of the session

The CHAIR arrested Mr. G. as a motion to lay on the table was not debateable.

Mr. WISE inquired whether, if that motion prevailed, it would not still be a privileged question to be called up at any time, to demand, he spoke for himself only, to be put upon his trial by that House?

The CHAIR replied, that it was for a majority of the House to determine when they would consider the question.

Mr. WISE knew that, but still would not the question of right, as one of privilege, be open for him to repeat at any time?

The CHAIR said it would be competent for the gentleman at any time to renew the motion to take this subject from the table.

Mr. WISE. Well then, I give the House warning that I have waited patiently and quietly for the House to prosecute this affair to a trial. I have been—

Mr. GRAY said he was compelled to rise to a question of order. He had been peremptorily forbidden from assigning one or two reasons why he made the motion, and had taken his seat, and he should therefore object to other gentlemen being permitted to do that, from which the CHAIR had precluded him.

Mr. WISE. I never expected justice in this matter; I—

The CHAIR appealed to the gentleman from Virginia; the question was not a debateable one.

Messrs. CUSHMAN, PETRIKIN, and SOUTHGATE, simultaneously called for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the motion to lay on the table was agreed to, without a division

Mr. WISE made a request to the House, and asked Mr. ADAMS to give way for the purpose, to do him the justice to print the evidence in that infamous duel, or rather the infamous evidence of the duel case.

Mr. ADAMS did not give way, because, after what fell from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs yesterday, he could not do so.

Mr HARLAN made a similar request, to enable the committees to report; but, for the same reason, Mr. A. declined.

Mr. ADAMS then again continued his remarks on the question of the annexation of Texas, till the expiration of the morning hour.

STEAM EXPLOSIONS.

Mr. BIDDLE then rose and stated that yesterday it was the intention of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. THOMAS] to take up the bill to provide for the prevention of steamboat accidents, but his purpose having been diverted by the very unprofitable debate that occupied all the day, Mr. B. now renewed the motion. He added, that at least five hundred lives had been sacrificed through the tardiness of Congress.

The motion was unsuccessful; the House even refusing to order the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. THOMPSON asked leave to propound a question to Mr. ADAMS; but it was objected to.

On motion of Mr. GRANT, the House passed to the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of Mr. Hasler on the subject of a standard of weights and measures.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, laid on the table.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of the correspondence between that Department and Major General Scott, in relation to the removal of the Cherokee Indians.

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM, of North Carolina, laid on the table.

Mr. GRENNELL moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill for the prevention of duelling, with a view to bring it into the House for action. Mr. G. said he made this motion under a strong sense of duty, having been instructed by the Legislature of his State.

Objection being made—

Mr. G. moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. PHILLIPS called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused, as did the House the motion to suspend.

The bill to authorize the sale of certain public lands of the United States, near the Wabash and Erie canal, in the State of Ohio, was read a third time and passed.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate, to modify the deposite act of 1836, etc.

The question pending was on the proviso of Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana to the amendment of Mr. CURTIS, as stated in the proceedings of last night.

Mr. GRANT said the laborious proceedings of yesterday must convince every one of the impracticability of coming to any further decision on this bill; and with a view to reach some of the other important business, he demanded the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina asked him to withdraw it, but Mr. G. declined; and the cries of "no!" no!" resounded from all parts of the hall.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 119, noes 39; and, on ordering the main question,

Mr. ROBERTSON called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused, and the question prevailed without a count.

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which, being ordered, were—yeas 178, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Aycrigg, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Brodhead, William B. Calhoun, J. Calhoon, Cambreleng, Wm. B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Clark, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Crary, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davee, Davies, Deberry, DeGraff, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Fairfield, Farrington, R. Fletcher, Isaac Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Gallup, Rice Garland, Glascock, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Gray, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Holsey, Hopkins, Howard, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, John W. Jones, Kemble, Kennedy, Kilgore, Legare, Lewis, Lincoln, Lyon, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, Samson Mason, Martin, Maury, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Miller, Mitchell, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Penny backer, Phelps, Phillips, Pope, Potts, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, John Robertson, Edward Robinson, Rumsey, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Tallaferro, Taylor, Thompson, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Toucey, Towns, Underwood, Vail, Weeks, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, Worthington, and Yorke—178.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Buchanan, Bynum, Cushman, Dromgoole, Fry, Griffin, Hawkins, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Keim, Klingensmith, Logan, McKay, Moore, Calvary Morris, Noble, Owens, Paynter, Petrikin, Plumer, Rhett, Richardson, Rives, Snyder, Spencer, Turney, Wagener, Webster, Jared W. Williams, and Yell—33.

So the bill, comprising the first section of the Senate's bill, was ordered to a third reading, in the following words:

Be it enacted, &c. That the last clause of the 5th section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money," approved 23d June, 1836, declaring that the notes or bills of no bank shall be received in payment of any debt due to the United States, which shall, after the 4th day of July, 1836, issue any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars, shall be, and the same is hereby modified, so that the interdiction as to the reception of the bills and notes shall not continue against any bank which has, since the said 4th day of July, 1836, issued bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars, or which shall issue any such bills or notes prior to the first day of October, 1838; but that from and after the said last mentioned day the bills or notes of no bank shall be received in payment of any debt due to the United States, which bank shall after that date issue, re issue, or put out any bill or note of a denomination less than five dollars.

The bill was then read a third time and put on its passage, when

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, moved to commit it to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions so to amend it as to provide that the Government deposites shall not be discounted with, or otherwise used for banking purposes.

Mr. C. made a brief argument in support of the principle involved in this proposition, and concluded by calling for the yeas and nays, but, before they were ordered or refused,

Mr. GRANT demanded the previous question, which, being seconded—ayes 104, noes not counted.

Mr. MARTIN asked for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, but they were refused, and this stage agreed to without a count.

Mr. MURRAY called for the vote on the main question, being the passage of the bill, and the yeas and nays being ordered, were 173 to 31.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the words in the title. "and for other purposes," were stricken out, and then the title was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of submitting the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, on the first day of the next session, all the information not heretofore communicated, now in possession of the Executive, or which may be procured before that time, touching undue attempts or practices, if any, since the 29th May, 1830, to keep down the price of the public lands, or prevent purchases or entries thereof, at public or private sale, by force, threats, or fraud, and the measures taken since the date aforesaid to prevent, defeat, or punish, such fraudulent practices and illegal entries upon the public lands.

Resolved That the Secretary of the Treasury prepare and lay before this House, on the first day of the next session, a statement of all grants and donations of public lands, or of the proceeds of sales thereof, to the States, by the United States distinguishing the amount made to each, and the purposes and considerations upon which made; and accompanying the said statement with an estimate of the amount to which each State would be entitled of similar grants and donations, according to the proportions specified in the several deeds of cession from the several States to the United States.

Secondly. A statement of the whole quantity of public land now surveyed, and an estimate of the quantity unsurveyed; distinguishing each, and where situated; and accompanying the same with separate plans for dividing the said lands, and the proceeds of sales thereof, among the States, in the proportions aforesaid, on such conditions as to the time and manner of division and sale, graduation, reduction of price, and reservation of title in the United States, and final disposition, as may be best calculated to effect the objects of this resolution, in conformity with the original compacts entered into between the several States and the United States relating to the said lands.

Thirdly. A plan for reorganizing the land system on such principles as will best secure the public against loss from illegal entries, frauds, &c. pointing out the defects or advantages of the present system, more particularly in reference to pre emption and sales at public auction; and in general suggesting such alterations as experience may have shown to be necessary.

M. R. also asked for the yeas and nays; but they were refused, and the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. JENIFER asked leave to offer a resolution for the adjournment of the House from 2 o'clock to-day till to-morrow morning: refused.

HARBOR BILL.

The House then took up the "harbor bill," reported from the Committee of the Whole with sundry amendments.

Mr. CAMBRELENG made a statement in reference to the resources of the Government for the coming year. He had no doubt the resources of the Government would, in 1838, be equal to about thirty-three or thirty-four millions of dollars; but the estimates for the receipts from the customs and public lands were uncertain; and, moreover, the Treasury notes may, to a great extent, be returned. He therefore hoped the bill would not be loaded down with amendments. Mr. C. gave a statement also of the expenditures of the Government for the coming year, in substance as follows:

Appropriations for 1838 already made:
Army	$4,200,000
Civil and diplomatic	3,200 000
Revolutionary and other pensioners	2,050.000
Navy, including former appropriations	5,750,000
Cumberland road	500,000
Preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities	7,740,000
Protection of northern frontier	625,000
Appropriations under permanent laws	2,260,000
		26,325,000
Appropriations which will probably be made:
Indian annuities, &c.	1,520 000
Fortifications	850,000
West Point	150,000
Harbors, &c.	1,430,000
Additional appropriations for Public service	200.000
New army bill	723,000
New Indian treaties	1,700,000
		6,573,000
Miscellaneous appropriations not enumerated		1,000,000
		$33,898,000

Of the above appropriations, about thirteen millions are for extraordinary purposes, ten millions of which belong to the Indian service alone.

This will make the aggregate charge upon the year, including the appropriations of former years unexpended on the 1st January last, 47,000,000 dollars.

Mr. PETRIKIN remarked that this bill was a perfect omnibus, loaded by passengers from all quarters of the Union to ensure its passage, and to prevent it from being farther loaded, and to save a few millions from being drained from an already exhausted Treasury, he demanded the previous question, but the House did not sustain the motion.

Mr. SERGEANT made a brief reply to Mr. CAMBRELENG, who rejoined in a few words, and after some remarks from Messrs. SIBLEY, McKENNAN, PHILLIPS, and THOMPSON, when all but two of the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. FAIRFIELD had moved to accept the amendment appropriating $8,000 for completing the pier of Kennebunk, Maine, and the question coming up thereupon, Mr. F. defended the appropriation with much zeal and warmth. The clause had been stricken out on motion of Mr. EVANS on the representation of some lawyer living in Kennebunk, who had written to Mr. E. that a large majority of the inhabitants wished the work to be suspended, and that, in this, they were joined by the shipowners and masters of vessels there. In reply, Mr. F. dwelt on the great importance of the structure, and the necessity of continuing it, and expressed an earnest hope that the House would not concur in striking out the item.

Mr. EVANS again supported the motion to strike out the appropriation, on the grounds stated by him in committee, and adverted to by his colleague. He also added the opinion of another resident of Kennebunk, largely interested there, and a State councillor, which opinion was the same as that of the others in regard to the work. Mr. E. addressed the House at length, and with much earnestness against it.

Mr. McKENNAN gave notice of an amendment he intended to move (as in committee) for the annual appropriation for surveys.

Mr UNDERWOOD gave notice of a motion to strike out the item for improving New river, North Carolina.

[The amendment was cut off by the prevous question, and the appropriation, consequently, retained.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD then rejoined to his colleague, in defence of the appropriation for Kennebunk.

Mr. GRANT said he had hoped they might have voted on the various propositions instead of discussing them, but finding that not to be the case, after some further remarks, he moved the previous question, which was seconded—yeas 82, nays 43.

Mr. ROBERTSON then moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr E. WHITTLESEY asked for the yeas and nays: ordered.

It being within three minutes of 2 o'clock, several members suggested that the House take its recess, but others objecting,

Mr. MALLORY moved an adjournment, (that is, till to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock,) and upon this, on the call of Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, the yeas and nays being ordered, were 35 to 122.

EVENING SESSION.

The House convened again at half past three o'clock, p. m. but the attendance being thin.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved a call of the House.

The CHAIR said, at that stage, the previous question having been seconded, the motion would not be in order.

Mr. STEWART moved an adjournment; which was negatived—16 to 79.

The question then recurring upon Mr. ROBERTSON'S motion to lay the bill on the table, was then taken and rejected—yeas 58, nays 96.

The question "Shall the main question be now put?" was then agreed to without a division; the House refusing the yeas and nays on the call of Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays on the main question, which, being ordered, were—yeas 104, nays 74.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was put on its passage.

Mr. MARTIN then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to examine into, and report on, each item of appropriation, and strike out such as a majority of the committee believe not to be proper.

Mr. M. gave, among others, as reasons for this motion, the facts developed in the debate between the two gentlemen from Maine, that a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means were opposed to the bill, and the admission made by the gentleman who had charge of it, that the particular items had not undergone examination. He also adverted to the fact that another appropriation was in this bill for Red river, while a special bill has already passed for that work.

[In the reference made to the Kennebunk appropriation by Mr. M. he yielded the floor, and Messrs. FAIRFIELD and EVANS again renewed the controversy in reference to that item, with much warmth of retort, but in perfect good humor.]

Mr. GRANT stated one fact in reply to Mr. MARTIN, within his own knowledge, that the distinguished and lamented gentleman who reported the bill [Mr. McKIM] did examine and revise every item in it, item by item, with the reports and estimates of the War Department. Mr. G. demanded the previous question; which was seconded—89 to 45.

[Pending the announciation of the tellers report to the SPEAKER, and before the CHAIR had announced the result, the following proceedings took place:

Mr J. L. WILLIAMS of Tennessee moved a call of the House: lost, only 43 voting for it.

Mr. STUART moved an adjournment, and asked for the yeas and nays. Both motions rejected.

The CHAIR then announced the result of the first vote.]

The main question having been ordered, was propounded and agreed to—yeas 108, nays 81.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. J L. WILLIAMS then moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. FOSTER demanded the previous question.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. GRANT inquired the effect of this motion, if it prevailed.

The CHAIR said the bill would cohere, and would also be laid on the table.

The motion was disagreed to by the House.

The previous question was seconded and carried, and the House refused to reconsider.

AFFAIRS WITH MEXICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, received in the course of the day:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In further compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st of March last, requesting papers on the subject of the relations between the United States and Mexico, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred, supplementary to the report of that officer communicated with my message to the House of Representatives of the 27th of April last. M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, July 4, 1838.

The Message was accompanied by two large bundles of papers.

Mr. HOWARD moved to refer the whole to a select committee of three members, for the purpose of examining and reporting to the House what portion thereof should be printed.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the usual course would be taken, by laying on the table and printing these documents, as they were of great importance. He happened to know something about them.

Mr. HOWARD knew something about them too, and was satisfied there were not a dozen papers in the whole mass of the slightest possible consequence.

Mr. ADAMS moved to lay them on the table and print, remarking that their contents involved the questions of peace and war with Mexico.

A division of the question having been called for, it was taken on laying on the table, and agreed to; and the question recurring on that to print,

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he hoped the House would not order so very voluminous a document as this to be printed, till the Committee on Foreign Affairs had had an opportunity of examining whether it was worth it or not, or what part merited that expense.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 103, nays 80, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Brodhead, Buchanan, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, DeGraff, Dennis, Dromgoole, Dunn, Edwards, Farrington, Foster, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, James Graham, Grantland, Grant, Griffin, Hamer, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, T. B Jackson, J. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Lyon, Mallory, McKay, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Milligan, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Samuel W. So the House laid the motion to print on the table

STEAM EXPLOSIONS.

On motion of Mr BRIGGS, the House took up the "bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels impelled in whole or part by steam."

The bill was from the Senate. and the House had agreed to various amendments, the question being now on its third reading. When the bill was last up, the previous question was pending. That question was now carried, and the bill put on its passage. Read a third time and passed.

The CHAIR suggested that bills on the Speaker's table be taken up, which would greatly facilitate the public business. Cries of "agreed," "agreed."

Mr. CURTIS interposed a motion to go into Committee on the Union: lost.

Sundry bills were laid on the table temporarily.

The joint resolution to lease [gratuitously] lands for the cultivation of the mulberry and sugar beet, was taken up for consideration.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN an amendment was agreed to excepting the lots about the Capitol, and the resolution was ordered to a third reading.

POST ROUTE BILL.

The amendments of the Committee on the Union to this bill, were all concurred in, and the bill having been further amended,

Mr. TOWNS moved to reconsider the vote concurring in the amendments of the Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of non-concurring in the amendment abolishing the Southern express mail.

After some conversation,

Mr. HARLAN, for the purpose of bringing the House to a vote, demanded the previous question on that motion; which prevailed, but the House refused to reconsider—ayes 27, noes 105.

Mr. H. demanded the previous question on the third reading of the bill; which prevailed, and the bill was ordered to a third reading, then read a third time, and being put on its passage,

Mr. TOWNS moved to recommit the bill to restore the Southern express mail, and expatiated upon the injustice of abolishing the Southern express line from Gaston, North Carolina, to Mobile, Alabama, when not a solitary being had asked for its repeal. Mr. T. went into a statement, demonstrating that this route had been a very profitable one, producing an annual nett revenue of upwards of $50,000 over and above every expense.

Mr. HARLAN regarded the express mail as a complete humbug, got up to subserve the interests of Southern speculators and planters to forestall the market, by getting the earliest European intelligence. Mr. H. moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. RIBTT, who assured the gentleman from Kentucky that the object of the express mail was directly the reverse of what he had stated, and such most certainly had been its effect. The operation of the express mail put early intelligence within the reach of all, placed all upon an equal footing, but before its establishment the packet news was monopolized by a few wealthy speculators. Mr. R. according to promise, renewed the motion for the previous question, stating of course, that he should vote against it.

Mr. HAYNES and other gentlemen entreated Mr. HARLAN to withdraw it, but he declined, and the House seconded it—81 to 42, and the bill was passed.

Mr. ROBERTSON gave notice of a motion to reconsider the vote laying on the table, the motion to print the Mexican documents.

On motion, at half past seven, p. m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, July 4, 1838.

The CHAIR communicated to the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, containing a statement from Mr. Hassler in relation to weights and measures: read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLAY presented a memorial, by the citizens of Westmoreland county, in Virginia, against the adoption of the Sub-Treasury system, and asking, earnestly asking, that a Bank the United States may be established.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported House bill for the relief of Captain John Downs, without amendment.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported "the bill confirming certain entries of public lands, permitted to be made by registers and receivers of land districts, under the belief that the tract had been offered at public sale," which had been received from the House with amendments, and recommended a concurrence therein; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Library, to whom had been referred a resolution in relation to the Madison Papers, eported the same, with an amendment, which was adopted, rand the resolution ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the bill from the House "to repeal a part of the second section of an act entitled, an act to provide for the organization of the Department of Indian Affairs, with an amendment. On this bill and amendment. a debate ensued, in which Messrs. WHITE, LYON, TIPTON, and others took part, when the bill and amendment were ordered to a third reading.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the amendments of the House to the bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes, reported the same, and recommended a concurrence therein.

Mr. PIERCE, though friendly to an increase of the army, was decidedly opposed to some of the provisions of the bill, and addressed the Senate at some length, denouncing them as invidious, unequal, and unjust to officers in the line, and partial to those of the staff.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also spoke against the provisions, and said that the only way to arrest these abuses was to reject the bill itself, which had better be altogether lost than that such injustice should be done. He enumerated at length those abuses which appeared to him to be most glaring in their effects.

Mr. BENTON explained the merits of the bill, and contended that while it bore on its face a great apparent increase of expenditure, it would, in fact, be a means of saving to the Government,

The question having been taken on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives, it was carried in the affirmative; when

Mr. BENTON obtained leave, by unanimous consent, to bring in a supplemental bill; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c- That the act to which this is a supplement shall be, and the same hereby is, explained, limited, and modified as follows:

First. Nothing contained in said act shall be so construed as to allow to any officer additional rations for time past, commonly called back rations.

Second. The posts at which chaplains shall be allowed, shall be limited to the number of twenty, and shall be first approved by the Secretary of War, and shall be confined to places most destitute of instruction.

Third. That so much of said act as requires assistant quarter-masters to be separated from the line, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Fourth. That the number of lieutenants authorized by said act to be added and transferred to the Ordinance Department shall be limited to twelve.

Fifth. That the monthly pay of a private soldier, raised by said act to eight dollars, shall be limited and fixed at seven dollars a month; one dollar thereof shall be retained, as provided for in said act.

Sixth. That no compensation shall be allowed to officers of the Engineer Department for disbursements of public money, while superintending public works.

Seventh. That the three Commissaries of Subsistence, authorized by said act, shall not be separated from the line of the Army.

Eighth. That so much of said act as allows one hundred and sixty acres of land to soldiers who shall have served ten consecutive years, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

REPEAL OF THE DEPOSIT ACT.

Mr. WRIGHT then moved that the Senate proceed to consider the amendment of the House to the bill to modify the last clause of the fifth section of the deposite act of the 23d June, 1836 when

Mr. WEBSTER said he should concur most readily in this amendment of the House. It gave him the truest pleasure to learn that the House had rejected the second section of the bill, and that it had done so by so decisive a majority. The House had thus arrested the surrender of all control over the public Treasure to the Executive. It had interposed its own high authority in a most constitutional and salutary manner; a manner highly becoming the representatives of a free people. For all this (said Mr. W.) I feel highly grateful; and at this result, I think, the whole country may be justly congratulated.

Mr. NORVELL rose to express his dissent to the motion to concur with the House of Representatives in striking out the second section of the bill. He could not consent to give a vote which implied the opinion that the local banks, over which this Government had no control, ought to be the depositories of its moneys, and of the revenues of the nation, and on that question he asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. N. afterwards withdrew the call.

Mr. PRESTON renewed the call for the yeas and nays. He desired to record his own vote at least on so important a measure.

Mr. CLAY said, though he had not obtained all that was desired, he should vote most cordially and heartily for the amendment. Without it, or at least in the shape the bill was sent from the Senate, it left all to Executive discretion; but, as it then was, it gave some semblance of legal control over the subject.

The yeas and nays having been taken, there appeared for concurring 29, against it 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wall, Williams, and Young—17.

The bill regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet officers was read a third time; and on the question, shall this bill pass.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he had as high an opinion of the merits of Gen. Jones as any man could have, and that if the Senator from South Carolina, who had the bill under his charge, would consent that the bill should so amended that Gen. Jones should receive brevet pay from and after the passage of the act, it should receive his support; but he had no idea of giving it a retrospective bearing.

Mr. SEVIER said they had defeated a bill in the Senate the other day in relation to the same matter—giving brevet pay to Gen. Macomb. He thought both bills should share the same fate; and he, therefore, should move its indefinite postponement.

Some explanations having been given by Mr. PRESTON, the motion for indefinite postponement was withdrawn.

Mr. P. went into a long explanation of the services of Gen. Jones, and the claims his gallantry had upon his country. He said, however, that he would not object to the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and the old principle that half a loaf was better than no bread.

Mr. LYON renewed the motion for indefinite postponement; and the question was taken by yeas and nays, and lost; 14 voting for it, and 21 against it.

The bill was then passed by a vote of 21 yeas, to 16 nays.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the title of the bill was so amended as to read "An act to regulate the pay of the Adjutant General when a brevet officer."

The bills mentioned in the last proceedings as ordered to be engrossed, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The resolution for the printing of the Madison papers was read a third time and passed.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, presented a report, from that committee, of considerable length, in which they unanimously recommend to the Senate the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That after a careful examination and deliberate consideration of the whole controversy between the United States and Great Britain relative to the Northeastern boundary of the former, the Senate does not entertain a doubt of the entire practicability of running and marking that boundary in strict conformity with the stipulations of the definitive treaty of peace of seventeen hundred and eighty-three; and entertain a perfect conviction of the justice and validity of the title of the United States to the full extent of all the territory in dispute between the two powers.

Resolved, further, That, considering that more than half a century has elapsed since the conclusion of that treaty; considering the extraordinary delay which has hitherto marked the negotiations and proceedings of the Governments of the two countries, in their endeavor amicably to settle the controversy; and considering the danger of mutual irritation and collisions upon the border of kindred and friendly nations from further procrastination, the Senate cannot forbear to express an earnest desire that the pending negotiation should be brought to a close, and the final decision of the dispute be made as early as practicable.

Resolved, That, as it would be inexpedient for the United States to proceed, upon their separate authority, to survey and mark the Northeastern boundary, until all reasonable means of effecting that object by the consent and concurrence of both parties shall have been exhausted, the "bill to provide for surveying the Northeastern boundary line of the United States according to the treaty of seventeen hundred and eighty-three" ought not to pass; and it is therefore ordered that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. CLAY, of Ky. rose to say that he had been very anxious that the report should be read and weighed with all the attention and consideration belonging to so grave and important a subject; that he should take the opportunity to say, while he was up, that the question had been most deliberately and carefully examined in the committee; that the report, which was the work of the Chairman, was prepared with very great ability; that much labor had been devoted to it, in the short space that had been allowed, and which was the more creditable to its author, amid his other various and pressing duties; and that it was well calculated to advance his high character before the country.

He was anxious, he said, to take the sense of the Senate upon the subject of the resolutions which were recommended, with as little delay as was possible.

Mr. TALLMADGE followed, and observed that, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, he had carefully and attentively examined the subject of the report, and that he concurred entirely with the Senator from Kentucky as to the talent and ability with which it was drawn up, and the manner in which it presented the great question. If, unhappily, said Mr. T. at any time hereafter any collision should arise between the two countries, which he hoped most sincerely would be avoided, it was very important, in his view, that the people of the country should understand the merits of the controversy. They were set forth in that report in a condensed, and, at the same time, sufficiently complete and ample manner to enable them fully to comprehend and understand it. The report ought, therefore, to be widely and extensively circulated. It was calculated to unite and concentrate the sentiment of the country, if that occasion, which he earnestly deprecated, should ever arise. He should, therefore, move for the printing of an extra number of copies, the largest that should be thought proper; and he therefore moved for the printing of 10,000 extra copies; which, afterwards, at the suggestion of Mr. WILLIAMS, supported by other gentlemen, he increased to 20,000.

Mr. RIVES also expressed his cordial and entire concurrence in the remarks which had been made by his colleagues on the committee. The report was drawn with distinguished ability, clearness, and force. The argument on both sides was fairly represented, and the paper would compare, to great advantage, with whatever had been written, that he had seen, upon the subject. It was very important that the merits of the question should be made familiar to the American mind; and no document, he conceived, was better calculated to enlighten and conduct it to sound conclusions. He should vote, therefore, with the greatest pleasure, for the number of copies proposed by the gentleman from New York, and for the highest number, indeed, any Senator might deem it expedient to have published.

Mr. WILLIAMS said: The great importance of the question, and the able manner in which it was treated, and our right maintained in the report now made, induce me to desire that a larger number than that proposed by the Senator from New York should be printed. Every one must see that important results may grow out of the report and resolutions now adopted; and it is very desirable that as many of our citizens as can be induced to look at the question, should have the means at hand of understanding it, and of being convinced that we are claiming our right, and nothing more. This report, coming from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and from Senators possessing the confidence of the nation, must carry conviction to the mind of every man who will read it, and, therefore, I would ask that twenty thousand copies may be ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN said: I shall vote for the printing of the largest number of this report. It cannot be disguised that this controversy has already assumed a very imposing aspect; so much so, indeed, as to render it more than possible that the united energies of this people may be required in its future adjustment; and yet so exclusively local has the question been hitherto considered, that its discussion has excited public attention in no other quarter of the Union than that more immediately interested in it. It has not, therefore, as yet, penetrated the interior of the country, or caught the attention of the great body of the American people. This state of things can no longer exist. The controversy has now taken a form that must interest, in this settlement, every citizen of the Republic. I have heard, with deep attention, the discussion in the Senate, and I can sincerely declare, that, in my judgment, no proposition was ever more free from embarrassment, or title better established, than is that of the State of Maine to every inch of the territory she claims. Inasmuch, therefore, as this controversy with Great Britain has assumed an aspect by no means auspicious to the future harmony of the two nations, I am for placing before our countrymen this report as evidence of the justice of our claims, and of the position which our Government has taken, in order that the public judgment, and with it the public energies of the nation, may be concentrated in support of that claim, in any emergency to which its adjustment may give rise. With this view, I shall vote for the printing of the largest number.

Mr. CLAY said that, among other considerations, which operated with him, he confessed that he wished the subject to be acted on this day. [Mr. C. was understood to allude to its being 4th of July.] As he advanced in life, he acknowledged the influence of feelings and sentiments which might be regarded as bordering on superstition. There was, at all events, it appeared to him, peculiar fitness in resolving, on the 4th of July, 1838, to maintain the integrity and inviolability of the old thirteen United States, whose independence was proclaimed on that memorable day.

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolutions reported by the committee, and they were agreed to nem. con.; and, on motion, twenty thousand additional copies of the report and resolutions were ordered to be printed.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, July 5, 1838.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, on leave, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to provide for erecting fire-proof offices for each surveying district of the public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. J. asked leave to report some other bills; but Mr. HARRISON and Mr. LINCOLN objected, unless Mr. ADAMS would give way for all the committees to report.

Mr. ADAMS then again occupied the whole time devoted to morning business, in his speech on Texas, at the end of which, he asked to be permitted to proceed.

Mr. ELMORE moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose; for it must be manifest that great injustice would be done if this speech went out without some reply.

Mr. DROMGOOLE coincided that the grossest injustice had been done the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion was not agreed to, and Mr. ADAMS has the floor again for to-morrow.

The joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to lease lands for the cultivation of the mulberry and sugar beet, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONNOR in the Chair, and, on motion of the same gentleman, took up the

INDIAN ANNUITY BILL;

Being the annual "bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year 1838."

The bill was read through at length, and some amendments moved by Messrs. CAMBRELENG, EVERETT, and BELL, being agreed to, the bill was laid aside to be reported.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The committee then took up the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States, for the year 1838.

An amendment of Mr. LEGARE, to increase the item for Charleston from $100,000 to $175,000, after some remarks from him and Mr. ELMORE, was agreed to.

Mr. BRONSON moved an additional item of $3,000 for Fort Niagara; which was agreed to—78 to 48.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, moved an amendment for New Orleans; which was rejected.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the "bill to provide for the support of the Military Academy for the year 1838," was next taken up.

Mr. HAYNES explained its provisions.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS submitted the substitute laid on the table some time since, (February 22.)

The substitute was disagreed to.

Mr. KEMBLE moved an appropriation of $20,000 to rebuild the structure destroyed by fire in February last, agreed to.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to strike out sundry appropriations, but ineffectually.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported, and, on motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the House took up the

MEMBERS' BOOKS BILL,

The title of which is as follows: "A bill authorizing the purchase of certain books for distribution among the members of the House of Representatives."

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to strike out the enacting clause: lost.

The bill was ordered to be reported.

UNITED STATES COURTS OF NEW YORK.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the committee considered the bill to increase and regulate the terms of the Circuit and District Courts of New York.

The committee then rose and reported the bills acted on to the House; and, the time having arrived,

The House took its recess.

EVENING SESSION.

At the meeting of the House, at 3 o'clock, several Senate bills were read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Union, Mr. CASEY in the chair.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. MERCER to take up the New Harbor bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the committee rise, and report the bills already acted on.

Mr. MERCER insisted upon his motion being put, and also that a motion to rise was debatable; but the CHAIR [Mr. CASEY] deciding otherwise, Mr. M. took an appeal, which was debated for some time, when the CHAIR was sustained.

The committee then rose—73 to 49.

The Indian Annuity bill was taken up, all the amendments concurred in, and the bill ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

The Fortification bill coming up,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to lay the bill on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused; and, the motion being disagreed to, the amendments were concurred in, and the bill ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

The West Point Academy bill being next in order, and the amendment of the Committee of the Whole having been concurred in,

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS renewed his substitute, and asked for the yeas and nays thereon; which were ordered, and were—yeas 38, nays 106.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. W. then moved to lay the bill on the table: lost.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

The bill to authorize the purchase of certain books for members of the House of Representatives, was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. RENCHER then moved to lay the bill on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 57, nays 99.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table, and the bill was passed.

The bill to increase and regulate the terms of the northern district of New York was ordered to a third reading, and then passed.

Mr. MERCER, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Wisconsin Road bill, made a report of their agreement; which was concurred in, and the bill passed.

Mr. DOWNING moved to recommit the bill authorizing the people of Florida to form a State constitution, to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, the bill in relation to the North-eastern boundary was recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CASEY in the chair.

After several motions for priority of business, the committee divided for taking up the

NEW HARBOR BILL;

the vote being, ayes 76, noes 74.

The bill was then read by the Clerk.

Mr. MERCER submitted an amendment making appropriations for sundry works therein mentioned.

Mr. DAWSON asked if they were going into a new harbor bill, at that period of the session, when only 137 members were present, and involving the country in an expenditure, in the end, of at least one hundred millions of dollars. To test the sense of the House, he moved to strike out the enacting clause. He went on to demonstrate that the whole scheme was the result of a combination of interests and sections, for the purpose of plundering the people.

The debate was continued by Messrs. MERCER, CUSHMAN, CAMBRELENG, BIDDLE, and ROBERTSON.

Mr. HALL opposed the bill. He wanted to see the old works completed, or put in a state of probable completion, before new ones were authorized to be commenced. His own opinion was that few of them, if any, ever would be completed, so long as the Government continued to appropriate money for them, since it was not only for the interest of the localities that money should be expended there, but also of those who had charge of its disbursement.

Mr. ALLEN of Ohio remarked that he had not risen to inflict a speech on the committee at this time of the evening, and after a ten hours' sitting, when all must be anxious to breathe a different atmosphere than the one by which they were surrounded, especially when there was such a mass of business yet to be acted upon, and but two days in which to do it. But he felt compelled to say, in reply to the gentleman from Vermont, who had just taken his seat, [Mr. HALL,] that he was greatly mistaken, in Mr. A's opinion, in the declaration that the harbors now progressing would not be finished, so long as money was supplied to keep them in a forward movement. The reason assigned is, that the superintendents were interested in delaying their completion, as they received a salary for their services, or a commission on the money expended, and hence it was for their advantage to protract the time, and to enlarge the expense. Mr. A. said he was acquainted with the history of several of the harbors on Lake Erie, and he fully believed money had never been more judiciously, beneficially, and economically applied. The works were all under the general control of skilful officers of the United States; and the immediate superintendents, who made the contracts and disbursements, he thought, in no instance, received any thing like a fair equivalent for their services, and who must, therefore, be actuated by other considerations than a mere pecuniary one, so far at least as it regarded that paid by the Government. He had never known or heard of a case of peculation or fraud, and but few of bad management. Their employment saved the expense of keeping comparatively high paid officers to perform the same duties, and, he believed, they were much more interested in urging their works to a speedy termination rather than the reverse. It was true these harbors continued to make demands on the Treasury, but it was because the original plans were not yet executed in some cases, while in others experience suggested deviations from them, for they were all matters of experiment when commenced. He could assure the opponents of the system that its friends would halt where they were, if they supposed the cost was to be unreasonable, compared with the advantages to be derived from it; but they believed it warranted by the Constitution, and that the necessities of the country, general and local, demanded its continuance, though its benefits could only be duly appreciated by those who had witnessed its effects.

In the year 1825, there was but a single steamboat above the Falls of Niagara, she making, "solitary and alone," an unprofitable and hazaardous voyage once in ten days from Buffalo to Detroit and back. Then, too, there were but twenty or thirty small shallops, dignified, it is true, by the name of schooners now, instead of one steamboat, there are nearly sixty, some of them of 800 tons burthen, costing an hundred thousand dollars and more, and, as a class, inferior to none afloat; instead of the twenty or thirty shallops, there are now 200 ships, brigs, and schooners, honestly such. But this fleet never could have had existence but for the facilities for receiving and discharging cargoes furnished by artificial harbors, constituting, also, places of refuge to which to flee in time of need. There are few naturn harbors on any of the lakes, and till the construction of those by the Government on Lake Erie, vessels were often driven by storms from one end of it to the other, unless sooner driven on shore, or to the bottom. Such was still the case on Lakes Huron and Michigan, and would long continue to be, if the policy so happily began and so advantageously prosecuted, was now to be arrested.

But the business on the lakes had but just commenced; Ohio had now 400 miles of canal in operation, and was constructing as much more; Indiana was expending ten millions on canals and railroads; Illinois and the infant State of Michigan, each half as much. These all tended to the lakes, and would soon very greatly increase the business upon them.

Mr. A. thought there were equitable considerations pertaining to this matter, so far as the West was concerned. The people of what was once the Northwest Territory, had paid as large an amount of money into the Treasury for duties on imported goods as any equal number of people elsewhere; for whatever might be the doctrine south of the Potomac, his own was, that it was not cotton, but consumers, who paid the duties. In addition, they had paid sixty-two millions for public lands, being six-tenths of all the receipts from that source. Ohio, alone, had paid twenty two millions, more than one-fifth of all the receipts, but she had got but about one-sixth of the land, for much of her land was bought under the old system, when the minimum price was two dollars the acre. Hence it had cost about one dollar and seventy-six cents, while the average in the other States had been but one dollar and thirty-one cents, making an excess of more than five millions paid by Ohio. He did not propose to ask its return in the present exhausted situation of the Treasury, and had only alluded to it as a reason why he thought we ought not to be especially astute in seeking to discover how we might withhold or curtail appropriations for the Northwestern States in general, and Ohio in particular. The interest on the excess referred to, for a single year, would equal all the money ever expended by the General Government in Ohio, for her exclusive benefit, without taking the appropriations for the National road into account, which were based upon a totally different footing.

In conclusion, he would say he thought the opponents of the new harbors ought to find better reasons for their opposition than merely that some of the old harbors were yet unfinished.

The debate was continued by Messrs. MARVIN, GOODE, MALLORY, REED, EVANS, RHETT, THOMPSON, SERGEANT, and Mr. POPE, who moved that the committee rise; which motion prevailed—ayes 100, noes 25. So the committee rose.

The amendments to the bill to authorize a commission to test the usefulness of inventions to prevent steam explosions, were concurred in, and the bill passed.

Sundry bills from the Senate were read twice, and referred.

On motion, at half past nine o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, July 5, 1838

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial from certain citizens of Boston, praying the adoption of a system in relation to the control of steam navigation: laid on the table.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill granting to Mississippi land for purposes of internal improvement, and moved its reference to the Committee on the Public Lands: concurred in.

Mr. STRANGE presented documents relating to the claim of F. P. Blair; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William B. Stokes and others; which was concurred in.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, July 6, 1838.

At the suggestion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, and on motion of Mr. STUART, it was ordered that, immediately after the recess this afternoon, the committees be called on for reports.

ANNEXATION OF TEXAS.

Mr. ADAMS resumed his speech on this subject. As this subject has been under discussion so long, it may be necessary to restate it.

On the 13th of June, Mr. DROMGOOLE, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, upon the subject of the annexation of Texas to the United States, reported, that there is now no proposition pending in this House either for the admission of the Republic of Texas as a State into the Union, or for its territorial annexation to the United States.

The committee do not deem it advisable to recommend any action on the part of the House of Representatives calculated to prejudge any such proposition should it hereafter be formally submitted for decision, or to forestal public sentiment in relation thereto. In consideration whereof, the following resolution is reported:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the whole subject, and that all the papers relating thereto, and to them referred, be laid on the table.

Mr. CUSHING on the same day called for a division of the question, so that it might be taken first upon that part of the report which proposed to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and next on that to lay on the table. The first branch, being debatable, opened the merits of the question, and Mr. C. made some remarks thereupon, dissenting from the report, and moved its recommitment, for the purpose of having the subject more deliberately and argumentatively presented to the House, coupling his motion with instructions to that effect.

On the following day (the 14th) Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina moved the following additional instruction to Mr. CUSHING:

Strike out all after "instructions," and insert: "To report a joint resolution directing the President to take the proper steps for the annexation of Texas to the United States, as soon as it can be done consistently with the treaty stipulations of this Government."

On the 15th Mr. ADAMS made a motion to recommit the report to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to report the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the power of annexing the people of any independent foreign State to this Union is a power not delegated by the Constitution of the United States to their Congress, or to any department of their Government, but reserved by the people.

"That any attempt by act of Congress or by treaty to annex the Republic of Texas to this Union would be a usurpation of power, unlawful and void, and which it would be the right and the duty of the free people of the Union to resist and annul."

This motion was made by Mr. A. by the courtesy of Mr. HOWARD, who, being entitled to the floor, yielded it to the former gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. ADAMS took the floor on that day, and has kept possession of it, for the morning hour ever since, with a few occasional intermissions for some reports from committees, nd has it still, not having concluded this morning.

The orders of the day having been passed to—

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to certain claims for land in the district of Vincennes, Indiana, which was laid on the table.

The House took up the amendment of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers in vessels impelled in whole or in part by steam.

Mr. THOMAS moved the concurrence of the House, with a further amendment, so as to subject persons employed, as well as the owners, to a civil prosecution, but subsequently withdrew it, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Yesterday being the last day that bills originating in the House could be sent to the other branch, the House proceeded to take up Senate bills.

Mr. TOUCEY moved that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the anti-duelling bill; but the motion did not succeed.

The bill for the relief of Mary A. Patrick was read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Fisher, deceased, was also passed.

The bill for the relief of Everard Meade was laid on the table.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Francis Cazeau had been reported from the Committee of the Whole, with the enacting clause stricken out.

Mr. WHITE moved to non-concur in this amendment; and after some remarks in support of the bill from Mr. W. and Mr. THOMAS, and by Mr. PETRIKIN in opposition to it, on whose motion the bill was laid on the table; ayes 88, noes 56.

The bill for the relief of John Brooks was laid on the table, on motion of Mr. HALL.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the joint rule, so as to send to the Senate two bills, one making an appropriation for books to members, and the other in relation to the northern district of New York.

The motion prevailed, and the resolution was agreed to.

The bill for the relief of Robert White, on motion of Mr. HALL, was laid on the table.

The bill to revive the act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, as reported from the Committee of the Whole, with sundry amendments, was taken up.

Mr. JONES of New York, moved to lay it on the table: lost—ayes 57, noes not counted.

The question being on concurring with the amendments.

Mr. PETRIKIN presented a remonstrance from certain citizens of the District, against the passage of the bill.

Mr. P. also, made an argument against it.

Mr. REED briefly advocated the bill.

Mr. BOULDIN would not make an argument for or against the bill, though he had reported it, but he confessed he had no very great relish for it.

Mr. TAYLOR advocated the bill, and offered an amendment precluding any one who had not regularly diplomaticed elsewhere.

After some further remarks from Messrs. BOON, TAYLOR, and MALLORY, the amendment of Mr. T. was agreed to; also, the amendments of the Senate; when,

Mr. JONES of New York, renewed the motion to lay the bill on the table: lost, only 55 voting for it.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, then read a third time, and passed.

The bill to authorize John E. Metcalf and others to locate certain pre-emption claims to land in Indiana; was, on motion of Mr. BOON, put on its passage.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked for an explanation of its provisions.

Mr. HARLAN made some remarks in opposition to it, and moved to lay it on the table, but withdrew the motion, at the request of Mr. WHITE, who made some explanation of the justice and propriety of the provisions of the act.

The bill was rejected.

FALMOUTH AND ALEXANDRIA RAILROAD COMPANY.

The bill of the House, granting to the above named company the right of way through the District of Columbia, had came down from the Senate with an amendment, proposing to appropriate towards this work the sum of three thousand dollars, upon certain conditions, as carrying the mails free of cost, &c. In this amendment the Committee of the Whole had non-concurred, and the bill was now brought into the House for final action.

Mr. MERCER made an earnest argumentative speech in defence of this amendment.

Mr. CUSHMAN was opposed to the amendment and bill, as was Mr. MALLORY. The latter moved to lay the bill on the table, but withdrew the motion at the request of his colleague,

Mr. BANKS, who was in favor of the bill, spoke at some length in defence of the amendment, and in reply to the objections adduced by different members against it.

Mr. WISE said that this bill would save the Government seven thousand dollars a year, if passed, for the carrying of the mails. It was a work of national importance, and he would move the previous question.

There was a second: and the main question was ordered to be put, viz: Will the House concur with the Senate in their amendment?

Mr. CUSHMAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

A motion was made to lay the bill on the table, and the yeas and nays demanded and ordered thereon; and the motion was carried by the following vote—yeas 88, nays 73. So the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

A PRE-EMPTION BILL.

An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands who are deprived of the benefits of the pre-emption act of the 19th June, 1834. This bill, having come down from the Senate, had been amended by the Committee of the Whole, and the first question was upon that amendment; which was concurred in.

Mr. CHAPMAN said, that having reported the bill as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and being called on by some gentlemen now to explain its provisions, he would do so, though very briefly, as it was not his intention, at that late period of the session, unnecessarily to consume the time of the House.

He said that the class of individuals for whose relief the bill was intended, was, perhaps, the most meritorious of all those who are embraced under the provisions of the pre-emption law of 1834. They were entitled, under that act, to pre-emptions; had settled in the Creek and Choctaw nations after the late treaties with those tribes; resided upon the land they had improved at the passage of the act, and cultivated, as required in 1833. By the treaties with those tribes, it is provided that certain Indians should be allowed reservations, to be located by agents appointed for that purpose subsequently. Those, he said, were floating rights, until located in the manner prescribed by the treaties. In many cases, they were, by authorized agents, placed upon certain lands, and some time afterwards taken up and re-located upon others. In changing those locations, great injury had been done to the most industrious of the settlers; for the main object in taking up the first, and making the second locations, was not so much on account of getting better land, as to secure more valuable improvements. Thus, the most industrious and thrifty among the settlers, those who had made the best and most extensive improvements, were the victims to those last locations. After they had a vested right to enter the lands they had improved, under the act of 1834, and when they felt perfectly secure from all interruption by those floating reservations, knowing they had been already located, their lands were taken by the agent of the Government, and given to the Indians by those subsequent locations. Mr. C. said that he knew many of the most respectable and industrious citizens in his district, who had been ruined by that proceeding. They had been suddenly and unnecessarily driven from their homes by the purchaser of those reservations from the Indians, and their families turned out, at an unseasonable time of the year, under circumstances of great cruelty.

Mr. C. said it was a question, whether the settlers, whose pre-emptions were taken by the subsequent locations, had not the better title. But so it was, they had not contested the rights of Indians, to whom their lands had been assigned, but had appealed to Congress to do them, as far as circumstances would permit, that justice they had been deprived of under the act of 1834. They could not be reinstated in all the rights they had lost, if the bill passed as reported. Mr. C. said the bill under consideration provided that each individual, entitled to enter land under the pre-emption law of 1834, and had been deprived of that right as before stated, should be permitted to enter each a quarter section of any other land in the same land district, not settled upon by any other person, and had not been offered at public sale, by paying Government price; or, at his option, to enter the same quantity of land, subject to private entry, by paying the fees of office only.

Mr. C. said that, in the country where the persons coming within the act resided, there were no valuable lands that could be found that had not already been settled upon; and the best land, unimproved, would be but poor compensation for the loss of their improvements. He said that the lands subject to private entry had been so long in market that few selections could be made sufficiently fertile for cultivation. Mr. C. said that, as the relief provided by the bill, although far short of the loss they had sustained, was the best that could be done under the circumstances, he was willing to accept that, and he hoped the House would not hesitate to grant it.

Some desultory debate occurred between Messrs. WISE, SHIELDS, FILLMORE, HARLAN, and LEWIS.

Mr. WISE was in the act of replying to some remarks of Mr. LEWIS, when the hour arrived to take the usual recess.

The bill being before the House, and being on its third reading—

Mr. PRENTISS of Mississippi obtained the floor, and proceeded to discuss its principles: stating that if this was the last day of the political existence of this Government, let alone the last day of the political existence of this nation, he should debate it. He then went at length into a general opposition to the bill, and gave way to—

Mr. STANLY, who moved that the House adjourn, (at half past 6 o'clock, p. m.)

Mr. BRONSON called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 16, nays 142.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. PRENTISS was about to proceed, when

Mr. ADAMS raised the point of order, that the gentleman could not proceed after it had been determined upon by a majority of the House, without debate or discussion, to ram this highly penal bill down their throats.

The CHAIR pronounced the point itself entirely out of order

Mr. PRENTISS again proceeded, and having concluded,

Mr. WISE followed, and gave way to

Mr. THOMAS, who explained why the bill was postponed to so late a period of the session. Bills originating in the House could not be sent to the other branch within the last three days of the session, and this being a Senate bill, had been compelled to give way to the House bills.

Mr. NAYLOR rose once or twice and interrupted once or twice, but he was ordered to his seat.

Mr. WISE then proceeded, and commenced with the declaration that, unless he could have a pledge that the question would not be forced, he would speak till every bill behind it was destroyed—till the Congress itself had become defunct. Mr. W. spoke till half past eight o'clock, when he yielded the floor to

Mr. JENIFER, who moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. PRENTISS of Mississippi, called for the yeas and nays, which were refused, 17 to 73, (no quorum,) not one-fifth.

Tellers were called for, and, on a division, there were—ayes 42, noes not counted.

Mr. WISE was about to proceed, when

Mr. WEBSTER called for the reading of the rule precluding any member from speaking more than once to any question, without leave of the House.

The CHAIR was aware of the fact, but decided that Mr. WISE had the floor, no one else having addressed the CHAIR.

Mr. WISE expressed his acknowledgments to the SPEAKER, and proceeded for some time. In the course of his remarks he adverted to the defeat of the harbor bill in the Senate, and expressed his unfeigned gratification at that result. At 10 o'clock, p. m. he concluded, and

Mr. JENIFER obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment, but on Mr. MARTIN calling for the yeas and nays, he withdrew the motion, and proceeded with his remarks in opposition to the bill. Mr. J. continued till half past 10 o'clock, when he concluded.

Mr. ANDREWS then demanded the previous question.

Messrs. SERGEANT, NAYLOR, and McKENNAN respectively asked Mr. A. to withdraw the motion, but he declined.

Mr. MARTIN moved a call of the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were, yeas 54, nays 115.

So the call was refused.

The previous question was carried without a division.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the yeas and nays on the main question, being on ordering the bill to a third reading, and the House granted them.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading—yeas 87, nays 79, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Brodhead, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Crary, Cushman, Davee, DeGraff, Duncan, Edwards, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Fry, Gallup, J. Garland, Grantland, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hawkins, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, A. McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, S. W. Morris, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Phelps, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Reily, Rives, Sheffer, Spencer, Steuart, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Towns, Turney, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, T. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Heman Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Bond, Briggs, W. B. Campbell, Chambers, Cheatham, Corwin, Branston, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Dennis, Dromgoole, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Goode, Jas. Graham, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Jenifer, William C. Johnson, Kennedy, Legare, Loncoln, James M. Mason, S. Mason, Maury, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Phillips, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Ridgway, John Robertson, Edward Robinson, Russell, Sergeant, Charles Shepard, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, A. S. White, E. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—79.

The bill being then put on its passage—

Mr. CONNOR demanded the previous question, which prevailed with but a few dissenting voices.

Mr. WISE and Mr. PRENTISS of Mississippi asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the bill was passed without a division.

A motion was then made to adjourn.

Mr. WISE rose, and gave notice that he had voted for this bill in order to be enabled to move a reconsideration, and he now gave notice that he should make that motion to-morrow.

Mr. MERCER. You must do it now.

The CHAIR said unless the motion was regularly made, and entered, the bill would take the usual course, and go to the Senate.

Mr. WISE should make the motion, whether the bill were sent out of the House or not.

Mr. RIVES hoped this matter would be settled at once.

Mr. PRENTISS of Mississippi and Mr. WISE simultaneously moved an adjournment: lost—70 to 85.

Mr. GRAY then rose and said that he had voted in the majority for the passage of this bill; and, in order to prevent any further delay, he moved a reconsideration, and demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and carried, and the main question lost, but a few voices for it; and so the House refused to reconsider.

On motion, at a quarter past 11 o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

WASHINGTON, July 9, 1838.

SIR: In the publication in the Globe of Saturday evening last, of the proceedings in the House of Representatives of the preceding Tuesday, on the bill to modify a portion of the deposite act of 1836, two errors have occurred, to which I beg leave to call your attention.

In publishing the motion of Mr. RIVES, to commit the bill, with instructions, you have left out the words, "or instrumentality," which should have been included. The motion made by him, and on which the vote was taken, was as follows: To commit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, "with instructions so to amend the same as to dispense with the agency, or instrumentality, of banks in the fiscal operations of the Government." After the motion was made by Mr. R. I requested him to modify it, by striking out the words, "or instrumentality," saying, at the same time, that such modification would make it acceptable to me, but he declined to do so.

The other error is much more important. In reporting the motion made by me, to commit the bill with instructions, you have omitted the words, "so as to dispense with the use of banks as depositories thereof."

The motion made by me was in the following words: "That the said bill be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill for the collection, safe keeping, and disbursement, of the public revenue, so as to dispense with the use of banks as depositories thereof."

May I ask of you to make the proposed corrections in the next number of your paper?

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

HENRY A. FOSTER.

F. P. BLAIR, esq.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, July 6, 1838.

The CHAIR announced a communication from the Treasury Department, made in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 28th of February last, showing the amount of revenue lost by the Government in consequence of the non-payment of duty bonds, and the names of the delinquents: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a joint resolution requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be made, under the direction of Mr. Hassler, one standard balance for each State in the Union, and when they are completed, that he cause them to be delivered to the several Governors of the respective States: read twice, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. HUBBARD offered a joint resolution to allow the banks in the District of Columbia to postpone the resumption of their five dollar notes till the 1st of December next, and asked its consideration at the present time; but

Mr. ALLEN objecting, the introduction of the resolution was delayed until to-morrow.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported on several bills from the House that had been referred to that committee.

On motion of Mr. P. the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Mary Snow.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, the Committee on Claims were discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Daniel Laird and D. H. Wilson.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of several memorials that had been referred to that committee.

On motion by Mr. WALL, the Senate reconsidered the vote on rejecting the bill to establish a new judicial district in the Territory of Florida, and it was then read the third time, and passed.

The following bills from the House were severally read the second time, and ordered to a third reading:

The bill ceding to the State of Ohio the interest of the United States in a certain road in said State.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Potter and James Cassidy of North Carolina.

The bill for the relief of John A. Peterson, executor of the last will and testimony of John A. Peterson, deceased.

The bill for the relief of Richard Frisby.

The bill for the relief of A Quartier and Albert of New Orleans.

The following bills from the House were taken up, and considered, and indefinitely postponed:

The bill for the relief of the owners of the schooner Three Brothers.

The bill for the relief of Squire Stearns.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Nimrod Farrow and Richard Harris, was taken up; and after being advocated by Messrs. ROANE, RIVES, and CRITTENDEN, and opposed by Mr. HUBBARD, it was laid on the table—ayes 21, noes 12.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the House, to establish certain post routes, and discontinue others, together with the amendments thereto reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and the amendments being concurred in,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved to strike out the second section of the bill, which discontinues the Express Mail; and after some remarks from Mr. C. in favor of the motion, and from Mr. CRITTENDEN against it, the motion was adopted—yeas 19, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Merrick, Pierce, Roane, Ruggles, Southard, Smith of Indiana, Wall, White, Williams, and Young—13.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The Senate then took a recess from three to half past four o'clock; after which,

Mr. DAVIS moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Harbor bill; which motion was decided in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 11.

Mr. DAVIS, after some remarks, moved to strike out the appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Red river.

Mr. SEVIER said if an appropriation was made next year, it would be too late in the season to use it advantageously. He therefore hoped the gentleman would consent to leave in a small appropriation, say five thousand dollars, to keep the raft from accumulating.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama observed that he had seen a statement going the rounds of all the papers, and which had not been contradicted, announcing, in the most glowing terms, that this great work was completed. The Senator from Arkansas acknowledged that there was a large unexpended balance on hand of the old appropriation, and also admitted that no more work could be done this fall. Why, then, make an appropriation at this session?

Mr. SEVIER said he had already explained that a small appropriation would be necessary to keep the floating timber from accumulating, and forming another raft; and if this appropriation was not made at this session, it must necessarily be made too late in the next to prevent the mischief, and would thereby occasion a great loss of time and additional expense to the Government. He would move to amend the gentleman's motion by a proposition to strike out the appropriation in the bill, and insert in lieu thereof five thousand dollars.

The motion of Mr. DAVIS, as thus amended, was agreed to.

Mr. PRESTON spoke of the enormous appropriations by this bill. This business of making harbors, he said, has increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished. He looked upon it as partial, unjust, and unconstitutional, and had often expressed his decided disapprobation of it. Two years ago, a strong and vigorous effort was made to suppress this growing evil, but in vain. It was the most dangerous system, and the more so, as its very increase held out strong allurements to carry it still further. The appropriation, at this time, was enormous—fourteen hundred thousand dollars; and at a time, too, when the country was so embarrassed, that the money must be borrowed. It was proposed to expend one million and a half of dollars, in round numbers, for a depressed and broken down commerce; for, after all the money that had been expended in this object, our commerce was falling off. Again, as to its inequality. Those who were opposed to it paid their full portion of the expense, while they derived none of the benefits of the system. To illustrate the peculiar position in which he and his southern friends stood, he referred to the motion made by him last year, and which was unsuccessful, to strike from the bill the appropriation for a harbor in his State; and he did this, because he would not have a bribe applied to his State, to enlist her in favor of this odious system. As a test question, to ascertain whether this measure was to pass, and, if so, to what extent it was to be carried, he would move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama observed, that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] was correct in saying that, without the deduction of this little appropriation of $70,000, the appropriations made by this bill exceeded $1,500,000. In order to satisfy himself as to the amount appropriated, he had taken the trouble to make an estimate, setting down each particular item of expenditure; and he found that, on adding it up, it amounted to the vast sum of $1,535,000. Now, he thought it was a very safe policy for a Government, as well as for individuals, before it undertook to expend money, to know they had it to spend. This was a rule he had found useful to himself through life, though, perhaps, he had not always adhered to it as strictly as his interest required. But as regarded the Government, if this wholesome policy was to be departed from at any time, it ought not, in the slightest degree, to be departed from at this time above all others, when they were told that the Treasury was bankrupt, and when they were told that this was a prodigal Administration, whose extravagance and wild experiments had prostrated the business of the country. Was this a time to indulge in the extravagant expenditures contemplated by this bill, when the Government had to borrow money to carry on its ordinary business, and when it had been confidently predicted again and again by the enemies of the Administration, that they would have to borrow more before the end of the year? What was the amount of the expenditures estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury for the current year? A short time ago, apprehending that the appropriations had gone beyond the amount that that officer, whose business it is to keep Congress informed of the resources and probable expenditures of the Government, had estimated for the receipts of the present year, he had turned his particular attention to the subject. He found that the whole amount estimated for the expenses of the current year was about $23,785,219.

It was to be presumed that the Secretary of the Treasury had looked at every branch of expenditure. It was his duty to consider all the various items provided for by this bill, together with the civil list, the army, the navy, the Indian Department, etc. The estimate was really startling, and double the amount that a few years ago would have been considered necessary to sustain the Government; yet they had gone beyond it. Before they passed the army bill, they had transcended the estimate; and since the passage of that bill, and one or two other bills, the excess amounted to a million and a half of dollars. Then here was another bill, appropriating another million and a half, making three millions of expenditure more than was estimated at the opening of Congress. There were, also, other bills in progress; but what amount they appropriated, he was not informed, probably increasing the excess to $10,000,000.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky inquired whether the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury inclued harbors.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama replied that he could not speak with certainty, but he went on the presumption that the Secretary did include the sum necessary for harbors, as it was his duty to do. If the Government was engaged in carrying on such works, it was the duty of the Secretary to take them into the account; and he therefore took it for granted that he had done so. He had a right to presume that the whole range of the expenditures was embraced in the amount, the aggregate of which he had detailed. Independently of this, there were other bills in progress, which, if passed, would increase the excess to the amount of nine or ten millions more. Could the friends of the Administration, then, whether they possessed constitutional scruples or not, make these appropriations at a time when the Treasury was embarrassed, when they would have to borrow every dollar expended, and when they had been charged with prodigality again and again by those verye entlemen who were now urging the passage of this bill? How much of these appropriations could be advantageously expended this season? The period between this and the next session was short; and why, then, go on as if it was at the commencement of the working season, and we had a full Treasury?

In looking back to the estimates and appropriations for the last two years, it was worth while to see how the latter had transcended the former. He found that, in 1836, the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury for the expenditures of that year amounted to $19,738,933 27, and the appropriations to $30,868,164 04, the excess being $19,632,892 25. In 1837, it was very little better; the estimate was $22,651,000, and the excess was seventeen millions and odd dollars. Could it be wondered at then that we are continually embarrassed while such practices are kept up. The Secretary of the Treasury says that a certain sum is necessary to carry on the operations of the Government for the year, and he takes into consideration the whole range of necessary expenditure; yet, said Mr. C. we go on doubling the amount called for by the Secretary, and in the end find ourselves embarrassed and under the necessity of borrowing money: a most natural result from such a state of things. The question for them then to consider was, whether they were to go on increasing their expenditures in this way, embarrass the Treasury, and incur the just imputation of extravagance, or stop where they were, and, by a judicious economy, retrieve their affairs. Before passing this or any other appropriation bill, they ought to call on the Committee of Finance to provide the means to meet them; either by borrowing the money, or by the issue of another ten millions of Treasury notes; they ought to provide the means necessary to enable them to exceed the amount estimated by the proper officer of the Government. He was willing to relinquish, for another year, any amount that his constituents might be interested in this bill, rather than pass these extravagant appropriations, in the present embarrassed state of the Treasury, and he felt bound to vote to postpone it indefinitely, as moved by the Senator from South Carolina, rather than incur expenses which they had not the means of meeting.

Mr. DAVIS said a strange predisposition for economy had suddenly come over the gentleman from Alabama. There were other objects, he thought, of expenditure that would have been more likely to have called forth the opposition of the Senator, yet he (Mr. D) had never heard his voice raised. Why had the harbor bill been particularly selected? Was it not a subject in which all the great leading business matters of the Union were more or less interested? The gentleman says we are appropriating double the estimates made by the Department. The item before them was certainly included in the estimates. He (Mr. D.) was ignorant of the matter, if it were so; but probably the Senator knew better than he did.

[Here Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he was not aware of any vote which would justify the remark of the Senator, and would like the gentleman to particularize.]

Well, sir, I will name some, said Mr. D. There was the army bill, and the bill for Indian treaties, and others. I heard no protest against them, and they might as well have been delayed as this. Mr. D. said he must confess that any opposition to this measure was entirely unlooked for by him. He thought it would have recommended itself to the consideration of every Senator, and be adopted as a matter of course; and now it was proposed to bill indefinitely, or, in other words, to reject it altogether.

Mr. D. contended that these great works of internal improvement had been commenced, and that the Government stood pledged to carry them forward: in what condition then shall we leave these works, if the appropriations are withheld? Mr. D. did not desire at that late period of the session to detain the Senate, but he thought there were general views of the subject that must strike the mind of every Senator. To improve the natural condition of the country, and enlarge its benefits, was the cherished policy of the Government, and certainly all that appertained to commerce and inland trade were closely connected with all the great interests of this whole Union; and that simple consideration in itself should exempt the nation from such sweeping charges of extravagance. A large portion of the expenditure, it was true, was to be on the lakes, in the neighborhood of a young and vigorous country, rich in soil and in resources that constitutes national greatness. Who that had looked upon this matter with the eye of a statesmen, a patriot, would desire to withhold this appropriation. Here Mr. D. went into a description of the dangers of navigation on these lakes; there was, generally speaking, a straight line of coast, and without headlands or harbors to shelter vessels; and were it not that the storms that visited them so frequently were up and down for the most part, rather than across, the dangers would be greatly enhanced; as it was, they were sufficiently numerous in all conscience, and required the fostering aid of the General Government to remove them. He knew of no way that the great and increasing commerce of this region of country could be secured, but by the process set forth by the Government, and he most sincerely trusted the motion of the Senator would not prevail.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama was not aware that his course here, or the votes he had been in the habit of giving, subjected him or rendered him obnoxious to the charge of extravagance. He called on the Senator from Massachusetts, therefore, to particularize the instances in which he had, either by his votes or by his speeches, given sanction to extravagant expenditures. He had hoped that his course here was dictated by the strictest regard for economy, and that the Senate had given him credit for it.

Mr. DAVIS explained. He had made no charge of extravagance against the Senator personally. He had only supposed that some appropriations had passed when the Senator's voice was not heard in opposition to them.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama continued. If the honorable Senator had listened to his votes, instead of looking out for his speeches, he would have found that he [Mr. C.] was always on the side of economy, and that he had resisted every heavy appropriation, except in a few instances in which the public service imperatively required them. He had uniformly pursued this course, not because he was disposed to be niggardly, but because he thought it more consistent with our form of Government, that it should be simply and economically administered. With regard to his vote on the bill for the removal of the Cherokee Indians, the Senator himself, and the whole Senate, was aware of the motives which governed him. He voted for the appropriation, it was true, and he felt bound to give this sum to induce the Indians to remove, rather than incur the expense of going to war. As regarded the increase of the army, he voted for it, but he believed that it was indispensable to the safety of our frontiers, and a more economical mode of defence than to call out the militia, taking them from their proper avocations on every emergency.

He had not said that the appropriations had always doubled the estimates; but in one instance the appropriation wanted but a small fraction of doubling the estimate, and in another to which he had referred, wanted but four or five millions of doubling—though the estimated amounted to the large sum of $22,651,442. His attention had not been called to this subject until lately, and upon investigation he found that we were going beyond our means, and that it was necessary to scrutinize particularly every proposition for increased expenditure, and resist, with more than usual pertinacity, every approach towards extravagance. If gentlemen would look at the various appropriations of this bill, they would find that many of them are not indispensable, and it was not to be presumed that any of the works would suffer from not having appropriations made for them at this session, when it was considered that so short an interval was left before the next session. Besides, if these appropriations were made now, the money could not all be expended during the remainder of the season, though in many cases, he apprehended that the money would be drawn out, and used for purposes of individual speculation, or deposited in bank to be used in that manner. It was from these views that he was opposed to the bill, and he opposed not these appropriations alone, but all others that were not absolutely necessary for the public service.

Mr. NORVELL said it had pleased the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] to declare that this harbor bill was unconstitutional, inexpedient, and not conducive to the prosperity of the country, either sectionally or otherwise. Sir, if that honorable Senator considers a navy, and harbors, and light-houses on the Atlantic coast to be constitutional, under the power of Congress to regulate commerce, I am at a loss to know by what logic, or on what grounds, he can pronounce the erection of light-houses, and the construction of harbors, on the lakes, the great inland seas of the North and the Northwest, to be unconstitutional. The whole commerce of the country, on the lakes and navigable streams of the interior as well as with foreign nations, is placed by the express language of the Constitution, and was intended by its framers to be placed, under the exclusive control and authority of the Federal Legislature. The suggestion of a doubt upon the constitutionality of the construction, by this Government, of harbors and light-houses on the lake coast, is preposterous. You have had navies on the lakes. They have gained for you a harvest of imperishable national renown. The victory of Perry on Lake Erie was the first triumph of the American navy achieved in fleets. That of Macdonough on Lake Champlain was the second. They were the harbingers of a glorious termination of the late war with the mistress of the ocean, who had till then deemed her naval power invincible on sea and lake. They furnished conclusive and brilliant evidences of the ability of our navy successfully to cope with that of Great Britain in squadron, as well as in single ships. And will the honorable Senator tell me, sir, that harbors are unconstitutional on inland seas which have been illuminated and rendered classic by your naval achievements? Will he venture to tell me that harbors of refuge from the storms and distresses of the seas which roll mountain high on these great lakes, are made in violation of the Federal Constitution? But the Senator says that you are constructing harbors for the advantage of commerce where no commerce exists. Sir, the honorable gentleman speaks at random. Does he mean to affirm that no commerce exists on the great inland seas of the Northwest? Is he aware that from ten to fifteen millions of domestic and foreign merchandise float upon these lakes every season? Does he know that this trade is annually increasing with unparalleled rapidity? The Senator again alleges that these harbors are inexpedient, and not conducive to the prosperity or safety of any part of the Union. He will permit us who reside in that quarter to suppose that we know a little more about that subject than he does. Thousands of sailors and passengers, millions of property, are annually endangered on the lakes for the want of light-houses and harbors. Their safety requires the protecting care of the Government. And I am yet to learn the equal benefits of this Union to all its parts, to every section of the country, if the mantle of its constitutional patronage and support is not to be extended to the Northwest, as well as to the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico. Mr. President, you have, at this session, voted away millions on millions of dollars for the protection and defence of the South. You have gratuitously poured out the treasures of this Government for the removal of the Southern Indians over the Mississippi. You have voted away millions on the navy, for exploring expeditions to the moon, or the Lord knows where; and all for the benefit of the Atlantic cities. You have increased your army for the defence of the Southwest. You have just thrown away a million and a half upon the Cherokees and Creeks of the South, not demanded by any law, any treaty obligation, any principle of equity or justice; and yet, sir, when the Lake States ask you for a small amount of appropriations to secure the safety of their persons and property engaged in the Lake trade, you tell them that they ask unconstitutional favors from you. You tell them that your Treasury is exhausted. After you have squandered away twenty-four millions of dollars upon objects certainly not more just, proper, or valuable, you begin to find out that the Treasury is empty. Before we undertake to pay money, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] says that we ought to be certain that we have it. That honorable Senator, sir, ought to have made this patriotic discovery before he asked you to pay for his Alabama horses lost in the Creek or Florida war, before he called upon you to appropriate some seven or eight millions of dollars for the exclusive benefit of the South. Sir, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] tells you that these harbors are old acquaintances of his: that he has heard of them for years; and he tells you of Ashtabula, and Conneaut, and other harbors on that coast, as if they were of not the least importance. I am sorry that the Senator has not sailed upon Lake Erie. If he had ever been on that dangerous mass of waters, he would not have hazarded the remarks he has made. The seas are heavy, the storms sudden and tremendous, on that Lake. I remember, three years ago, to have passed up in the little steamboat Detroit from Cleveland to the city of Detroit early in the spring. A heavy and appalling storm suddenly arose when we were within a few miles of this decried and depreciated harbor of Conneaut. The little vessel was dashed in every direction; the billows rolled mountain high; and we were saved from destruction by pitching into that harbor on one of the most threatening of the terrible waves made by the storm. Sir, whenever we ask for an appropriation due to us; whenever a light-house or a harbor is mentioned for the great inland seas of the Northwest, we are met by these paltry constitutional objections. We will not submit to this crying injustice. We demand nothing but what is right; and, first or last, have that we will.

Mr. NORVELL observed, in regard to the amendment proposed to the bill, by which it was left discretionary with the Executive whether the appropriations for the Lake harbors should be expended or not, that he could not perceive its propriety. It was unnecessary, and ensured the defeat of the bill. How did it happen that the harbor bill had always been selected as the special object at which these difficulties and objections were directed? Why had not this discretion been vested in the President with regard to the heavy appropriations upon objects of less public utility? He had every proper confidence in the Executive. He had given sufficient proofs of this. But he would not sacrifice the great interests of his constituents to any consideration whatever of that kind, or any other kind. And if gentlemen would thus continue to practise upon their friends, he would not vote with them.

Mr. PRESTON replied at considerable length to the views of the Senator from Michigan. He desired no stronger illustration of the unconstitutionality of the motion, than that Senator, in the keen and zealous defence of his views, asserting that opposition comes with an ill grace from one who had voted for certain other appropriations of a like character, in another quarter. He had voted for appropriations for the South, it was true, but it was on a long line of continuous seacoast, the great highway of commerce, where harbors were made by nature; and was he, because a rigid constructionist of the Constitution, to deny every thing to the quarter he represented? but were the cases parallel? He did not know how the Senator from Michigan could derive the power from that clause of the Constitution, regulating the commerce of the country; as well might he apply the principle to building of wharves or navigating ships; as well might a harbor be scooped out of the Alleghany, as made in a lake. Why not carry a canal to the White Sulphur Springs for the convenience of visitors, and make that great and salubrious watering place, a port of entry? We certainly had just as much right to do so.

Mr. P. contended that the bill before them was one of the most latitudinarian of any that ever wasted the Treasury of the country, that all others were as but dust in the balance. According to the views of honorable gentlemen, they might have a harbor every five miles, if they please. The Senator from Michigan seemed to think there was something peculiar about his lake calling for appropriations from the General Government. Did not that Senator know that there was just as much loss of life and loss of property off Cape Hatteras, and Lookout, as among any of the nameless waters of Michigan.

Mr. P. said he well knew how this whole system commenced. It began with the breakwater at Delaware; it was there the break was made in the Constitution, and from that source came the further expenditure of all the vast sums we have been called on, from time to time, to vote. It appeared to him there was no longer any settled constitutional views to direct gentlemen in their legislative capacities—all was made to yield to popular impulse, to popular opinion. The measures which the wisdom and experience of the Government had sanctioned, were all forgotten. The Bank of the United States, which for forty years out of the fifty the Government had been in existence, was blown up, and so with most of the others: the only thing unsurrendered was the alien and sedition laws.

Mr. P. said he was unwilling to give his vote, or in any other manner lend his sanction to the opinion that this was to be the settled policy of the Government. Every body knew how these things were managed; it was only necessary for some four or five leading men to say that such a spot was poor, and without business, and that if a harbor could be made there, or a fortification or breakwater, and the General Government could be made to undertake it, that the property would be enhanced, and the public money would fructify the whole region around; and thus it was that the matter was undertaken by those who represented what was supposed to be the interests of their constituents, and in their long and labored arguments in advocating favorite measures, the Constitution was made gradually to give way. He expressed himself opposed to all such measures, and, having the Constitution for his guide, should feel himself bound to oppose all appropriations not sanctioned by the legitimate spirit of that sacred charter.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that he should vote for the present against the indefinite postponement; but if the friends of the bill should continue the debate much longer, he, for one, should feel it his duty to vote for it. We are now, said he, within about twenty-four hours of the close of the session, and there were many bills on the calendar that ought to be acted on. He, it was true, had but one, which was a pension bill, in favor of a poor, aged female, (eighty years of age,) that had been favorably reported on several times, but he, nevertheless, felt as anxious to dispose of all the bills on the calendar as if he was individually charged with them. We all, he continued, understand this harbor question. He was always pleased to listen to the Senator from South Carolina, but really he must confess that the Senator's last speech was, on account of its matter, and not of its manner, not so agreeable as others he had heard from him.

He had no doubt of the power of this Government to construct harbors on the lakes. It had as much power to construct these harbors as to repair that at New York. But, said Mr. B. if we are to sacrifice all the other business of the session for this bill, I will go farther, and sacrifice the bill itself till next winter. For these reasons, he should now vote against the postponement; but if the debate was persisted in, he should vote to lay it on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT expressed the hope that the Senate would, without continuing the debate, proceed with the amendments to the bill. He supposed many amendments would be made, and he had prepared some himself, without the adoption of which, he could not vote for the bill.

Mr. PRESTON said, for the sake of obtaining the vote of the Senator from Pennsylvania against the bill, he would make a speech twice as long. The very remarks of the Senator were sufficient evidence that the bill ought not to be passed. Here was a bill involving important constitutional principles, to say nothing of a million and a half of money, because it was discussed for some ten or fifteen minutes, it was called unnecessary consumption of time, and we were threatened by the Senator that if the discussion was continued, that, though friendly to the bill, he would certainly vote for laying it on the table. Be it so, said Mr. P. I desire the bill to be defeated. Mr. P. after dwelling something further upon the numerous constitutional objections that presented themselves to his mind, said he came upon it at a time when the Treasury was empty—when it was in an admitted state of insolvency. Where were the funds to come from? In this case he [Mr. P.] was acting unwillingly as the friend of the present Administration; he was doing all he could to prevent the beggarly account of empty boxes, which the supporters of "the party" had been obliged to show forth.

Mr. WRIGHT replied that he could not answer these inquiries at all till he knew what the bill was to be. When he knew that, he would give the information required.

Mr. PRESTON said he would suppose a hypothetical case. The friends of the bill proposed to expend a million and a half of dollars. He asked the gentleman if the Treasury was prepared to pay that sum. No answer? Then, as the gentleman stands mute, said Mr. P. I take it for granted that the Treasury is not prepared, and that we are about to make appropriations without having the means to meet them.

After some further remarks from Mr. PRESTON, the question was taken on his motion, and it was lost—yeas 18, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wall, and White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, Merrick, Norvell, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Williams, Wright, and Young—21.

Mr. DAVIS moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $48,000 for a mound or sea-wall at Buffalo, New York, for the preservation of the harbor; and after a debate, in which Messrs. BENTON, TALLMADGE, and DAVIS, took part, the motion was lost—yeas 17, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Lyon, Merrick, Norvell, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Webster, and Wright—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Strange, Trotter, White, Williams, and Young—21.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to reduce the appropriation for Pontiac creek, Ohio, from $7,000 to $4,000; and, after some remarks from Mr. ALLEN in opposition to the motion, it was agreed to.

Mr. W. called the attention of the Senate to several items of appropriation, which he thought might with propriety be reduced; after which, he moved to strike out the appropriation of $20,000 for continuing the improvement of the Cumberland river above Nashville.

This motion was warmly opposed by Messrs. CRITTENDEN and CLAY; but, on taking the question, it was agreed to—ayes 20, noes 15.

Mr. WRIGHT then offered an additional section, as a proviso to the bill, precisely in the following words:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the officers charged with the execution of this act, and with the making of contracts for the expenditures authorized by it, to have particular regard to the state of the Treasury, and its ability to meet the current ordinary expenses of the Government, as well as the calls which may be made under the said contracts; and, under the direction of the President of the United States, so to arrange the said expenditures, and the times and amount of payment, so far as the means of the Treasury can be anticipated, as that the advances or payments under this act shall not interfere with or delay the payments under the appropriations for the regular, ordinary, annual expenses of the Government.

This amendment was advocated by Messrs. WRIGHT, BENTON, and NILES, and earnestly opposed by Messrs. PRESTON, WEBSTER, CRITTENDEN, DAVIS, and NORVELL, as vesting an absolute and unconstitutional power of appropriation in the hands and at the discretion of the Executive.

This amendment was agreed to by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Strange, Trotter, Wall, Wright, and Young—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Merrick, Norvell, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—16.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $56,769 30 for continuing the improvement of the Tennessee river, in Alabama.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, observed that he was sorry to see a bill of this character pressed on the Senate at this unpropritious moment, but, at the same time, he was bound to claim for his constituents some participation in its favors, in case the bill should pass. He was aware that there was no report from the United States engineers in favor of this object; but it had been confided to the State of Alabama, whose engineer had made a report on it, which would be found among the documents of the other House. The character of this work was so well understood that it was not necessary for him to enlarge on it. He would only ask the Secretary to read the report he had referred to from the documents of the other House.

The Secretary having read the document, the question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. LYON moved to increase the appropriation from $15,000 to $31,462 37 for the harbor at the mouth of the river Raisin: lost.

The question coming up on engrossing the amendment, and ordering the bill to a third reading, Messrs. MERRICK, CLAY of Kentucky, and WEBSTER severally stated that in consequence of the amendment adopted on the motion of Mr. WRIGHT, they were compelled to vote against the bill; and on taking the question, it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 18, as follows; a tie being equivalent to a rejection:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Robbins, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Webster, Wright, and Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, King, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Strange, Trotter, White, and Williams—18.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the Senate the report of the last campaign in Florida under General Jesup; also, that the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, at the commencement of the next stated session of Congress, a statement of all works for the improvement of harbors and mouths of creeks and rivers which have been upwards of three years in progress, with the estimate of cost, when commenced, the annual expenditure since, the annual compensation to the superintendent of the same, and the probable amount which will yet be required to complete each work.

After concurring in various amendments made by the House to bills that had passed the Senate,

The joint resolution of the House suspending the 16th joint rule so far as to permit the House to send to the Senate the bill relating to the Circuit and District Courts of the Northern District of New York, and the resolution to provide for the purchase of certain books for distribution to members of the House, was taken up.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved to amend it by striking out that part relating to the purchase of books for the members; and the motion was supported by Messrs. BENTON, HUBBARD, and BAYARD, and opposed by Messrs. SEVIER, MERRICK, and SOUTHARD.

Mr. BENTON then moved to postpone the resolution indefinitely; and the question was decided in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Strange, White, Williams, and Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Merrick, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, and Webster—15.

The following bills were severally read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading.

The bill for the relief of A. Quartier and Albert of New Orleans.

The bill for the relief of John A. Peterson, executor of the last will and testament of John H Peterson, deceased.

The bill for the relief of Richard Frisby.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Potter and James Cassedy of North Carolina.

The bill ceding to the State of Ohio the interest of the United States to certain roads within that State.

The bill to establish certain post routes, and discontinue others.

On motion by Mr. Hubbard,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, July 7, 1838.

Mr. THOMPSON moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill for the relief of the heirs of John Brahan was rejected, saying he was induced to make the motion from a further examination of the case, from which he found that Mr. B. was a very estimable man.

The motion was entered.

Mr. INGHAM entreated Mr. ADAMS to give way this morning, to suffer the committees to be called upon for reports.

Mr. ADAMS, however, declined, and went on with his remarks on the subject of Texas and Mexico, and our relations with the latter Republic. Mr. A. had not concluded when the orders of the day were called for.

Mr. HOWARD suggested that after the recess, the committees be called on for reports.

Mr. BELL preferred proceeding with them this morning.

Mr. FILLMORE moved a suspension of the 16th joint rule, so far as to be enabled to send bill 861 to the Senate, which was agreed to.

The amendment was taken up.

Mr. EWING proposed an amendment, depriving the agents of the War Department, or engineers, from the power of making contracts; but after being opposed by Messrs. MASON of Ohio and McKAY,

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana demanded the previous question; which prevailed, and the bill was passed unamended.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported Senate bill to regulate the pay of masters in the navy.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported, without amendment, Senate bill entitled "An act to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the agents and attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made under the several treaties between the United States and certain foreign powers, which awards have been retained in the Treasury in payment of the debts due to the United States."

MEXICO.

Mr. H. also made a report, upon which the action of the House was not asked, as it merely contained the views of the committee.

On motion of Mr. H. ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CUSHING also submitted on the same subject the views of the minority of the committee, and they took the same order.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, from the same committee, reported back the bill to provide for surveying the northeastern boundary line of the United States, according to the provisions of the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, in 1783, accompanied by the following resolutions:

Resolved, That after a careful examination and deliberate consideration of the whole controversy between the United States and Great Britain, relative to the northeastern boundary of the former, the House of Representatives does not entertain a doubt of the entire practicability of running and marking that boundary in strict conformity with the stipulations of the definitive treaty of peace of 1783, and entertain a perfect conviction of the justice and validity of the title of the United States to the full extent of all the territory in dispute between the two powers.

Resolved, further, That considering that more than half a century has elapsed since the conclusion of that treaty, considering the extraordinary delay which has hitherto marked the negotiations and proceedings of the Governments of the two countries, in their endeavors amicably to settle the controversy, and considering the danger of mutual irritation and collisions upon the border of kindred and friendly nations from further procrastination, this House cannot forbear to express an earnest desire that the pending negotiation should be brought to a close, and the final decision of the dispute be made as early as practicable.

Mr. F. moved [the consideration of the resolutions, and they were unanimously concurred in; being the same as those unanimously agreed to in the Senate.

MEXICAN DOCUMENTS.

Mr. HOWARD called up the motion to reconsider the vote laying on the table the motion to print the Message of the President of the United States, and accompanying documents, on the subject of our relations with Mexico.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. H. disclaimed all wish to suppress any part of this correspondence which was of any importance, his object having been merely to avoid the expense of printing a vast mass of what was of no moment to the subject. He had not the remotest desire to prevent the fullest and freest inquiry. He desired not to be on the committee.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved a resolution to print the Message, and that a committee be appointed, with power to designate what portion of the documents merit printing; which was agreed to.

Messrs. ROBERTSON, CRARY, and EVERETT were appointed such committee.

2. That the duties of that committee shall be to take into consideration all such petitions, resolutions, bills, and reports, or other matters or things relating to surveys and estimates for roads, canals, or for the construction or improvement of the navigation of rivers, or the construction, improvement, or continued prosecution of any such public works, whether by the appropriation thereto of lands or money.

An act for the relief of George J Knight.

LAND FRAUDS.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of being enabled to submit the resolutions heretofore offered by him calling for certain information in relation to the public lands, pre-emption frauds, &c. which motion prevailing, the resolutions were taken up and agreed to.

At the request of Mr. CUSHING, Mr. CRARY moved a reconsideration, which was agreed to.

Mr. CUSHING then moved to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, Mr. C. withdrew the motion, and Mr. R. having modified the resolutions, they were agreed to.

The motion to reconsider the vote laying the bill for the relief of John Brahan on the table, was taken up and disagreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG gave notice that he should, as soon as possible, call up the bill to provide for the sale of the United States Bank bonds.

CHOCTAW RESERVATIONS.

The bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands who were deprived of the benefit of the pre-emption act of the 19th June, 1834, (under discussion yesterday,) was again taken up, and after being opposed by Messrs. WISE and JOHNSON of Maryland, and advocated by Messrs. LYON and LEWIS, when, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, the bill was laid on the table.

The bill to confirm certain purchases of the public lands, under the act of the 19th of June, 1834, reported from the Committee of the Whole, with a substitute, postponing the subject till the Legislature of Mississippi had made a special report upon the subject.

Mr. HARLAN advocated the postponement, which was briefly discussed by Messrs. WORD and PRENTISS of Mississippi, when

Mr. CRARY moved the previous question; but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. HARLAN, who made his objections to the bill, on the ground that, so far from being in accordance with the pre-emption law of '34, these claims were set up in direct violation of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. PRENTISS of Mississippi asked for the yeas and nays; but they were refused.

Mr. JOHNSON withdrew the motion, and the amendment being concurred in, the bill was passed.

STEAMBOAT IRON, &c.

The bill to authorize Charles Day, of Macon, and James R. Butts, of Columbus, Georgia, to import, free of duties, two iron steamboats, &c. was taken up.

Mr. LYON moved to insert, also, the name of William W. Fry, of Mobile, Alabama, stating that he was in the situation; which was agreed to.

Mr. NAYLOR opposed the bill, and opposed the whole principle, and after some remarks from Mr. BIDDLE, in its support, it was ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. CHAPMAN said, then seeing no prospect of coming to a conclusion, he moved to lay the bill aside, not to be reported; but upon the count there were, ayes 51, noes 61, no quorum; upon passing a second time between the tellers there were, ayes 52, noes 73.

So the committee refused to lay the bill aside.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved a further amendment, that the commission should ascertain the amount of merchandise insured or sold, and if insured or sold, what portion thereof was paid, and the amount deducted from the certificates.

Mr. ADAMS remarked that this would be a transfer of the ruin from the importer to the insurer, the latter being already the heaviest sufferer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD replied that the insurer should not set up as a plea that his loss accrued from the act of God, because it was his business to run risks.

Mr. ADAMS rejoined by inquiring if that was a reason for inflicting still greater calamity upon him.

Mr. CHAMBERS wished the gentleman's sympathies extended a little further. Had the gentleman any sympathies for a very worthy class, the retail merchants?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, I would if I could.

Mr. CHAMBERS said the gentleman could if he would, if he could bring himself to vote for this bill. They might as well pass a general law at once, extending it to all cases.

Mr. ADAMS rejoined that the gentleman passed from a thing that was possible to a thing that was impossible. The Government could relieve the insurer or importer, but could not extend it to the retailer. The bill, however, proposed no indemnity even to the former, but merely a forbearance.

After some further remarks from Mr. CHAMBERS, his amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the committee then rose and reported.

UNITED STATES BANK BONDS.

The bill to authorize the sale of certain bonds belonging to the United States, was ordered to a third reading, read a third time and passed without a division.

NEW YORK FIRE.

The House concurred in the amendments to the New York fire bill.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. HARRISON moved the previous question on the third reading, which prevailed without a division, and the bill was then passed.

FALMOUTH RAILROAD.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky moved to reconsider the vote of the House by which the bill giving the assent of Congress to the supplementary act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company, and appropriating $300,000 for the use of the company.

Mr. MALLORY moved to lay that motion on the table; which was agreed to—ayes 75, noes 64.

HARBOR BILL.

Mr. SERGEANT moved to refer the amendments of the Senate to the harbor bill to the Committee on the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky moved to lay the bill on the table: lost, without a division; and the bill was then committed.

POST ROUTE BILL.

The House then took up the Senate's amendments to the Post Route bill, and, after making further amendments, several were concurred in.

The amendment restoring the Express mail system, or rather striking out the section discontinuing it, was then taken up.

Mr. HOPKINS hoped the House would non-concur; indeed, he preferred seeing the bill postponed till next session, for the condition of the finances of the Department was such that none of the routes could be put in operation. He, therefore, moved its postponement.

Mr. BRIGGS remarked that the bill did not go into operation till July, '39, and there was no need of postponing it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY explained that the bill had been so amended by the Senate at the suggestion of the Postmaster General, that it had obviated the objections to its passage.

Mr. HOPKINS disapproved of the principle of this amendment, as, before July, '39, many of these new routes might become valuable.

Mr. WISE was opposed to the amendment.

Mr. CHAPMAN demanded the previous question, which was carried, and the vote on the main question was—ayes 82, noes 53.

So the amendment was concurred in, and the Express mail system is therefore retained.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then went into Committee on the Union, (Mr. McKENNAN in the chair,) and, on motion of Mr. C. took up the

INDIAN ANNUITY BILL.

The Senate had returned this bill with sundry amendments, being for carrying certain recent treaty stipulations into effect; and they were all severally concurred in, together with some others moved by Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HARBOR BILL.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the committee took up the amendments of the Senate to this bill.

Mr. PETRIKIN hoped the amendments would not be concurred in, for there was a great deal of humbug in them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky moved to except to, and nonconcur in, the amendment striking out $20,000 for the improvement of the Cumberland river above Nashville, and expressed his astonishment that this item, which was an old work, now in progress, and reported on by the War Department. It had been omitted by the Committee of Ways and Means only because the superintendent had failed in sending in the estimates in time.

Mr. DUNCAN made some remarks in opposition to the motion, and was going into a defence of the Administration from some recent charges, in doing which, he was called to order by Mr. JENIFER and Mr. SIBLEY, on the ground that he was diverging from the subject before the House. The CHAIR not sustaining the point, Mr. REED called Mr. D. to order; but the CHAIR not again sustaining the point, Mr. D. proceeded further, when he was again called to order, for irrelevancy, and the CHAIR sustained it.

Mr. YELL said he should object to the gentleman's proceeding further, without leave of the committee.

The question was propounded, and the committee refused to allow Mr. D. to proceed.

Mr. POPE supported the appropriation for the Cumberland river; but he was also called to order by Mr. TITUS, for irrelevancy, and resumed his seat.

Mr. PETRIKIN described the whole controversy as a scramble for money; and it appeared that the price of the Kentucky delegation was $20,000.

Mr. HARRISON called Mr. P. to order for this expression; and

The CHAIR sustained the point.

Mr. LYON raised the question whether Mr. P. should be permitted to proceed; and, on a vote, the committee refused to permit him.

Mr. DUNCAN rose; but having been refused permission to proceed, objection was made to his going on. He said he held a pamphlet in his hand, (understood to be Mr. BOND's speech,) out of which he wished to make a speech; but, if the committee would permit him to write it out, and call it his speech in Committee of the Whole, he would desist. Loud cries of agreed! from all quarters of the House ensued, and Mr. D. sat down.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in—ayes 103, noes not counted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana moved to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, striking out the item of $70,000, for continuing the removal of the obstructions in the Red river.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana stated that it had been stricken out, on the mistaken ground that the money had been appropriated before.

Mr. JOHNSON also expressed a wish that the appropriation be retained.

The amendment, however, was concurred in. All the other amendments of the Senate were then concurred in; and, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the committee rose and reported the above two bills to the House.

The amendments to the Indian annuity bill were then all concurred in by the House.

The harbor bill was then taken up.

Mr GRANT moved the previous question, which was carried nem. diss.

Mr. POPE then moved to except the amendment in relation to Cumberland river.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to lay the bill on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were refused, and the motion was rejected.

The amendments of the Senate were all concurred in.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The House took up the amendment of the Senate to the Fortification bill, and, on motion of Mr. CRARY, through the operation of the previous question, the amendment was concurred in.

The House took up the Senate's disagreement to the amendment of the House to the bill to confirm certain land purchases in Mississippi, under the act of 19th June, 1834.

Mr. WORD hoped the House would agree to he Senate's disagreement, and addressed the House for some time in support of that position.

Mr. HARLAN moved to lay the bill on the table, which was agreed to—ayes 68, noes 54.

Several pension and other private bills, returned from the Senate amended, were taken up, and the amendments all concurred in.

All the bills on the SPEAKER's table having been disposed of, the House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. McKENNAN in the chair.

RELICTS OF THE REVOLUTION.

On motion of Mr. TITUS, the committee took up the bill to provide for the relief of certain widows of soldiers of the Revolution, granting them half-pay and pensions.

Several amendments were proposed by Mr. ADAMS and Mr. WISE, and disagreed to; and the bill was then laid aside to be reported.

NEW LAND OFFICES IN LOUISIANA AND ARKANSAS.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, the committee took up the bill to establish an additional land office in the State of Louisiana.

On motion of Mr G. an amendment was agreed to, changing the boundary.

Mr. YELL moved a section providing for an additional land district in Arkansas; which was agreed to, and the bill ordered to be reported.

LIGHT HOUSE BILL.

Mr. PHILLIPS moved to take up the Light House bill; which was agreed to, ayes 80, noes 44, (after three attempts to get a quorum) and several amendments being agreed to,

Mr. DUNCAN moved to lay the bill aside not to be reported. Lost.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia moved to strike out the enacting clause, with a view to take the question in the House by yeas and nays, and for the purpose of testing not only the strength of parties, but also the circumstances under which it was passed, and the number of members present.

The motion was disagreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY, &c.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee took up the bill making appropriations for the West Point Academy.

The bill was returned from the Senate with a mass of amendments, embracing the pay of revenue officers, additional clerks, &c. being on almost every possible subject; which were concurred in.

The bill was then laid aside, and the committee rose and reported the above bills to the House.

The bill granting half pay and pensions to certain widows was read a third time and passed.

The amendment to the bill to establish additional land offices in Louisiana and Arkansas was concurred in, and the bill passed.

The amendments to the light-house bill were concurred in.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia called for the yeas and nays on the third reading of the bill, on the ground stated by him in committee.

The yeas and nays being ordered, were 65 to 56, (a quorum with the SPEAKER.)

So the amendments were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and the bill was then passed.

The amendments to the West Point Academy bill were taken up and concurred in, and the bill passed.

The bill to refund to the Georgia Railroad and Banking company certain duties paid upon railroad iron, was ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

The bill to refund certain duties upon railroad iron, paid by the New York and Harlem Railroad company, was taken up; and, after some conversation between Mr. LEWIS and Mr. ADAMS as to the general bill on this subject, and a few words from Mr. CAMBRELENG in support of the above bill, it was passed.

The bill to remit or refund duties to the Baltimore and Susquehannah Railroad company, upon certain importations of iron made by them for the use of their railroad, was also passed.

The bill for the benefit of the New Castle and Frenchtown Turnpike and Railroad company, was read the third time and passed.

The joint resolution reported this morning by Mr. LINCOLN, to settle the claims of the workmen on the Treasury building, was read a third time, and passed; and on motion of Mr. L. the sixteenth joint resolution was so far suspended as to permit the bill being sent to the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BOULDIN, the Committee on the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of all their unfinished business.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, all the bills in Committee of the Whole House were referred to the Committee on the Union.

SMALL NOTES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The consideration of the bill to restrain the circulation of small notes within the District of Columbia was resumed, on its third reading; and after some discussion, in which Messrs. BOULBIN, ADAMS, and THOMAS, participated,

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. CUSHMAN asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

It being obvious that no quorum was present, Mr. COLES moved a call of the House; but it did not prevail.

The CHAIR counted the House, and ascertaining that no quorum was present,

Mr. GRANT moved a reconsideration of the vote rejecting the call; which was agreed to—yeas 51, nays 45.

In the meantime a quorum appearing, the call was refused, and the question being taken on laying the bill on the table, it resulted in the negative—yeas 54, nays 77, as follows:

Morris, Murray, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Parmenter, Petrikin, Phelps, Potter, Rariden, Reily, Augustine H. Shepperd, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Vanderveer, Webster, Jared W. Williams, and Yell—77.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. THOMAS moved to amend by inserting first of August next, instead of "April," as the time when the bill should take effect; but

Mr. CHAPMAN demanded the previous question, [cries of "Agreed," Agreed,"] which was carried nem. dis. and the bill was put on its passage without a division.

Mr. BRONSON moved the previous question on its final passage; which was carried without a single negative voice being heard, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the amendments of the Senate to the Indian Annuity bill were committed.

On motion of Mr. C. the House went into Committee on the Union—Mr. McKENNAN in the Chair.

Mr. C. moved to take up the bill to sell the United States Bank bonds.

Mr. MERCER remarked that when the House was last in committee, the New Harbor bill was under consideration, and he insisted upon the resumption of its consideration.

The CHAIR decided the latter to be the first business in order.

Mr. CAMBRELENG insisted that, as it was a House bill, it was not in order at all, because it could not be sent to the other House.

After some conversation between the CHAIR and Messrs. WHITTLESEY, CUSHMAN, DUNCAN, MALLORY, BOND, and Speaker POLK, the bill was laid aside.

UNITED STATES BANK BONDS.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee took up the "bill to authorize the sale of certain bonds belonging to the United States."

Mr. WISE called upon the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to explain what changes had taken place to render the sale of these bonds necessary now, when so short a time ago it was resisted, and the Government issued shinplasters in lieu.

Mr. CAMBRELENG did object, and always had objected, to the Government disposing of its bonds in this form, or, in fact, in any form; but they were now at the close of nearly a seven months' session, and found themselves having made extraordinary appropriations of an excess amounting to thirteen millions. These Mr. C. enumerated, and went on to demonstrate that the sale of these bonds was absolutely necessary to meet these extraordinary demands. He admitted it to be doubtful whether they could be negotiated or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD congratulated his friend from New York upon his altered tone since the last session. As to the appropriations, he would ask if they had exceeded the estimates?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied they had, by about thirteen millions, not, of course, altogether owing to the sole action of Congress, but principally on account of extraordinary exigencies, such as Indian hostilities, new treaties, frontier difficulties, the new army bill, etc.

Mr. UNDERWOOD could not help complimenting the gentleman upon his change of position, occupying, as he did, one directly the reverse of that he did at the extra session; for he then opposed this very proposition, then brought forward by Mr. U.

Mr. BELL expatiated at some length upon the change of ground taken by the Administration and its friends upon the present occasion, and commented upon its inconsistency; in doing which, he cited extracts from the messages of the President, communications from the Secretary of the Treasury, the recent speeches of Mr. CAMBRELENG, Mr. JONES of Virginia, etc. and defended his own consistency.

Mr. POPE remarked that it was a matter of minor importance what any gentleman said or thought last fall, and it was but a mere waste of time to be talking about consistency on the last day of the session. The only question was, did the exigencies of the Government require the sale of these bonds? Large appropriations had been made, for which no particular party was solely responsible; for all had voted for them, and it was equally the duty of all to provide the means to meet them. He was well assured that the passage of this bill was contemplated by no one when the Treasury note bill was passed. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had alluded to extraordinary Indian appropriations, the new army bill, &c. which had not been taken into the account when the gentleman submitted his estimate of the condition of the Treasury, showing the necessity of issuing ten millions of Treasury notes. That was true. But the new harbor bill, the road bills, and others, included in that estimate, had since been defeated, and the Senate had so amended the old harbor bill as only to require but half the amount to be expended this year. This would about square the account, and hence he saw no necessity for selling these bonds.

Mr. WISE inquired if there was any Executive communication, any wand, requiring the sale of these bonds.

Mr. CAMBRELENG would tell the gentleman, Congress had added $1,150,000 on account of the Cherokees; other Indian treaties had been ratified, involving some $1,600,000, within the last three weeks, and of which the Committee of Ways and Means knew nothing till within the last ten days. They had passed, what had never been contemplated before—a new army bill; and had added about two or three hundred thousand dollars to the old harbor bill. The fact was that, within the last ten days, they had added about $4,500,000 to the expenses of the Government, which were not contemplated before.

Mr. WISE insisted that most of these ought long since to have been anticipated, for they must have been before the eyes of the Executive.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House, nem. diss.

DUTIES ON HEMP.

The bill to allow a drawback on imported kemp, when manufactured into cordage and exported, was, on motion of Mr. CHAPMAN, laid aside not to be reported.

NEW YORK FIRE BILL.

The bill to remit the duties upon certain goods destroyed by fire at the late conflagration in the city of New York, was next in order.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to lay it aside.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, who had reported the bill, expressed an earnest hope that the committee would not assent to that motion.

Mr. HOFFMAN added that the friends of the measure had no disposition to debate it.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 42, noes 82; and the bill having been read by the Clerk—

Mr. HOFFMAN addressed the committee in behalf of the bill.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. CUSHMAN replied to Mr. HOFFMAN, and expressed his opposition to the principle involved in the bill; a principle by which the Government of the United States resolved itself into an insurance company. It was the duty of the merchants to protect themselves by insurance. Pass this bill, and a similar application would come in from Charleston, South Carolina. Mr. C added that the bill would take four or five millions out of the Treasury.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied to Mr. CUSAMAN, remarking, first, that he concurred with the gentleman that it was the duty of the merchants, in all possible cases, to protect themselves by having their property insured. But what was the case then under consideration? It was a case of one of the most extraordinary calamities that ever happened on this side of the Atlantic, and would probably be without a parallel for a century to come, he hoped for ever. It was a case where not only the property was destroyed, but even the insurance companies themselves; and hence the merchants not only lost the amount of their duties, but an average of one-half their property besides—one-half of their whole capital.

With regard to the bill taking four or five millions out of the Treasury, the gentleman was mistaken. The whole amount of the postponed bonds was less than a million, and the bill proposed only the establishment of a commission to examine into the claims of the parties, and then, after the award was made, to pay them out of these postponed bonds.

The bill was very briefly sustained also by Messrs. CURTIS, PHILLIPS, REED and ADAMS, and opposed by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, CHAMBERS, ATHERTON and EVERETT, (in its present form only,) when the committee refused to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. EVERETT moved a proviso, which was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved an amendment to the first section, making certain exceptions in cases of goods insured.

After a few words from the mover and Messrs. CURTIS and POPE, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHAMBERS then warned gentlemen that, if this bill passed, it must go down to the retailer and consumer. It was unjust in principle, and on this ground he for sometime warmly opposed it. Mr. C. said he would oppose the bill till to-morrow's sun rose, but that he would defeat it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Tennessee moved a reconsideration of the vote laying the bill in relation to certain Mississippi land claims, on the table, and on dividing the House by tellers, there were—ayes 49, noes 69.

So the House refused to reconsider.

Mr. DAWSON said it was due to the country that it should be known they were acting on the most important measures, and voting away millions upon millions of dollars with a bare quorum present, tried by the yeas and nays, including the SPEAKER, and he therefore moved a call of the House.

The CHAIR stated to the gentleman that, in view of the important business before the House, and apprehending there might be some difficulty in relation to a quorum, he had taken the responsibility of directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to despatch messengers to every boarding-house in town, to request the attendance of members.

Mr. DAWSON waived his motion for the present, and, on motion of Mr. BELL, the House went again into Committee on the Union.

CHOCTAW FRAUDS.

Mr. BELL moved to take up the bill to extend the commission for the investigation of Choctaw claims, which prevailed, and the bill was taken up.

Mr. B. moved a substitute, reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr WORD moved an amendment, to give the commissioners certain pay, without mileage.

Mr. BELL. Then you will defeat the bill, and defeat the investigation. It would be fatal to the commission, and he entreated the gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. WORD persisted in pressing his amendment, but it was rejected; and, Mr. BELL's amendment being agreed to, the bill was laid aside to be reported.

TROPICAL PLANTS.

On motion of Mr. DOWNING, the committee took up the bill to promote the cultivation of tropical plants in the United States, in Florida.

Mr. DROMGOOLE opposed the bill, moving to strike out the enacting clause, and Messrs. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, WISE, and MALLORY, who moved to lay it aside: lost.

The committee refused to strike out the enacting clause, and the bill was ordered to be reported.

WESTERN FRONTIER.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, the committee took up the bill to provide for the better protection of the Western frontier.

Mr. McKAY moved an amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, repealing so much of the military appropriation act of '36 as provided for the removal of the troops at Fort Gibson; which, after some remarks from the mover and Mr. HARRISON, was agreed to

The bill was then ordered to be reported to the House.

On motion of Mr. BELL, the committee took up the bill to direct the investment of the Indian trust fund.

Mr. EVERETT proposed a substitute, which was discussed for some time by Messrs. PARKER and BELL, and was adopted.

The bill was then ordered to be reported.

Mr. TITUS made an ineffectual attempt to call up the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, the committee then rose and reported.

The bill to encourage the introduction and growth of tropical plants within the United States, was then taken up.

Mr. WISE moved the previous question, which was carried, and, on the passage of the bill,

Mr. HARLAN called for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the bill was passed.

The amendment to the bill in relation to the Choctaw commission was concurred in, the bill read a third time and passed.

The amendment to the bill to provide for the better protection of the Western frontier, was taken up, and opposed by Mr. HARRISON, who notified the House that he would avail himself of every form he could resort to, to defeat it.

Mr. MERCER designated the passage of such an act as this, an act of infamy, meriting the deepest execration. He, therefore, moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. McKAY asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the motion prevailing—

The bill was laid on the table.

Mr. DAWSON moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill to promote the cultivation of tropical plants in the United States was passed.

The CHAIR ruled the motion to be out of order, on the ground that the bill had already been sent to the Senate.

The amendment to the Indian trust fund bill was concurred in, and the bill passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, in answer to a resolution of the House, calling for any evidence showing that the Government of Spain, after the treaty of the first of October, 1800, continued to claim south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, laid on the table.

EXTRA PAY TO MESSENGERS AND PAGES.

Mr. CUSHING, Mr. LINCOLN, Mr. McKENNAN, and Mr. LEWIS, offered a resolution and amendments, to give extra pay to the messengers, chaplains, &c. to the Capitol. [$200 extra to each little boy.]

Mr. COLES moved to lay the whole subject on the table; but on taking the count, there were, ayes 34, noes 73, no quorum and the motion was withdrawn.

After some discussion,

Mr. COLES renewed the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. STANLEY called for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the House divided by tellers; but on taking the count, there were, ayes 18, noes 76—no quorum—and on a second count, ayes 7, noes 90; still no quorum.

Mr. CRARY asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 18, nays 85; still no quorum.

Mr. GRAY moved a call of the House, which was ordered, (at half-past 4 o'clock,) and proceeded in till the roll was called through.

The CHAIR then announced that all the enrolled bills had been signed.

Mr. TAYLOR moved an adjournment: lost.

Mr. WISE hoped the call would be persisted in, and that those who had kept their beds, and forced others to stay there and work, would be compelled to attend.

The roll was then called through a second time, and the doors of the hall were closed, and excuses rendered for some members, when

Mr. WISE moved that the 5th rule be enforced, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be required to summon the absent members and take them into custody as they appear.

Mr. POTTS moved that the further proceedings of the call be dispensed with: lost.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia said, believing this thing had been carried far enough, he moved an adjournment, (quarter past five o'clock.)

Mr. HOPKINS gave notice that he should object to the transaction of any further business without a quorum.

Mr. GRAY said the whole was a complete farce.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is no farce with me, sir, and I shall insist upon the point.

Mr. GRAY. It is a farce to attempt to carry out this call.

Mr. ELLINGHAST moved that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet at 9 o'clock to-morrow: agreed to.

The House refused to adjourn.

Mr. WISE suggested that, as Mr. ADAMS had concluded his Texas speech, the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to reply to him. (Laughter.)

It was obvious that a considerable number of members had left the hall since their names were called, and

Mr. BRONSON suggested that those who had responded to their names be called over again; but, in reply to the Chair, he remarked that he was not aware of the fact from his personal knowledge, and no order was therefore taken upon the suggestion.

At a few minutes before 6 o'clock,

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio suggested that, by general consent, the House take the question on the resolution, and then adjourn finally; for if they could not take the question now, he was convinced they could not in the morning.

The CHAIR said there being no quorum present, and that fact being solemnly entered on the record, no question could be taken till a quorum certainly had responded.

Mr. SIBLEY now moved to dispense with the call.

Mr. FOSTER asked for the yeas and nays. Refused.

The motion to dispense was rejected.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, the members in attendance outside the Hall were brought in by the Doorkeeper.

Several members were brought in, and some were excused on the ground of old age and infirmity; others from severe indisposition; others because they had conscientious scruples in regard to the Sabbath; and a number were fined in the amount of ——.

The SPEAKER stated that sixteen members of the House had been summoned to attend by the Sergeant-at-Arms, but they had peremptorily refused to obey the House's mandate, and had departed.

These were Messrs. ANDERSON, BIRDSALL, CHAMBERS, CHANEY, HAMER, HARPER, KENNEDY, MURRAY, PETRIKIN, PLUMER, SOUTHGATE, TURNEY, WHITE of Kentucky, YELL, and GRANT.

Mr. LINCOLN moved that the names of these members be entered on the journal; which was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. WISE inquired if there was any existing order by which those members who had thus abandoned their duties, and treated the House with contempt, could be fined, or otherwise punished?

Mr. BRIGGS said there was no authority laid down in the manual.

Mr. WISE. Then it is a casus omissus, that ought to be provided for.

Mr. REED inquired of the Speaker if they had taken pay? The CHAIR could not answer.

Mr. BEATTY then moved an order that these sixteen members be called on, when they next appear in this Hall, to render the reasons why they disobeyed the order of the House.

Mr. B. remarked that the sixteen gentlemen, he supposed, were too conscientious to serve their country, but they were not too conscientious to travel on the Sabbath.

The resolution was then agreed to unanimously.

Mr. SLADE moved that their names be published.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired what kind of a motion that was? The House was not in the habit of publishing people's names; and he would ask the gentleman in what, or how many, papers he proposed to advertise them.

Mr. SLADE withdrew the motion.

Mr. LEWIS thought the House should take some steps in reference to those who had thus abandoned their duty, while millions upon millions of the people's money were being voted away.

Several suggestions were made, but no action was had, when Mr. CRARY (at about half past seven o'clock, a. m.) moved an adjournment: lost.

Mr. WISE then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That all members now absent, except such as have been excused, and the sixteen members who have been reported by the Sergeant-at-Arms as having defied the execution of the order of the House, be required, upon the reassembling of Congress, to give excuses for their absence at this time, and it shall be the duty of the Clerk to enter their names on the journal for that purpose, and the SPEAKER shall bring the same to the notice of the House.

Mr. HOWARD, at first, suggested to substitute a postponement of the call till to-morrow (Monday) morning, but subsequently waived it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was opposed to Mr. WISE's resolution.

Mr. PRENTISS of Mississippi, then spoke to the resolution of Mr. WISE. The sixteen who had disobeyed the mandate of the House, and left the city in contempt of it, were in a different position from those who were absent, not knowing of such an order of the House.

Mr. WISE said a resolution had already been adopted touching that point, upon the motion of Mr. BEATTY, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, moved the previous question, which prevailed, and Mr. WISE's resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BRONSON moved an adjournment.

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina (one of the gentlemen excused) called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused and the motion prevailed, 74 to 51.

And so, at a few minutes before 8 o'clock,

The House adjourned till 9 o'clock, Monday morning.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 7, 1838.

Mr. DAVIS presented a communication from the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, with the proceedings of a meeting of the members of that body, held on the 5th instant, to take into consideration the late report of the Committee on Commerce, (drawn up by Mr. DAVIS,) on the subject of light-houses; in considering which they passed several resolutions, accompanying the communication, in which resolutions they highly approved of that report. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a petition. (Unheard.)

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the clerks authorized to be employed in the service of the Senate by the resolution of October, 1837, were continued till otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Various bills, &c. referred to committees, were reported by Messrs. ROANE, TIPTON, FULTON, and CLAY, of Ala.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR INDIANS.

Mr WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported the bill from the House referred to them, making appropriations for the annual expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes for the year 1838, with some minor amendments, which were explained by Mr. W. and agreed to.

Two or three amendments were also offered and explained by Mr. WHITE, and agreed to.

Mr. WHITE moved further to amend the bill by adding an appropriation of $260,000 for the support of such Indians removed west of the Mississippi as are unable to subsist themselves, to be distributed under the direction of the Secretary of War.

This amendment was earnestly advocated by Messrs. WHITE and SEVIER, and opposed by Messrs. NILES, CLAY of Alabama, NORVELL, and ALLEN, and agreed to by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Hubbard, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, and Wall—14.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and, by consent, read a third time and passed.

The CHAIR presented from the Treasury Department, in pursuance of a Senate resolution of 5th June last, statements of the annual expenditures in collecting the customs on imports for the last twenty years, discriminating between the different kinds: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A message was received from the House, requesting the Senate to suspend the 16th joint rule so far as to receive from the House the bill to increase and regulate the term for holding the United States Circuit and District Courts for the Northern district of New York. In this request the Senate concurred; the bill was received, and, by consent, carried through and passed.

HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MERRICK, in compliance with a desire of some of the friends of the Harbor bill, moved that the vote rejecting it should be reconsidered, and expressed the hope that it would be so modified that he could vote for it. The vote was accordingly reconsidered, and the bill was taken up by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Niles, Norvell, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Williams, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, King, Nicholas, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Wall, and White—14.

Mr. BAYARD moved to reconsider the vote on the additional section to the bill offered by Mr. WRIGHT.

The CHAIR decided that this was out of order, as Mr. B. was in the minority on that vote.

Mr. BAYARD then moved to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out all that part of Mr. WRIGHT's amendment including and following the words "and under the direction of the President;" that is, all which had any direct reference to the President of the United States.

Mr. NORVELL expressed the hope that the friends of that amendment would agree thus to modify it.

Mr. PRESTON said he supposed this would be the test question, and he therefore demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT gave his assent to the motion, as the part of his amendment remaining would, he thought, comprehend all that he intended by the whole.

Mr. MERRICK, not being satisfied with the extent of the motion of Mr. BAYARD, said he should not feel committed to vote for the bill unless the whole amendment should be stricken out.

Mr. RUGGLES said, if all that Mr. WRIGHT intended would be included in the remaining part of the amendment, then nothing would have been gained. He, therefore, moved to strike out the whole amendment. Negatived—ayes 10, noes not counted.

Mr. NILES then moved to amend the instructions, by requiring that the whole of Mr. WRIGHT's amendment should be stricken out, and a substitute inserted, providing that on all single appropriations over $12,000, fifty per cent. only should be expended in 1838, and the remainder in 1839. (So modified, on suggestions from several Senators.)

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, the instructions were further amended, by requiring that the $48,000 for Buffalo, rejected last night, should be inserted.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, moved to include the $20,000, rejected last night, for the Tennessee, above Nashville; negatived—ayes 12, noes 19.

The question was then put on Mr. BAYARD's motion, modified as above, to recommit the bill with instructions, as above, and it was decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Williams, Wright, and Young—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Clay, of Ala. Cuthbert, Nicholas, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Strange, Trotter, Wall, White—12

So the bill was recommitted, and,

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the committee had leave to sit while the Senate were in session.

Mr. DAVIS subsequently reported the bill modified by the Committee on Commerce according to their instructions.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants.

The question being on an amendment from the committee, increasing the amount of land from 200,000 acres to 300,000—

The bill and amendment were discussed passim by Messrs. CLAY, of Alabama, ALLEN, RIVES, HUBBARD, BUCHANAN, BENTON, PRESTON, and CLAY, of Kentucky.

The amendment was rejected: Yeas 17, nays 21; and the bill was then ordered to a third reading.

The Senate then took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

On motion of Mr. PIERCE, all the pension bills from the House which had been favorably reported on by the Senate committees were taken up, considered, and ordered to a third reading.

A bill, unfavorably reported on, in behalf of the heirs of a Captain Hunter, was taken up, and Mr. CRITTENDEN, in advocating the bill, stated that, in the Revolutionary war, being asked by his men the meaning of sine qua non, Capt. Hunter told them that it meant the three principal islands in Passamaquoddy bay, which were never to be given up. The bill, notwithstanding, was given up, or rejected, on ordering it to a third reading—yeas 16, nays 19.

HARBOR BILL.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the Senate took up the bill for the improvement of harbors and rivers, with the amendments as reported from committee, according to their instructions, striking out the section offered by Mr. WRIGHT to give discretion over the appropriations to the Executive, and inserting in lieu thereof a provision that, if the public service should require it, only fifty per cent. of each appropriation above $12,000 should be expended in 1838, and the remaining half in 1839; also, inserting $40,000 for a sea-wall, at Buffalo, New York.

These amendments were agreed to, and the bill, in this form, was ordered to a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, Lyon, Merrick, Niles, Norvell, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Webster, Williams, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, King, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Strange, White—11.

The bill was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROANE, the Senate took up the bill (yeas 16, nays 12,) appropriating not more than $15,000 for the erection of a United States court-house in Alexandria, D. C.

Mr. CLAY moved to reduce the appropriation to $5,000, (rejected,) and then to $10,000, (also rejected)—ayes 13, noes 17.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

Mr. MERRICK moved to take up the bill from the House for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton: negatived.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate took up the bill from the House making appropriations for fortifications for the year 1838.

The amendments to the bill offered by the Senate committee were agreed to.

Mr. WALL offered a proposition to follow the appropriation of $40,000 for Fort Delaware, on Pea Patch island, in the Delaware river, authorizing the Executive to quiet and secure the title of the United States to the soil, by purchase or inquest, as to him should appear best.

A long and earnest discussion followed on the amendment, and on the subject generally, in which Messrs. WALL, HUBBARD, CLAY of Kentucky, BAYARD, BUCHANAN, CLAYTON, SOUTHARD, and WEBSTER participated.

Mr. WALL's amendment was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Fulton, Merrick, Mouton, Rives, Robinson, Southard, Trotter, Wall, and Williams—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, King, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tipton, White, and Wright—19.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, moved to strike out the appropriation, $40,000, for this object. Advocated by Mr. SOUTHARD, opposed by Messrs. WALL, BUCHANAN, and WEBSTER, and carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, White, Williams—20

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Mouton, Niles, Rives, Robbins, Wall, Webster, and Wright—14.

After some further debate, in which several Senators declared their determination to vote against the bill on account of the rejection of the $40,000 for Fort Delaware, the bill was reported to the Senate.

On the question of agreeing in the Senate to the striking out, in Committee of the Whole, the $40,000 for Fort Delaware, it was decided in the negative, by—yeas 15, nays 19, so that the $40,000 was reinserted.

Mr. WALL again offered his amendment as above, and, after a long debate, it was again rejected—yeas 8, nays 23; as was also a substitute for it, offered by Mr. BAYARD.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill referred to them making appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point for 1838, with various amendments, which were read, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the bill was amended by an appropriation to indemnify Mr. Baker and others, confined by the British authorities on account of the Northeastern boundary.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was amended by adding a section providing to supply the several States each with a standard balance.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, it was further amended by an appropriation of $200,000 for new machinery for ——— Armory.

On motion of Mr. ROBBINS, $1400 was inserted for a complete catalogue of the Congress Library.

Various other amendments were offered and rejected.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

The Senate concurred in the amendments of the House to the bill to establish certain post routes and discontinue others.

Also, in the amendments of the House to the bill to remit the duties on certain goods destroyed by fire in New York.

The amendments of the House to the Senate bill to authorize Charles Day and others to import iron steamboats free of duty, were amended by the Senate, then concurred in as amended, and the bill sent back to the House

The CHAIR presented a message from the President of the United States, with a report from the Secretary of War, in relation to the Florida war, and a letter from Gen. Jesup. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The Various bills ordered to a third reading to-day were, by consent, severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the House to provide for the settlement of claims of New York for the services of her militia on the Northern frontier, was ordered to a third reading, and by consent, read a third time, and passed.

Various additional private bills were ordered to a third reading, and, by consent, read a third time, and passed.

The bill making appropriations for certain roads in Florida;

And the bill to reorganize the Legislative Council of Florida, were severally considered, ordered to a third reading, and read a third time, and passed.

The Senate concurred in the amendments of the House to the bill making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, beacons, buoys, surveys, &c. for 1838.

Also, in the amendments of the House to the bill making appropriations for the West Point Military Academy for 1838. And in their amendments to the bill to establish additional land offices in Louisiana and Arkansas.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the amendments of the House to the bill for the settlement of claims under the 14th article of the Choctaw treaty of 1830, were, with the bill, laid on the table.

Also, the amendments and bill to invest certain Indian funds in State stocks.

The Senate, after four o'clock in the morning, and having held a long executive session, adjourned till nine o'clock on Monday morning.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, July 9, 1838.

The House met at 9 o'clock, and there was an unusually full attendance of members for the last day of the session.

Mr. BELL moved to rescind such part of Mr. WISE's resolution as did not refer to the sixteen members who had defied the execution of the order of the House, for it did great injustice to those who, like himself, had actually remained in the House till long after all the public business had been disposed of, and till broad daylight.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio suggested to the gentleman that, instead of rescinding the resolution, those gentlemen now present who were then absent, and not included in the sixteen, now be permitted to render excuses.

Mr. BELL had no objection. Any course, so that injustice be not done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD suggested that it would be better to reconsider the resolution.

Mr. MERCER thought it better to repeal part of the resolution.

Mr. BELL then reduced his proposition to writing, to rescind so much of Mr. WISE's resolution as referred to other than the sixteen members, and that the then absentees be now heard for excuses

Mr. POTTS moved to amend by striking out the latter part.

Mr. ADAMS suggested an amendment, simply to rescind so much of Mr. WISE's resolution as referred the matter to the next session, and to rescind all orders referring to the Sabbath.

Mr. FILLMORE adverted to the great injustice done to many members by the operation of the call yesterday morning. Those members who had staid all night, and had retired but a few minutes, and then summoned, were now published to the world as neglecting their duties; whereas no notice was taken of those who had left the city altogether, and been totally negligent of all the business before Congress.

Mr. MILLER stated to the SPEAKER that he had remained in the House from 10 o'clock on Saturday morning until between 2 and 3 o'clock on Sunday morning, when he became so much exhausted, from previous indisposition, that he felt himself compelled to retire.

Mr. CUSHMAN, as a proof of this, refered to his own case. Though exhausted with fatigue, he had remained in his seat the whole night, and did not leave till daylight; nor was he notified to attend, but came afterwards, voluntarily, to the House, on learning it was in session.

Mr. WISE said if gentlemen would withdraw their motions, he would move a reconsideration of his resolution, and move the previous question.

Mr. BELL withdrew his proposition; and

Mr. WISE made the two motions indicated by him; and, the previous question being carried,

Mr WEBSTER called for the yeas and and nays on the reconsideration, which, being ordered, were—yeas 109, nays 36.

So the resolution was reconsidered, and the question recurring upon agreeing to the resolution,

Mr. WISE demanded the previous question; which prevailed.

Mr. SERGEANT inquired if the names of the absentees would not still remain on the journal as delinquents?

The CHAIR replied, that if the resolution was disagreed to, it would leave the entry on the journal, the same as in an ordinary call of the House.

Mr. WISE then moved a reconsideration of Mr. BEATY'S resolution, in relation to the sixteen members who had defied the order of the House, and thereupon he demanded the previous question.

Mr. MERCER insisted that the gentleman had no right to follow up one motion instanter by another.

The CHAIR ruled otherwise, and entertained the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MERCER appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, on the ground that his colleague could not make two motions contemporaneously.

The CHAIR replied that no two motions could be so made; they must be consecutive, as in the present instance.

Mr. MERCER reduced his point of order to writing, and called for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the House affirmed the judgment of the CHAIR, the vote being taken by tellers—yeas 83, nays 45.

The previous question was then carried, and on that of reconsideration.

Mr. BRODHEAD called for the yeas and nays: refused.

The resolution however was not reconsidered—yeas 52, nays 77.

Mr. ADAMS then submitted his resolution to rescind all the orders of the House having reference to legislation on the Sabbath, and instantly demanded the previous question.

Mr. MERCER and Mr. LINCOLN said they objected to the consideration; but they were too late.

The previous question was carried.

Mr. FOSTER called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which, being ordered, were, yeas 47, nays 90, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Wm. B. Campbell, Carter, Clark, Corwin, Cranston, Davies, De Graff, Dennis, Duncan, Elmore, Ewing, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, James Garland, Rice Garland Goode, James Graham, Grennell, Griffin, Halstead, Hammond Hastings, Hawkins, Hoffman, Ingham, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Legare, Maxwell, McClure, Pope, Potts, John H. Prentiss, Edward Robinson, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Taliaferro, Thomas, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Vanderveer, and Joseph L. Williams—47.

NAYS—Messrs. Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Aycrigg, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Boad, Boulding, Bronson, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Cleveland, Coles, Crary, Cushing, Cushman, Edward Darlington, Dawson, Dromgoole, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Farrington, Richard Fletcher, Gallup, Grantland, Gray, Haley, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Lewis, Lincoln, Lyon, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McKennan, Miller, Mitchell, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Parker, Parmenter, Patterson, Peck, Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Pratt, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Reed, Rives, John Robertson, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Spencer, Stanly, Stuart, Stratton, Taylor, Titus, Vail, Webster, A. S. White, Elisha Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Jared W. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—90.

So the resolution was rejected.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 13th of June, transmitting a report containing a statement of the amount of money expended by the United States in each State during the years 1833-4 5 6, and '37, designating the several heads of expenditure, and the amounts of each, respectively.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, laid on the table.

Mr. HOWARD propounded an inquiry to the CHAIR, whether the balance of Mr. ADAMS's speech, together with all opportunity of reply, was cut off?

The CHAIR said the practical construction given to the rules in all former Congresses was that, on the morning of the adjournment of the last day of the session, the committees were not called on for reports, unfinished reports were not taken up, no orders of the day were called, &c.

Mr. McKENNAN then called up his resolution to give the little boys, &c. about the Capitol $200 each, besides their full compensation of $1 50 per diem, and he demanded the previous question upon its consideration.

Mr. HALSTEAD begged the mover to withdraw the motion for a moment

Mr. McKENNAN declined.

Mr. HALSTEAD begged, then, only to inquire what amount of money it involved.

The CHAIR ruled all discussion out of order under the operation of the previous question.

The House having carried that demand—

Mr. HALSTEAD asked for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which, being ordered, were—yeas 97, nays 82.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BRONSON offered a resolution to give two months' extra pay to the clerks, doorkeepers, postmaster, &c. of the House.

Mr. GRAY moved to lay it on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the select committee appointed to designate what portion of the Mexican documents should be printed, made a report thereon, which was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR offered a resolution, giving petitioners leave to withdraw papers; which being modified by Mr. HOPKINS so as to require the Clerk to keep an abstract thereof, was agreed to.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved the usual resolution, that a message be sent to the Senate, notifying that body that the House was ready to adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS moved the usual resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States for the same purpose.

The above were waived for the present.

MADISON PAPERS.

Mr. POPE called up the joint resolution to print the Madison papers; which being agreed to, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union thereon, Mr. DEGRAFF in the chair.

Mr. ADAMS moved an amendment, to insert the usual preamble, "Be it enacted," etc. and making it in the form of a bill, which was agreed to.

The committee then rose and reported the bill; and, the amendment being concurred in, the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. POPE, the 16th and 17th joint rules were so far suspended as that this bill could be transmitted to the Senate, and thence to the President of the United States for concurrence and approbation.

The CHAIR laid before the House the usual annual communication in compliance with the act changing the organization of the Post Office Department; which was laid on the table.

Mr. CARTER, on leave, presented a petition from certain citizens of Tennessee in favor of a National Bank.

Mr. CUSHING moved to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from all business before it.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio asked if a formal motion was necessary, and whether, at the end of a session, the committees were not discharged, as a matter of course?

The CHAIR replied, that it was immaterial, either course being pursued.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland submitted a resolution calling upon the Heads of all the Departments for information as to the number of clerks employed by them.

Mr CALHOUN of Massachusetts submitted the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the House during the first week of the next session of Congress, all such communications, papers, documents, &c. now in the possession of the Executive, or which can be obtained, as shall elucidate the origin and object of the Smithsonian bequest, and the origin progress and consummation of the process by which that bequest has been recovered, and whatever may be connected with the subject.

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, all the standing committees of the House were discharged from the further consideration of all the subjects referred to them.

A message was received from the Senate stating that they had appointed a joint committee, on their part, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that they had finished the business before them, and were ready to adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS moved to concur therein.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, moved to strike out the sentence stating that they had finished their business, because that was not the fact.

The CHAIR remarked that this was the usual form almost, if not quite, ever since such a resolution had been annually agreed to.

The amendment, after a few words from Mr. CUSHING was disagreed to.

The resolution was concurred in, and the committee ordered to consist of three members on the part of the House.

Mr. CUSHMAN'S resolution was then taken up and agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS expressed a hope that some gentlemen would move a remission of the fees imposed upon the absentees on yesterday morning.

Mr. McKENNAN moved an order to that effect, which, after a few words from Mr. POPE in favor of the motion, and Mr. REED against it, was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS, from the joint select committee, appointed to wait on the President of the United States, reported to the House that they had performed that duty, and that the President had no further communication to make.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN,

The House adjourned till the first Monday in December next.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, July 9, 1838.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, leave was given to all those persons who have petitioned for pensions, and whose cases are provided for in the general bill passed last evening, to withdraw their petitions and papers.

The usual resolution was adopted, for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses, having completed the business before them, were ready to adjourn, unless he had some further communication to make.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the report of the select committee appointed to consider and revise the 47th rule, which designates the persons to be admitted to the privileged seats on the floor, was taken up and concurred in.

On motion by Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. HUBBARD in the chair,

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be tendered to the honorable WILLIAM R. KING, for the ability, fidelity, and impartiality with which he has discharged the duties of President of the Senate.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, with a joint resolution suspending the 16th and 17th joint rules so far as to permit the House to send to the Senate for concurrence, their amendments to the resolution for printing the Madison papers.

The resolution being agreed to, the amendments were taken up and concurred in.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the proceedings of the banks in New Orleans, containing information of the condition of the said banks, and as to their ability to resume specie payments: ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. NORVELL,

Mr. NORVELL then moved that the Senate adjourn sine die.

Mr KING then made a short, but neat and pertinent, address, in which he thanked Senators for the aid they had so liberally lent in supporting him in the arduous duties incident to the Chair. In taking leave of the Senate, he complimented the Senators, individually and collectively, on the courtesy, kindness, and gentlemanly deportment which had characterized every member of that body; and wishing them all a safe and pleasant journey to their homes, adjourned the Senate sine die.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,

On the Relations between the United States and the Mexican Republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 2, 1837.

In compliance with the instructions of the President, the Secretary of State has the honor to present a report on the relations between the United States and the Mexican Republic, since the last communications from the Executive to Congress on that subject. It was apparent, from the proceedings of Congress, at the last annual session, on the special message of the President calling their attention to our claims against Mexico, and recommending a contingent authority to make reprisals, if another and last demand for redress should be made in vain, that both branches of the Legislature coincided in the opinion expressed in that message, that the United States might justly resort to any mode of redress known to the law of nations; but differed with the President so far as to think that this last demand ought to be made before Congress should decide on the course to be pursued in case it should prove unsuccessful.

Soon after the adjournment of Congress, a careful examination was made of the various existing causes of complaint against Mexico, as well those of an individual as of a public character. The archives of the legation of the United States at Mexico having been brought to Washington by Mr. Ellis, the late Chargé d'Affaires to that Government, the Department was enabled to exclude from the list of claims various cases; some of them of a doubtful character, and others which, after having been presented to the Government for its aid in procuring a settlement, had been adjusted through the efforts of the persons interested in them. A fair and full statement of the remaining causes of complaint, chronologically arranged, was then carefully prepared, and forwarded, with all the evidence within reach of the Department, in support of each claim that had arisen since the treaty, to the Government of Mexico, by a special messenger, who was the bearer of a solemn demand from this Government for redress. This demand, with the accompanying evidence of its justice, was delivered to the Mexican Government on the 20th of July last. The list presented to the Mexican Government contained fifty-seven subjects of complaint; the last two embracing, in general terms, the loans forced in Mexico from citizens of the United States, and the flagrant outrages committed on the commerce and citizens of the United States in the Gulf of Mexico by the Mexican squadron, shortly after the adjournment of Congress; detailed evidence of which had not then been sent to the department. In contravention of the treaty between the two countries, an embargo was laid by Mexico upon all the vessels of the United States, after the seizure of the General Urrea by the United States ship of war Natchez in retaliation for the capture of the several merchant vessels of the United States, a delivery of which had been demanded by the captain of the Natchez, and refused by the authorities of Mexico. This embargo, laid by the local officers, was however disapproved by the Government of Mexico, and was in a short time removed; while the citizens of the United States, officers, crews, and passengers, taken in the merchant vessels carried in for an alleged violation of a blockade of Texas, were, after suffering various privations, injuries, and insults, and being held as subject to criminal prosecution and punishment, released. An answer to the demand made by the United States was given to the special messenger on the 29th of July, who returned with it forthwith to Washington, which contained assurances that the Government of Mexico earnestly desired to give a prompt and explicit answer to each of the claims to which the demand related; that, although there were several claims which admitted of immediate reply, there was not time, before the necessary return of the messenger of the United States, to make a mature and impartial examination, which others required; that the President of Mexico desired that the reply to each should be given, in order that a complete judgment might be formed of the whole; that, not to delay a moment the final and equitable adjustment of the difficulties between the two Governments, the President had ordered the voluminous series of documents presented in support of the claims to be translated and minutely examined in the Department of Foreign Affairs; that evidence should be sought for from other sources; that nothing should be left undone which might lead to a speedy and equitable adjustment of the points so seriously occupying the attention of the Government of the United States; and that the Mexican Minister at Washington would communicate, successively, the opinions of the President on the several cases, and his determination thereon. Relying upon these assurances, the more implicitly from the voluntary action of the Mexican Government in raising the unwarrantable embargo upon our vessels, and the release of the Americans taken in merchant vessels unlawfully captured in the Gulf of Mexico, it was expected that immediately after the arrival of the Mexican Minister in Washington, they would be in every respect fulfilled. The Mexican Minister reached Washington, from New Orleans, where he had been for some years residing as consul of the Mexican Republic, on the 14th of October. He brought with him, however, nothing but the usual letters of credence, and one repeating, in general terms, the expression, usual between Governments, of a desire to preserve and promote friendly relations with the United States. It was not until the 18th instant, that answers to any of our complaints were given. The Mexican Minister then presented to the Department of State ten notes, all dated on that day, in the first of which he explains the causes which have prevented a reply from his Government to the claims numbered 3, 6, 8, 11, 13, 14, 15, and 17. In the chronological order in which the claims were presented to Mexico, No. 3 is the case of the cargo of the ship "Louisa," which forms the subject of one of the notes accompanying his explanation; from which fact, and the direct references in some of the other notes, it is apparent that the Mexican Government had not examined the documents sent from this Department with the demand made in July, or else has substituted for one of them a list of claims sent to Congress with the President's Message of the 6th of February last, and forming part of the documents printed by their order, which are alleged by Mr. Martinez to have been communicated to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Mexico, with a note of the Secretary of State of the 14th of May last. But no note was addressed by this Department to the Mexican Minister on the 14th of May, nor has any allusion whatever been made to the printed list of claims referred to, in any communication from this Government to that of Mexico. In fulfilment of the assurances solemnly given in Mexico, after a lapse of five months, answers are made to but four of the fifty-seven subjects of complaint, presented obviously for the last time, and under the article of our treaty with Mexico which looks to the unfortunate contingency of a necessity on one part or the other to take, forcibly, satisfaction for injuries complained of, and not, on due demand, accompanied by competent proof, redressed. The answers received are to the individual complaints in the case of the ship "Louisa;" in the case of the brig "Cossack," and in the case of Chouteau and De Munn, arrested in 1817 within the territorial limits of the United States, carried into Mexican territory, and imprisoned, and their property confiscated at Santa Fe; and to the demand made upon Mexico to disavow any approbation of the reprehensible conduct of its Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, in printing and distributing a pamphlet defamatory of this Government and the people of the United States, while in the United States, under the protection of his diplomatic privilege. The justice of the claim for the cargo of the "Louisa," seized in 1821 by virtue of the edicts of Iturbide, of 20th of February and 4th of March of that year, is acknowledged, and a promise is made to incite the Congress, upon and before whom the claim has been pressed for ten years, to provide for the payment of the balance due according to a decree of the Mexican Government of the 1st of February, 1822, heretofore partially executed; but the justice of the case of the "Cossack," and of the claims of Chouteau and De Munn, is denied, on the ground that they occurred before Mexican independence was achieved. A decree of restitution in the case of the "Cossack" was issued on the 27th of July, 1821. It would seem, then, that the decrees of the 20th February and 4th of March, 1821, impose obligations on the present Government of Mexico; but those of the 27th of July, 1821, do not. A decree of the 1st of February, 1822, awarding indemnity, is good; a similar decree of the 27th of July, 1821, is not good. The Secretary of State does not perceive upon what principles these distinctions are made, nor on what just ground payment can be refused by Mexico for any acts committed within its territorial jurisdiction after the virtual separation of Spain and Mexico, i. e. after the occupation of Spain by France in 1808. The case of Chouteau and De Munn rests upon the grounds that the injury occurred while Spain had no power where it was received; that Mexico had then, and has had ever since, an effective control in Santa Fe, and that the present Government is answerable for the acts of all its de facto precursors, who alleged and exercised sovereignty over the country. With relation to the brig "Cossack," the decree of restitution is dated after the plan of Iguala was declared, less than a month before the treaty of Cordova was signed, by which O'Donoghue acknowledged the independence of Mexico, and a short time previous to the election of a regency, and the choice of Iturbide as President of the new Republic. What particular meaning is affixed in Mexico to the terms "independence achieved," is not understood, nor is it important to discuss, as the obligation of Mexico dates from the time of declared or actual independence of foreign control, and since it maintained a dominion exclusive of that of Spain.

The answer of the Mexican Minister to the demand of the United States, founded upon the conduct of Mr. Gorostiza, is so singular as to require a particular statement of all the facts in relation to the subject of it. Soon after the late Mexican Minister asked for his passports to return home, after terminating his extraordinary mission, his last note to the department, in which his reasons for taking that step were expressed, was published in New York, in the journal called the "Courier des Etats Unis." This document had never been made public by the authority of the department. The existence of a pamphlet by Mr. Gorostiza, printed in Philadelphia in Spanish, had been previously made known to the Secretary of State, by a member of the diplomatic corps accredited at Washington, who stated that he had received two copies, and he believed that the same number of copies had been transmitted by the author to each member of the foreign diplomatic corps in Washington; expressing, at the same time, his surprise and disgust at the grossness of such an act by a retiring minister. One of those copies was given, on the request of the Secretary, for the use of the Department of State. That the belief thus expressed was well founded, no doubt was entertained, as a copy was also procured by one of the officers of the Department of State from another member of the diplomatic corps; and one was lent, as it was afterwards discovered, to the editor of the "Courier des Etats Unis," by a third, with permission to use it for any purpose whatever. Extracts were published from the pamphlet in that paper, and in several other newspapers; and the copy in the hands of the editor of the French journal was lent without scruple, on no condition, but that, after being copied, or otherwise used, it should be returned. The duplicate copies sent to the diplomatic corps were obviously intended to give the most extensive circulation to the matters contained in the pamphlet; and no doubt one was expected to be transmitted to each foreign Government represented in the United States, and the other to adorn the archives of its legation in Washington. From the equivocal circumstances under which the pamphlet was prepared, and the assertions contained in the preface, it was supposed that the writer sought to evade official responsibility, by representing the publication as his personal act; thus giving to himself and his Government the benefit he hoped to derive from his defamation of the United States, with all the Governments of Europe, and with his own countrymen, among whom it was widely distributed as soon as he reached the Mexican territory, as a prelude to his last report to his own Government, without exposing that Government to a demand for redress for the injury sought to be inflicted by its representative. The slanders of a private individual could not be of importance to the United States; but as the position of Mr. Gorostiza was equivocal, it was deemed necessary that this subject should be so presented to his Government, that the distinction made between his acts, as a mere citizen, as the representative agent of Mexico, should be marked and recognised. Occasion was taken, therefore, in giving instructions, on the 10th of December last, to Mr. Ellis, to make the explanations previously promised in regard to the movement of the troops under General Gaines, to direct him to bring the act of their Minister to the notice of the Mexican Government, in these words:

"It would be gratifying to the President if this communication, which you will have to make to the Mexican Government, was limited to these explanations. Unfortunately, the conduct of its late Minister Extraordinary has made it necessary to touch upon even a more unpleasant topic. You will learn with astonishment that Mr. Gorostiza, while enjoying his diplomatic privilege, although after he had declared his mission at an end, published, on his own authority, a pamphlet, (a copy of which is herewith sent to you,) containing parts of his unpublished correspondence with this department, and extracts from his letters to the Mexican Secretary of Foreign Relations, with a long introductory preface. The publication of his correspondence with the Department, without the authority of his Government, is believed to be unexampled in the history of diplomacy, and was not decorous to the Government of the United States. The extracts from his correspondence with his own Government, and his introduction to the whole, contain statements and comments defamatory of the Government and people of the United States, and obviously intended to injure the character of both, for honor and good faith, in the eyes of the world. This pamphlet, although not circulated generally among our citizens, was in the hands of editors of newspapers, who have published extracts from it; and the President has been informed that two copies of it were sent by its author, at the moment of his departure from the United States, to some, if not to all, the members of the foreign diplomatic body accredited here. This act, still more extraordinary because it almost immediately followed the communication of the President's intention to direct that explanations, which he believed would be satisfactory, should be made to the Mexican Government, has excited but one sentiment among those to whom it is known. In directing you to make known the publication of this pamphlet to the Mexican Government, the President does not doubt the truth of the declaration made by its author, that this publication was his own personal act, for which he had no authority from his Government; nor will he permit himself to suppose, for an instant, that it will adopt or sanction conduct so glaringly violating all the decorum of diplomatic usage; so disrespectful to the Government and people of the United States; so unworthy the representative of a respectable Government, and so well calculated to interrupt the harmony and good will which ought to subsist between the United States and Mexico.

"How far the character of the Mexican Government for decorum and justice, and an honorable desire to maintain a respectable rank among the civilized nations of the world, requires a distinct manifestation of its just displeasure at such an extraordinary step, are questions that belong to itself alone to consider and decide.

"In giving you this instruction to make known to the Mexican Government the conduct of its Envoy, without a demand of reparation at its hands, the President is influenced, as well by the explicit disavowal of the Envoy of all participation on the part of his Government, in the act complained of, as by the sincere conviction, already expressed, that a step so reprehensible will not be countenanced by it. But if, contrary to all just expectation, the Mexican Government shall adopt that act, or give sanction to it by approving of their Minister's conduct, the continuance of diplomatic intercourse between the two countries can no longer be either useful or reputable to the United States. However painful may be the consequences, the honor of the American people requires of the President to instruct you, as I now do, in that event, to demand your pasports, and to return forthwith, bringing with you all the archives of the legation to the United States."

These instructions were not received by Mr. Ellis before his departure from Mexico; but a copy of them was subsequently transmitted to the Mexican Government, through its Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. Castillo. Prior to Mr. Ellis's departure, and within a fortnight after Mr. Gorostiza's arrival at the city of Mexico, the Mexican Government, after an alleged delay of what is called an act of justice to their Minister, waiting for explanations promised by the United States, sent a formal approval of his conduct as their Minister at Washington. When it was recollected that, in the extracts of the correspondence of Mr. Gorostiza, with his own Government, which he had himself published, the good faith of the United States was directly impeached, and it was presumed, that the publication of his pamphlet, and its distribution, at least in Mexico, was known to his Government, it was deemed necessary to require from the Mexican authority a distinct disavowal of the part of his conduct which had been considered offensive by the United States. No doubt was entertained that the Mexican Government would, without hesitation, declare that its approbation of Mr. Gorostiza's conduct did not relate to the preparation, or publication, or use, of the defamatory pamphlet.

The answer of the Mexican Government, now received, defends the conduct of its Minister. Mr. Martinez asserts, in conformity with his instructions, that the Minister did nothing which was not required by the dignity and interests of Mexico. By the note of Mr. Martinez, these facts are admitted, on the part of the Mexican Government; that the pamphlet was prepared by its Minister, and printed in Philadelphia, in the Spanish language; that some copies were left to be used in the United States, with a recommendation as to the time only when they were to be used, and the time recommended was, as soon as there should be a publication of it in Mexico; that the pamphlet was extensively circulated on the coast of Mexico as soon as he arrived; and, on his journey to the capital, by the returning Envoy Extraordinary. On these admitted facts, the Government declares that Mr. Gorostiza acted conformably to what was required by the dignity and interests of Mexico. Keeping out of view, as entirely unimportant, the offensive character of the pamphlet, and the use made of it in the United States, the Mexican Government has attempted, argumentatively, to prove that it did not appear that their Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary intended to offend the United States, or to jeopard his diplomatic character, by violating established usage. To sustain the first allegation, it is said the pamphlet was necessary for his vindication, in relation to a past transaction—a negotiation not pending, inasmuch as his mission was terminated; that it was in the Spanish language—if it had been intended offensively it would have been printed in English, for circulation among the people of the United States; and that he did not circulate it among his colleagues of the diplomatic body, because he did not send it to them officially, or confidentially, with an explanation of his object. The character of the production, and the use made of the copies left, with the recommendation as to time, are, unfortunately, the best evidences of the intention of the author. The pamphlet is a labored effort to prove that the United States, for a series of years, sought unjustly to obtain possession of the territory belonging to a friendly power, till the year 1818, when, the Executive of the United States pretending to nothing but what was reasonable, the Florida treaty was negotiated, the negotiators being both men of talents and good faith; that, subsequently to that treaty, the want of good faith and integrity produced new pretexts to acquire possession of the territory, the pretended claim to which they had been thereby abandoned; that while the Government was fostering the sinister design of violating all the articles of their treaty with Mexico, the President and all his ministers were pouring into the ears of the Mexican Envoy Extraordinary protestations of affection for his Government, and of strict neutrality in the Texan contest; that this Government was destitute of good faith, and that the people in mass, with the exception of a minute fraction, described as belonging to the school of Washington and Madison, were necessarily ignorant; and, having every thing in their power, could be blindly led by dishonest, greedy, unprincipled, and, consequently, unbridled flatterers, wherever they pleased. The assertion that such a pamplet was not intended to offend the United States, is so extraordinary that it is to be hoped that the Mexican Government has omitted to examine it. Such a declaration, in regard to its intention, cannot otherwise be rationally accounted for, unless it be supposed that that Government means to make this singular distinction, that a production intended to impeach the character of a Government and people, for honor and good faith, and to degrade them in the eyes of the world, was not intended to offend. The argumentative denial of the act of sending this defamatory pamphlet to foreign ministers, that the calumny against this Government and people might be made known to all the Governments with whom they hold diplomatic intercourse, which has been made for Mr. Gorostiza, amounts to this: that he did not send copies to them at all, because he did not send them with an official explanation. He left them here to be used: they were used—sent to foreign ministers. It is for the Envoy Extraordinary to explain how they came there. His Government, which has approved his conduct as conformable to its dignity and interests, is responsible to those whose honor is involved in the inquiry. The contents of the pamphlet show, also, that the intention of it was not self-vindication. The responsibility of the author for the act on which it is alleged he designed to enlighten his country, was to his Government, and through it to the people of Mexico. His pamphlet is written for all places, and for all times; a part is specially for the meridian of the United States, as will satisfactorily appear by a reference to its contents. But it is also said that it related to past transactions—not secret, as some of the correspondence had been made public. A part of the correspondence between the two Governments had been published by the United States. In addition to the residue of that correspondence, the pamphlet contains the Envoy's extracts from the secret and confidential letters to his own Government, in which he calls in question the good faith of the Government of the United States. His extraordinary mission was terminated by the act of the Envoy, but he was still in the enjoyment of his diplomatic privileges, and the subject of which he wrote was then pending with his Government. After his return, that Government looked for explanations which had been promised by the United States, and complained they were not received; which explanations, having been delayed by accident, were subsequently given to it.

The conduct of this Extraordinary Envoy is also alleged to have been conformable to diplomatic usage; and two instances are brought forward to sanction this allegation, assumed to exist in the history of the diplomacy of the United States. It is asserted in the note of Mr. Martinez that the Commissioners of the United States published their correspondence pending the negotiation at Ghent. During a war with Great Britain, the corresspondence of the Commissioners of Great Britain and the United States, who were negotiating terms of peace, was published in Washington by the Government of the United States; there were no libels in it upon Great Britain. The Commissioners of the United States never published any thing during the negotiation at Ghent.

The Chargé d'Affaires of France published a letter of instructions from the Duke de Broglie in some of the journals of the United States, in English. The letter of the Duke de Broglie was not a libel upon the Government of the United States; but its publication was considered improper by all parties in this country. By what means the Mexican Government has been imposed upon, and induced to assert that "Mr. Secretary Forsyth wrote to Paris representing that this Government would not object to receive again, as a diplomatic agent, the Chargé d'Affaires who had caused that publication a few months before," it is impossible to conjecture. It is a sheer fabrication, which will be seen with astonishment by the Governments of England and of France, to whom all the circumstances of the transaction to which it relates are as perfectly well known as they are to the Government of the United States.

The relations of the United States and Mexico, therefore, as they now stand, are these: The demand of the United States for justice for past injuries has been made in conformity with the treaty between the two nations; but apparently no public complaint has since been examined by the Mexican Government, except the conduct of Mr. Gorostiza. The printing and distribution of his offensive pamphle is approved by his Government, and justified as conformable to what was required by its dignity and interests.

To the other demands of a public nature, existing at the adjournment of the last annual session of Congress, after five months' delay, no answer has been given. On three cases of private claims presented for final answer, answers have been given. The justice of two of them is denied, although one of them rests on a decree of the Mexican Government. Satisfaction for the one admitted to be just is not made. The Congress of Mexico, who have been considering the subject for eight or ten years, will be "incited" to pass upon it, when they meet.

Since the last session of Congress an embargo has been laid on American vessels in the ports of Mexico. Although raised, no satisfaction has been made, or offered, for the resulting injuries.

Our merchant vessels have been captured for disregarding a pretended blockade of Texas; vessels and cargoes secretly proceeded against in the Mexican tribunals, condemned and sold; the captains, crews, and passengers of the captured vessels have been imprisoned and plundered of their property, and, after enduring insults and injuries, have been released without remuneration or apology. For these acts no reparation has been promised, nor explanations given, although satisfaction was, in general terms, demanded in July last.

From these facts a judgment may be formed of the value of the assurances that have been received from the Mexican Government, and the probability of their ever being fulfilled.

Copies of all the correspondence with the Mexican Government, not heretofore made public, and serving to elucidate the subject of this report, are herewith presented for consideration.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN FORSYTH.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

DEPARTMETT OF WAR,
December 2, 1837.

SIR: In compliance with your instructions, and in conformity with established usage to present annually to you, for the information of Congress, a statement of the transactions of this Department, together with such suggestions in relation to the various subjects under its administration as the public interests may seem to require, I have the honor to submit the following report.

It will be seen by the statement of the Commanding General, that the principal part of the regular forces has been drawn from the posts on the frontiers and concentrated in Florida; and his account of the military transactions in that Territory will exhibit the progress of the war to the close of the last, and the events attending the commencement of the present, campaign. The proposals made by the Indians to submit to the terms of the treaty, and the negotiations entered into with them to this effect, caused the cessation of hostilities at a period when they might have been carried on to advantage.

This measure on the part of the General commanding the army of the South, although productive of delay and increased expense, was dictated by humanity and a laudable desire to avoid, if practicable, the necessity of further enforcing, by arms, the execution of the treaty, and was approved by the Department. Nor can any just blame be attached to the conduct of that officer for keeping his faith with the Indians, and rather suffering himself to be deceived by them than to violate his engagements by securing the chiefs who had entered his camp and placed themselves in his power, under the pledge of receiving his protection.

The enemy proved faithless, and the season for active operations passed away without any important results. Great expense was incurred in preparations for the removal of the Indians, which their treachery rendered abortive; but the honor of the Government, which is beyond all price, was preserved; and it is satisfactory to know that the renewal of hostilities has only taken place after every effort had been tried in vain to persuade these deluded people to submit peaceably to the execution of the law. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the circumstances which led to this war; they are already well understood; but it may be important to state the causes which have enabled an enemy, so inferior in number and resources, to baffle the efforts of the Government to subdue them, and which have rendered the contest, not only so disastrously protracted, but so very expensive. The theatre of war, remarkable for its natural difficulties, was entirely unknown to the commanding officers of our army. They were compelled to move their forces with the utmost caution in the face of a bold, active, and wily foe, thoroughly acquainted with the passes of the rivers and morasses which intersect the country, and who hovered about their flanks, concentrating their numbers upon a point of attack, with unexampled rapidity, and flying from the open ground with a swiftness that baffled the pursuit of the white man. The difficulties of transportation, on which the success of all military operations must depend, always great, and, in such a country, involving unusual labor, expense, and delay, were in some cases insurmountable. In several instances, when within reach of the enemy, our troops were compelled to fall back upon their magazines or baggage trains for supplies, and thus lose the opportunity of striking an effective blow, because the subsistence stores could not be brought up for their use. Wherever it was possible, supplies were transported by water to points near the theatre of operations; but having to ascend rivers, steamboats were necessarily employed, at an enormous cost to the Government. From these points the transportation became still more expensive, as well as difficult and dangerous; numerous and well appointed escorts had to be furnished; wagons to to dragged over pathless tracts of spongy pine barren, through almost impassable swamps, and across marshy rivers: temporary magazines to be built, and posts to be established in the wilderness, to which further supplies of provisions and forage were to be brought, for the country is entirely destitute of both, and the baggage train can transport its own forage for a few days' consumption only. When it is considered that these difficulties had to be encountered and surmounted by raw, undisciplined troops, in the face of an active enemy that that destroys unseen, delivering a deadly fire at an unexpected moment, and disappearing in morrasses impenetrable to the eye of the white man, the zeal and persevering courage of our officers and men are worthy of all praise. It is under such circumstances that our Indian allies have proved so useful. Their peculiar sagacity in detecting the stratagems of their race, and their untiring vigilance and activity in the field, are the best protection against the ambuscades, night assaults, and surprises, which constitute the warfare of these tribes, and are so harrassing and destructive to our troops. To the strong arms and brave hearts of our own men, we may safely rely for victory in action; but we must depend upon the Indian to detect the lurking place of the Indian, to trace him in his devious path and rapid flight, to guard against his wily approach, and to discover his deadly presence at every difficult pass. For these reasons, the friendly Creeks were employed in the army of the South during the last campaign; but, as it had been found necessary to detain their families at great expense until they could all be transported together to the West, they were discharged, and are on their way to their new homes. Before their departure, measures were taken to supply their place by engaging Indians of other tribes. In extending the necessary orders, a clerical error was made, by which the Indians were offered higher pay than the law allows to volunteers. The error was corrected as soon as discovered; but as about two hundred men have been brought to Florida under the first instructions, I beg leave leave to suggest that an appropriation be asked of Congress to enable the department to preserve its faith with these Indians, which I venture to hope will not be refused.

Another cause of unusual expense is to be found in the character of the troops employed. At first they were drafted men or volunteers engaged for so short a period of service as to render their employment not only expensive but inefficient; and when they were engaged for a longer time, the inexperience of their staff officers occasioned great and unnecessary expenditures, while the description of force, chiefly mounted men, augmented very much the cost of the campaign. The remuneration this irregular cavalry received from Government, merely for the use of their horses, amounted, in six months, to a sum nearly, if not quite equal to their real value. The Government has had, besides, to pay a large amount for horses that perished for want of forage, which the state of the country rendered it impracticable to transport in sufficient quantities for the supply of so large a body of cavalry. The irregular force thus employed in Florida during the campaign of 1836 amounted to about 10,000 men; one-half of which were cavalry, at an expense greatly exceeding that of regular troops, and by no means so efficient as one-half the number of that description of force.

Notwithstanding the experience gained during the two last campaigns showed the great cost of employing volunteers, the department had no alternative but to engage them again, which the patriotic offers of the citizens from every part of the country enabled it to do. The nature of the climate of Florida requires that the active operations of the campaign should be concentrated into a short period of time, and this can only be effected by bringing into the field a much greater number of troops than would otherwise be necessary. The regular force, although collected from every point, was deemed inadequate, and resort has been had to militia in order to make up, with the regulars, four columns, having each the component parts of an army sufficient to encounter the whole force of the enemy, and destined to move into the interior of the peninsula from distinct points of the coast. Added to these means of offensive operations, the squadron on that station may confidently be relied upon to scour the coast and intercept all communications from without, and in every way practicable to contribute, by its co-operation, to the success of the land forces.

Throughout the whole conduct of this war, the West India squadron has co-operated with the army in the most active and efficient manner, not only by promptly furnishing every aid which the appropriate duties of that branch of the service required, but by the officers taking upon themselves the defence of posts on shore, and lending the aid of their professional skill, in every situation in which it could be usefully applied, with that persevering courage, zeal, and ability which have, at all times, distinguished our gallant navy. The revenue-cutters, placed under the command of the commodore of that squadron, have likewise rendered the most efficient service, under the direction of that excellent officer. Part of the marine corps, which volunteered its services in Florida, and distinguished itself during the last campaign, still remains there, and it is hoped that they may be permitted to continue their valuable services to the army of the south, until the close of the war.

The events of this war, and the heavy expenses attending it, have shown the propriety, and even necessity, of increasing and organizing the staff, and of augmenting the army of the United States. In the last annual report from this department, this measure is strongly recommended, and the reasons for its adoption ably urged. I do not think, however, that the manner of augmenting the forces proposed by the bill which received the favorable action of one branch of the Legislature, ought to be carried into effect. The organization of the army when it was reduced to the peace establishment, ought not to be abandoned. It is fitted to render the greatest service in time of peace, and to afford a basis for the augmentation of the effective forces of the country so a much greater extent in time of war. This arrangement should not, therefore, be disturbed, but the same system carried out in making new levies. I would recommend the addition of three regiments of infantry, and that the companies both of artillery and infantry should be increased to sixty-four rank and file, with authority vested in the President to augment their number, not to exceed one hundred men, whenever the exigencies of the country may require it. This would secure all the advantages of the present peace establishment, and enable the Executive, on any sudden emergency, to place the army on a respectable footing of defence.

Sound policy and an enlightened economy equally require that every department of the staff of the army should be augmented. A properly organized staff would have rendered the conduct of the war in which we have lately been engaged both more effective and more economical. As the army is now constituted, officers are drawn off for staff duties, to the great injury of the service of the line; and these duties are by no means so well performed as they would be by officers properly instructed and entirely devoted to them. The present organization does not give to regiments or companies any supernumerary officers They are no more than the performance of the various duties of their military command actually requires, and to reduce the number must weaken the army, render it irregular and inefficient in its operations, and greatly impair its discipline. Such, however, is the present defective state of every branch of the staff, that all are supplied from subalterns of the line. The department of the Quartermaster General, the Commissary General, the Engineers, the Ordnance, the Paymaster General, and the Topographical corps, are all compelled to make drafts from the line of the army for the performance of their indispensable duties; and the returns of the Adjutant General's Office, of the regiments in the field during the last campaigns in Alabama and Florida, exhibit a lamentable deficiency of officers to fulfil the duties properly belonging to them.

The Quartermaster's Department requires not only some enlargement, but the addition of higher grades, to render it adequate to the duties required of it. The functions of this branch of the staff, comprising, as they do, the quartering, supplying, and moving the army, with all its stores, and the execution of various objects of national improvement, are important at all times; but they become peculiarly so in seasons of active operations, like the present, when large bodies of irregular troops are necessarily called into service to aid our limited regular force.

The deficiency in the number of officers provided for this service has been sensibly felt from the commencement of our late border disturbances, and especially during the past season; and with respect to higher grades than those now authorized, experience has clearly shown the necessity of some clothed with the adequate ranks to enable them to take the charge of remote districts, and supervise the expenditure, and direct and control the complicated operations of the department in the field. It is certain that there can be no effective military operations, without a high degree of efficiency in that branch of the staff which is to move and supply the army. I would, therefore, recommend the addition of some officers of rank, with a limited number of that subordinate but useful class of agents, forage, wagon, and barrack-masters.

The department of the Adjutant General is entirely inadequate to perform its appropriate duties, even to our small army, and I respectfully recommend that it be enlarged so as to supply assistant adjutants general to each division and department of the army.

Since the establishment of the Commissariat of Subsistence, great regularity and economy have been introduced in furnishing the supplies of the army; but, in order to render it more complete, and to enable it to perform all the duties assigned to it, in the most economical and efficient manner, I recommend an addition to the present establishment of at least four officers.

I would recommend an immediate increase of the corps of topographical engineers. The extensive range of duties which have of late years devolved upon this corps, renders its increase a matter of necessity as well as of economy. It is physically impracticable, as the corps is now constituted, to obey the injunctions of Congress. Important surveys are neglected; works of improvement are slowly and imperfectly carried on, and the expectations of the country disappointed.

By a reference to the statements of the officer at the head of that branch of the service, it will be seen that the entire corps consists but of ten officers, and to these it has been found necessary to add, during the present year, about thirty individuals, employed as civil engineers, at compensations greater than are allowed to military engineers; thus making the entire cost of this branch of service much greater than it would be in the form of a properly organized corps. In addition to this consideration, discipline and a proper subordination cannot be introduced in a mixed service, where the smaller part only is subject to the rules and articles of war, the greater being entirely exempt, and without those positive distinctions of authority and of rank, upon which discipline so eminently depends.

The duties of this corps require the combined knowledge of the military and civil engineers. Their military duties consist in surveys for the defence of the frontier, inland and Atlantic, and of positions for fortifications; in reconnoisances of the country through which an army has to pass, or in which it has to operate; the examination of all routes of communication by land or water, both for supplies and for military movements; the construction of military bridges; the position and erection of field works; the defences of encampments, fords, ferries and bridges. For these purposes, topographical engineers should always accompany armies in the field, and without their aid the organization of a staff is defective and incomplete. Their civil employment, in the survey of the coast, rivers, harbors, bays, and water courses, in order to their being improved for commercial and other purposes, and in superintending the various works for these improvements; in surveys of roads and canals under the law of the 30th of April, 1824; and in conducting all civil constructions connected with the commerce of the country, and such international communications as Congress may direct. This brief recapitulation of the various military and civil duties of the corps, clearly points out the necessity of its complete organization, and indicates the propriety of attaching it to the general staff of the army. The direction of all the works, both civil and military, herein described, properly belongs to this branch of the service. A simple enumeration of the functions of the Quartermaster General will show that the duties of his office cannot be performed without the assistance of the officers of the topographical corps. They are to insure an efficient system of supply, and to give facility and effect to the movements and operations of the army, which cannot be accomplished without a thorough knowledge of the topography of the country. It is his duty, likewise, to select sites for encampments, and to assign to the different corps the ground they are to occupy—a duty which requires the aid of topographical engineers; as does the superintendence of the works at the several posts; the construction of military roads; the acquisition of such knowledge as the department is expected to possess with regard to the military resources of the country; the means and facilities of transportation; the state of the frontiers, with the most eligible points for concentrating troops and collecting supplies, whether in relation to offensive or defensive operations. This information cannot be obtained without the active co-operation of the topographical corps.

I cannot dismiss this subject without adverting to the opinion of my predecessor, in relation to the employment of the topographical engineers of the army by States and incorporated companies, in which I fully concur. At a period when it became a practice of the Government to permit these officers to aid in the construction of the public works in the several States, the description of talent and knowledge which they possessed was uncommon in our country, and works of great public utility would have been suspended or abandoned altogether, if this permission had been withheld. A different state of things now exists. The demand for civil engineers has created them, and not only is it no longer necessary to aid States and companies by lending them officers of the army, but in doing so an act of injustice is committed toward the civil engineers of the country. There can be no doubt that the practice impairs, very sensibly, the efficiency of the corps as a branch of the army, and deprives the Government of their services for military surveys, and the erection and superintendence of works of national utility. The commander of the army of the south says emphatically, in a late communication to the Adjutant General, "Had the topographical engineers been employed in their appropriate duties in Florida only one year of the sixteen since we have obtained possession of the country, from two to three millions of dollars might have been saved in the expenditures of the war." The ignorance of the topography of the country, here complained of, exists with regard to other important regions of our country, which will, probably, sooner or later, become the theatres of war; and I earnestly hope the Department will have it in its power to remedy this defect, by confining the members of the corps to their appropriate duties of examining and surveying the country for the purposes of national improvements, and national defence, and superintending the erection of national works.

Having stated the increase which appears to me indispensably necessary to render the several parts of the general staff of the army effective, it becomes my duty to submit to your consideration the defects of the present system, and to suggest a better organization of this most useful and important branch of the service. On examing the functions of each of the separate divisions, it will be seen that in the moving and subsisting the army, providing for clothing and supplies, including transportation, barracks, camp equipage, and all things necessary for the health, comfort, and efficiency of the troops, the duties of every branch of the general staff are so connected and dependent upon each other, that the best planned measures may be defeated by the failure or neglect of any one of them; notwithstanding which, they are distinct bodies, entirely independent of each other, differently organized, governed by different regulations, and, although purely military in their functions, depending only upon the civil authority at the head of the Department of War. Such an arrangement is complex, and incompatible with the uniformity and subordination which ought to distinguish the organization of every branch of the military service. I recommended, therefore, that there be created a staff corps, to consist of one brigadier general, chief of the staff; six colonels, six lieutenant colonels, eight majors, twenty captains, and twenty first lieutenants, who shall exercise all the functions, and perform all the duties at present exercised and performed by the Quartermaster General, Adjutant General, Inspectors General, Commissary General of Subsistence, and their assistants, and also by the topographical engineers and assistant topographical engineers; and that the Commissariat of Purchases, and the medical staff of the army, be attached to the said staff corps; thus uniting under one head a homogenous body sufficiently numerous to ensure promotion within itself, create an esprit de corps, excite emulation, and keep alive hope. This organization, at the same time that it secures uniformity and efficiency to the operations of the staff, is entirely compatible with its present division into separate bureaus, and will not disturb the existing relations of the present officers of the corps with the branch to which they are now attached.

This increase of the rank and file and staff of the army here recomended, by which its efficiency would be greatly augmented, and its administration rendered much more economical, has become necessary, independently of the causes assigned, from our greatly extended frontier, from the number and description of our maritime fortresses, and from the large body of Indians which the humane and enlightened policy pursued by the Government towards that people has concentrated upon our western borders. When, in 1821, the army was reduced to 6,127 men, the extent of our frontier did not exceed 6,373 miles, along the inland portion of which the Indian tribes were sparsely scattered, a large proportion of their numbers being within the States, and rendered harmless by the surrounding white population; and the maritime frontier was occupied by a few inconsiderable forts. Since that period, its extent has been increased, by the acquisition of Florida and other causes, to 8,500 miles, most of our principal harbors and bays have been fortified by extensive works, and the Indians concentrated upon the western line so as to present a front of not less than 45,000 warriors. The protection due by the Government to the inhabitants of this extensive and exposed portion of our country would require a much larger force than is here proposed, if their safety were made to depend entirely upon the regular army; and I would respectfully recommend the construction of a chain of permanent fortresses along that line, and a competent organization of the militia of the frontier States, as important and necessary auxiliaries for this purpose. If any danger is to be apprehended from an army of fifteen thousand men, scattered along a frontier of more than 8,000 miles, and commanded by officers educated to reverence the laws and cherish the freedom of their country, it is effectually to be guarded against by a proper organization of the militia. Their aggregate force now is little short of a million and a half of men, and whatever may be their efficiency against a foreign enemy, they may always be relied upon when the liberties of the country are assailed.

That the necessity of this measure may be fully understood, I have annexed statements, furnished by the Chief Engineer, exhibiting the number and names of the different fortifications completed and under construction, and the full armament and amount of force which each requires to arm and garrison it; of the works projected by the Board of Engineers, but which are not yet commenced; and for the prominent points along the sea frontier which require protection, and for which no plans or projects have yet been made; and a list of the posts on the inland frontier of the United States, with a notice of the garrisons deemed necessary for them in time of peace, and to preserve peace, furnished by the acting quartermaster general.

The measures of defence for the border settlements, which the policy of the Government towards the Indians has rendered it their imperative duty to adopt, have engaged the anxious consideration of this Department, and the matter will be fully treated, in answer to a call of Congress for information on that subject.

The report of the Chief Engineer, which is herewith submitted, contains a summary of the numerous and important works under the superintendence of this branch of the service. It is manifest, from a review of this document, that some further increase of this corps is rendered necessary, from the great accumulation of the public works confided to its charge. But the high order of talent, united to great acquirements, which have hitherto distinguished this corps, and which are required in the discharge of duties involving not only large expenditures, but, in many cases, the safety and honor of the country, demand that this should be done with the utmost caution. The youth who exhibit the greatest aptitude for such studies, and who, in their progress through the military academy, distinguished themselves above their fellows, and are deemed worthy to enter this corps by those who are appointed by Government to decide the relative merit of the candidates, ought alone to be added to it; nor should they be placed in charge of any work until they have been at least two years assistants to some older and more experienced officer. It is due to this corps to say that their pay and emoluments are insufficient for their support. Performing duties that require the exercise of talents and attainments which, in civil life, command the highest rate of remuneration, and in a manner honorable to themselves and useful to the country, they receive a less amount of pay than any other branch of the service. I beg leave, therefore, respectfully to recommend that the officers of this corps be placed on the same footing as those of the cavalry of the United States. A proper regard to the interests of this branch of the public service induces me to recommend the appointment of an inspector of fortifications, with the rank of colonel, whose duty it shall be, under the orders of the Chief Engineer, to make regular and systematic inspections of all the fortifications and public works under the superintendence of that officer.

The very important work of deepening the channel at the mouth of the Mississippi has not yet been commenced. Three plans were submitted by Captain Chase, of the engineers, who was entrusted with the necessary examinations; first, by deepening one or more passes by dredging; second, by closing all but one pass where they leave the trunk of the river; and thirdly, by cutting a ship channel from the river. The Engineer Department suggested the propriety of adopting the first plan, as the least costly and the soonest executed; and preparations were made, and all things in readiness, to commence the work by the middle of December. In consequence, however, of representations received by the department from the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, the whole matter was submitted to a Board of Engineers, consisting of Col. Totten, Col. Thayer, and Capt. Chase, who have required further preliminary surveys, in order to enable them to form a correct opinion as to the character of the works most likely to be successful in improving the navigation of the mouths of this river; a request which, considering the very important nature of the works, and their bearing upon the commerce of the whole valley of the Mississippi, and its tributaries, has been acceded to by the department.

The operations on the great raft, in the Red river, closed on the 25th of May, for want of funds, with the exception of one boat, which worked until the end of June.

During the season, twelve miles and a half of this dense mass of wood, comprising the remaining portion of what is styled the Old Rafts, have been removed. The part now remaining, being four hundred and forty yards in length, was formed by the freshet of 1836, and is by no means so dense or difficult to remove; and the timber of this portion of it will be employed to stop up the only bayou which now remains to be closed. It is estimated that the cost of completing the operation, which will effectually open the navigation of this river throughout its whole course, will amount to fifty thousand dollars. If the appropriation be made early in the next session, the work may be completed, or nearly so, by May next; otherwise, it must lie over until the autumn of 1838, to the serious injury of the increasing population of the valley of the river, and to the great detriment of the work itself, from the constant accumulation of drift timber, which must necessarily take place until there is a free current in the river. If the work be delayed, the superintendent estimates that the increased expense, from this cause alone, will amount to twenty thousand dollars.

The act of the 2d of July, 1836, which appropriates $100,000 for surveying and opening a military road along the western frontier, imposes on the President the duty of selecting situations near it for the military posts which, in his opinion, may be most proper for the protection of the frontier, and for the preservation of the necessary communications. On taking up this subject for consideration, it appeared manifest that the conditions of defence, which it is supposed Congress had in view in making this appropriation, could not be fulfilled, if the road were surveyed and opened before the sites for the permanent military stations were determined upon; as without a knowledge of their ultimate position, the road might not approach them sufficiently near to afford "the necessary communications" contemplated by the act.

The selection of these sites has to be made without regard to lateral communications, but with a view to the tribes in front, and to the facility of approach from the rear. I am also of opinion that the contemplated communications, in reference to the security of the fortresses and the protection of the borders, ought to be perpendicular to the line of defence, and not lateral.

Parties are now making the required examinations, and as soon as they are completed, and the sites for permanent posts determined upon, the survey and works for opening the road designated by Congress will be commenced, unless, upon a review of the subject, they may think proper to adopt the plan of defence for the western frontier which, as has been before observed, will be presented to them in accordance with a resolution of the Senate to that effect.

The state of Charleston harbor demanded and received the early attention of the Department. It was represented that Sullivan's island was being washed away, and the channels which form the entrance of the harbor, filling up with the sand from its beach. By direction of the Engineer Department, a minute examination of the situation of the island was made in June last, by Lieutenant Mansfield, who submitted a plan for its protection against the encroachments of the sea, that was approved by this Department.

It is stated in the report of the engineer, that the the island and southwestern peninsula will be entirely carried away by the action of the currents and storms, unless timely measures be adopted to arrest the progress of destruction; that this island shelters the port of Charleston from the fury of the northeastern storms; and that its destruction would expose the harbor to the violent gales of the autumnal equinox, by leaving it open from northeast to southeast, besides the probability of lessening the depth of water on the bars.

Independently of the necessity of the proposed works for the preservation of the port, they are essential for its defence. The island forms the site of Fort Moultrie, which checked the approach of the British squadron during the Revolutionary war, and now constitutes, in conjunction with Fort Sumter, the only defence of this important harbor. These considerations induce me to recommend that an appropriation be asked of Congress to commence these works without delay.

It is my duty to call your attention to the present state of the works for the protection of the waters of the Chesapeake. Fort Monroe will require further repairs and new works to render it even defensible. One front of the fort is peculiarly liable to attack, for it is more exposed to a coup de main than any other, and is at the same time the only front liable to siege, and the only one exposed to land batteries within reasonable distance. The works intended to protect this front were commenced, and a large body of earth collected to complete them, and so arranged as, in some measure, to shelter the vital parts until the whole should be completed. From some misunderstanding, without the knowledge or participation of the Engineer Department, this mound was levelled. Earth has also been placed upon the parapet wall. These operations have proved injurious to the works, and immediate measures must be taken to repair the evils they have produced. In loading the parapet it was found that the masonry was not sufficiently dry and consolidated to bear the pressure of the great superincumbent weight; and although, from their original strength and solidity, the walls have not yet sustained any material injury, still it is of a nature to call for prompt repairs. I recommend, therefore, that proper measures to protect this fort from a coup de main, to which it is now so evidently exposed as to invite attack, be adopted without delay, together with the necessary repairs to strengthen the existing works. From an examination of the state of the works at the Rip Raps, it appears that the subsidence of the artificial foundation of stone, on which it is intended to erect Fort Calhoun, has not yet entirely ceased; and orders have been given to replace the mass of materials, collected for the completion of the fort, upon the arches, in such a manner as to render the subsidence uniform; and when this is done it will be prudent to leave it there for some time longer before recommencing the works.

The great difficulty which has been experienced in fixing upon a suitable site for the new fort ordered to be constructed on or near the Arkansas frontier, and in determining its precise position, has occasioned unusual and unexpected delay in the commencement of the work. The commissioners appointed to make the selection, by my predecessor, being military men, fixed upon a site with a single eye to its military properties; whereas, it is believed to have been the intention of Congress to erect a fortress which should serve as a refuge for the border settlers, who are exposed, from their situation, to the hostile incursions of the Indians; and it became necessary to direct a subsequent examination, in order to meet that object. A board of competent officers was accordingly appointed, and proceeded in the execution of this duty. Their report may be looked for daily, and the work will be commenced as soon as the situation is fixed upon by the Department.

From a variety of causes, not necessary to recapitulate here, but chiefly from a disputed title, which has been only recently decided by the courts, the land on which Fort Delaware is situated has not yet been acquired by the Government. The Pea Patch island might have been purchased when the fort was projected for comparatively a small sum, and, since the commencement of its construction, was offered to the United States for a slightly advanced price. Since the decree in their favor, one hundred thousand dollars, with interest from that date, are asked for it by the proprietors, and it remains to be decided whether this large sum shall be paid for the land, or the works be abandoned.

The importance of having a fort upon this island, in order to protect the harbor of Philadelphia, has been recognised by every board of military engineers that have examined the subject. It is the lowest point at which, in connection with works upon the main land, Philadelphia is defensible; and, while it covers that harbor, Chester, and Newcastle, prevents an enemy from finding shelter in Delaware bay, secures the debouche of an important link in the great inland chain of water communication—the Delaware and Chesapeake canal, and covers the extensive powder manufactories near Wilmington. For these reasons, it is important the United States should possess it; but whether it is to be acquired at the price now asked for it, or after an equitable appraisement of its real value, is a subject to be decided by the wisdom of Congress. In the mean time, the works in progress there will render its abandonment more costly hereafter, and may enhance still further the value of the island. An early decision is therefore highly desirable.

The ordnance corps, organized in 1832, requires some enlargement, in order to render it efficient. At present, there is not an officer to superintend each arsenal, and it appears to me that the public interest will be promoted by the addition of two majors and ten first lieutenants. But, above all, this branch of the service demands the creation, by law, of a mixed board of artillery and ordnance, to be composed of officers of rank and experience, to digest a general system of ordnance and small arms for the use of the United States. Similar boards have been formed, from time to time, by regulations of the War Department; but experience proves the necessity of some legal enactment, to ensure the due performance of this important duty; for up to this time there exists no general system, such as I propose, and such as is absolutely necessary to place this branch of the service on a level with that of other countries, and preserve it there.

Doubts having been entertained by my predecessor in office of the power of the Department to enter into contracts for supplies of cannon and arms, without previous advertisement, it has become the practice of the ordinance office to make informal arrangements with the proprietors of foundries and manufactories of arms, to receive a certain amount of cannon and muskets on inspection at a settled price; an engagement equally binding as a written contract on the part of the Department, but uncertain in its obligation upon the manufacturer. The former method of contracting for limited periods, is, in every respect, preferable. These establishments require expensive preparations, and having no other market than that afforded by the demand of Government, ought to have some assurance of the articles they may manufacture being taken off their hands. A contract for a limited period gives this assurance, enabling them to secure the most competent workmen, and encouraging them to render their machinery as perfect as possible. A recent opinion of the Attorney General declares this method to be legal, and it will be followed in future unless prohibited by legislative enactment. The existence of our own armories enables the Government to establish a standard of comparison to which the private manufacturers are compelled to conform, and secures the acquisition of good arms at equitable prices. With the same view, the establishment of a national foundry has been frequently urged, and I beg leave, respectfully, to repeat the recommendation. It is not intended that this establishment should, at once, furnish the amount of cannon and projectiles required; but it would enable the Ordnance Department to make the necessary trials and experiments, so as to determine the proper mixture of metals to combine the greatest strength with the greatest lightness, and produce the most perfect models. This would secure, at all times, a sufficient supply of the best arms at fair prices. Intending to submit a plan by which the casting of cannon and projectiles and the manufactory of gunpowder shall be placed under the supervision of a joint board of the united service of army and navy, the proposed establishment will, if adopted, be made useful to both branches of the service.

The erection of a manufactory of small arms west of the Alleghany mountains cannot be too strongly recommended. The transportation of the armament required by the western portion of our Union is very expensive and ought to be avoided. It appears to me that the establishment best suited for that country is one for finishing, polishing, and putting together, the several parts of the muskets, to be made by individuals artisans, after models furnished them by the superintendent, and received on inspection. In this manner the works can be curtailed or extended to any amount that may be required without inconvenience, and this description of manufacture become familiar to a large class of mechanics. The buildings and fixtures, suitable for this purpose, would be much less expensive than those of the present national armories, and, unlike them, the number of arms fabricated might be increased tenfold without requiring any addition to the original establishment. This armory might embrace the manufacture and inspection of rifles for the supply of the friendly Indians, of which numbers are now purchased annually.

Disputes have arisen with persons who withhold the rent lead due by them to the United States, under the terms of a license to smelt lead ore on lands belonging to Government; and, on full consideration of this subject, I think it my duty to state that, in my opinion, the reservations of the lands in the lead region, and the plan now pursued of collecting rent on their produce for the use of Government, whatever may have been its former advantages, is now prejudicial to that portion of the country where they are situated, and injurious to the interests it was intended to foster. Individuals will not engage in extensive, systematic, and costly works, such as are required in mining operations, without some better security than a mere license for smelting ore. Nothing more is done, therefore, than to scarify the surface of the earth, and the mine is given up at a time when it yields most ore, because its further extraction would require an outlay not justified by the tenure of the land. The miner then removes to another spot, where the same process is followed, and the whole region is dotted over with these imperfect and abandoned works. Whereas, if these lands were brought into market, to be sold at moderate prices, in small tracts, to those who will actually settle there and work the mines, they might be purchased by enterprising and industrious individuals, who would erect permanent works, develop fully the mineral resources of that region, and render iron and lead so abundant and cheap, that Government would be benefitted by the reduction in the price there of articles of which it is so large a consumer, as well as by the general improvement of that portion of the country. For these reasons, it appears expedient that authority be asked of Congress to dispose of these lands; and also of all ore banks and lands containing minerals, of any description whatsoever, under the control of the War Department.

The accompanying report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs contains a full and lucid statement of the various and important matters under the control of that office. The complicated and arduous duties of that branch of the War Department have been performed in a manner highly creditable to the officers charged with their execution. But there are some important subjects connected with these duties which require the early attention of Congress. The Commissioner represents "that the present system of disbursing, through the agency of military officers, has proved inconvenient, in consequence of their frequent transfer to other duties;" and it is, in my opinion, liable to still stronger objections, as it imposes upon these officers duties foreign to their profession, and of great responsibility, abstracts them from their regiments, and, not unfrequently, unfits them to return to them. I would recommend that this method of disbursing these funds be abandoned, and a sufficient number of civil agents be appointed, so that disbursements may be made by persons giving bond for the faithful discharge of their duties. I concur with the Commissioner in the propriety of providing by law for the more liberal compensation of agents and interpreters. On their faithful execution of the trusts reposed in them depends the success of all our efforts to civilize the tribes and maintain the peace of the frontiers; and the price now paid for such important services is not equivalent to that received by the same class of persons in the employment of trading companies, whose interests are not, I am sorry to say, identical with those of the Government, and whose conduct too frequently counteracts the humane policy of the United States towards the Indians.

In accordance with the opinion of the Commissioner, I would recommend the passage of a law by which all sums accruing on moneys invested for the use of the several Indian tribes be deposited in the Treasury, to be drawn out upon the requisitions of this department, in the usual form; and further, that the whole business connected with the investment of the funds, for the interest of the Indians, and the management thereof, be transferred from this department to that of the Treasury, to which it properly belongs.

Intelligence was received at this Department early in the spring, that the Indians were in an unquiet state on our northwestern frontier, and apprehensions were expressed that the hostile feelings which existed between the Sioux and the Sacs and Foxes, might endanger the peace of our border settlements. Sensible of the weakness of our forces in that quarter, having been compelled, from the state of our army, to strip both the inland and maritime frontiers of their garrisons to supply the army of Florida with a sufficient regular force, it was deemed most prudent to bring down to the seat of Government the principal chiefs of those warlike tribes. It is believed to be important to exhibit to those people the strength of the nation with which they would have to contend in venturing to attack our defenceless borders, and at the same time to impress upon them the advantages which flow from civilization. With several of these tribes it was made our duty to treat; and it would have been in a high degree imprudent, in the excited state of feeling which existed among them, to assemble large bodies in the neighborhood of our ungarrisoned posts, thereby exposing our utmost weakness at a period when it was important to display our utmost strength. The superintendents were therefore instructed to invite them to send deputations of their chiefs to Washington; and on their arrival here, treaties were negotiated with several of the tribes, by which large tracts of land have been purchased, and the object so much desired by Government, to extinguish the title to all the Indian land east of the Mississippi, nearly accomplished. The Sioux of the Mississippi have ceded their possessions east of that stream, together with all the islands belonging to them, and are to remove to the western shore. The Winnebagoes have at length agreed to dispose of their lands in East Wisconsin, and retire to the neutral ground on the west of the river. It is probable that their sojourn there will be temporary, and therefore a portion only of the neutral ground has been allotted to them, with permission to hunt upon the remainder. The interests of the country appear to require the existence of a line of frontier States between the Mississippi and the Missouri, and the extinguishment of the Indian title to all the land east of the Missouri, to the 43° of north latitude, would effect that object. With that view the Winnebagoes would have been at once removed south of the Missouri, had the country been previously explored, and a tract of land of sufficient extent set apart for their future permanent residence. The situation of that tribe, fast sinking under the degrading influences which surround them, and pressed upon by the whites, renders it a measure of humanity to remove them promptly across the Mississippi; but they were given to understand that they were not to consider the neutral ground as their permanent home. A treaty, likewise, has been negotiated by Governor Dodge, with the Chippewas, by which that tribe ceded a large tract of country east of the Mississippi, and have agreed to retire to lands west of that river.

A mistake had been committed by the surveyors of the United States, in determining the boundary line of the land ceded to the Government by the confederated tribes of the Sacs and Foxes by the treaty of September, 1832, and it was immediately determined to do justice to the Indian proprietors of the soil, and correct the mistake. The true line, however, would have excluded a fine portion of country, which was already settled and improved; and whatever may be the ultimate policy the Government may think proper to adopt towards the settlers who improve new and unoccupied lands, in order to acquire a title to them by future purchase, the Department is of opinion that, so long as custom and the practice of Government sanction their acquiring rights by such means, their claims ought to be respected, and therefore entered into negotiation with the Sacs and Foxes to extinguish their title to this strip of country; in doing so, it is deemed expedient to establish a line that will no longer be subject to doubt or dispute.

In this treaty, as in all the Indian treaties concluded at Washington, regard has been paid to the permanent benefit of the several tribes. Provision is made for the establishment of schools, as well as for instructing the people in the arts of husbandry, and for the investment of the purchase money so as to secure to the Indians a perpetual rent, a portion of which is to be applied in such manner as you may deem most useful and beneficial to them.

Much more remains to be done, in order to insure the faithful application of the funds destined for the support and comfort of the Indians. It now appears that their annuities really go into the coffers of the traders, in payment of debts incurred, in a great measure, by the idle and dissolute, but which are charged to the whole nation, and paid out of the common fund. The effect of such an arrangement is obvious. It encourages the vicious, and deprives the industrious of all incentive to exertion. The whole of this subject is of such vast importance, both as regards the condition of the tribes, and the character of the Government, that I propose to treat it in a separate report, and to suggest such improvements in the existing laws and regulations, as may insure the faithful application of their funds to the individual wants of the Indians.

Of the propriety of persevering in the system of removing the Indians beyond the evil influences which surround them within the States and Territories, and which were fast working their destruction, there can be no doubt. In its origin, the Government appears to have been actuated only by considerations of policy and expediency; but subsequently a better spirit prevailed in our intercourse with the red men, and their removal from beyond the limits of the States and Territories, rendered imperative by the peculiar circumstances of their situation, was connected with liberal and beneficial provisions for the amelioration of their condition. From a frontier people, roaming free and unrestrained over trackless forests and extensive plains, and subsisting on the products of the chase, they had suddenly, by the rapid spread of the whites, become communities, surrounded by an agricultural, enterprising, and enlightened people, seeking to develop the resources of the country, and, in their eagerness to obtain possession of their lands, pressing them into the narrowest limits. Deprived of their only resource, from the diminution of the game, and incapable or unwilling to resort to agriculture for subsistence, their situation became deplorable, and their distress was still further aggravated by the decisions which deprived them of the protection of the General Government, and extended the jurisdiction of the States over them. The inaptitude of the Indian character to conform to a state of society, moulded and regulated by a system of laws based on the principles and habits of civilized life, and adapted to give security to its multiform pursuits and interests, all differing from their own, is obvious. The only alternative was removal beyond the limits of the States, and the beneficent hand of the Government was extended to relieve that people from the operation of laws, beyond their comprehension to understand, or their ability to observe, and to remove them to distant lands, abounding in game, and guarantied to them for ever from the intrusion of the whites. The results of this policy have surpassed the expectations of the most sanguine.

The reports of the superintendents represent the early emigrants as living in comfort and abundance, and improving in the useful arts; and hopes may now be entertained of the preservation of the aboriginal inhabitants of this continent, and of their gradual civilization.

Ample provision has been made for their education, and the only duty of the Government which remains undischarged, is the formation of a suitable Territorial Government, and their admission to such a supervisory care in the general legislation as is granted by the laws to other Territories of the United States, and for the exercise of which they appear to be sufficiently prepared.

The subject is confessedly difficult and embarrassing; but the bill introduced into Congress at the last session, and partially acted upon, would seem to offer a fair prospect of success, and to secure to these Indians the enjoyment of all the advantages of free government, which the necessity of stretching over them the protecting arm of Government will admit.

This scheme has been submitted to several of the tribes, and been approved by them, and may safely be carried into effect and remain in operation until experience shall point out the alterations and amendments it may require.

Having received information early in the spring of this year, from sources to be relied upon, that the Camanche Indians had committed outrages upon our citizens, and carried off some women, whom they retained as prisoners, and that apprehensions were entertained of their committing other acts of hostility, if their complaints were not listened to and their grievances redressed, instructions were given, with your sanction, to Mr. A. P. Chouteau to repair to that country and ascertain the facts connected with these outrages, and the causes of complaint, if any really existed; to give assurances of ample reparation and exact the same from them, and to obtain the release of the prisoners, and restore them to their families and friends. With a view, likewise, of preserving the peace of that frontier, Mr. Chouteau was instructed to invite this powerful tribe to send a deputation to Washington, that they might represent their own grievances, and, at the same time, become acquainted with the real strength and resources of the nation they have hitherto deemed lightly of, from seeing only a few posts, thinly scattered along the frontiers, and feebly garrisoned. It is understood that Mr. Chouteau has succeeded in this part of his mission. These measures of precaution were taken from the necessity of the case, without any appropriation or legal provision for defraying the expenses; and I respectfully recommend that the subject be submitted to Congress for its sanction, and the necessary appropriations asked to enable the Department to discharge its obligations to Mr Chouteau; and, further, that a small sum be entrusted to the discretion of the Executive, to be expended on emergencies like this, requiring prompt action to preserve the peace of the country.

The report of the Commissioner of Pensions shows the probable increase of the disbursements for the ensuing year, raising the estimate from $1,593,936 to $2,532,149, principally from the operation of the third section of the law of the 4th of July, 1836. It will be seen, likewise, from this report, that some legislative action is required to deter persons employed as agents of pensioners, from defrauding them. This appears to be done both by withholding a portion of the money received in trust for the disabled soldier, or destitute widow and orphan, and by charging them an exorbitant per centage for collecting the stipend awarded them by the bounty of the Government.

Although I do not concur in a former recommendation to extend the provisions of the pension laws to any other classes than those embraced by the acts now in force, I beg leave to reiterate that which proposes some legal organization for the purpose of establishing a fund for the support of invalid officers and the widows and children of such of them as may die in the service. This may be done by making a moderate deduction from their pay, to such an amount and in such manner as may be agreed upon by the officers themselves. Similar provision may be made, in like manner, for invalied and disabled soldiers, and the widows and children of those who die in the service, not now provided for by law. This provision will become more necessary should the period of enlistment be restored to five years, a change which cannot be too strongly recommended. It is unnecessary to enter into the details of these plans for providing for the support of invalided officers and soldiers and their families. They may be so framed as to obviate all the objections which have been urged against their adoption, and are called for by every consideration of policy and humanity. Intimately connected with this subject is that of the pay of the officers of the line of the army. The very proper increase of pay made at the last session of Congress for the civil officers serving in the several departments, conveys an acknowledgment of the necessity of increasing all salaries of public servants which are below a certain amount; a principle which applies with great force to the condition of the officers of the army. In pursuance of this policy, I would recommend a moderate increase of pay to soldiers, non-commissioned and commissioned officers of the artillery and infantry of the United States, from the rank of second lieutenant to that of lieutenant-colonel. The high price of labor, the demand throughout the country for that description of talent possessed, in an eminent degree, by the officers of our army, and which commands the highest rate of remuneration, together with the enhanced cost of all the comforts and necessaries of life, render this measure just and necessary, and I confidently ask your concurrence to procure for it the favorable consideration of Congress.

In the present uncertainty which prevails on the subject of the intention of Congress permanently to prohibit by law officers of the army from claiming or receiving any remuneration for disbursing moneys, the different interpretations given to the act renders its operation unequal and unjust. In almost all instances where the officers have withheld moneys and brought suits for the recovery of sums charged for commissions on their disbursements, the courts have awarded the full amount claimed; whereas those who have accounted for all they have received remain without any remuneration. If the proviso attached to the appropriation act of 1835, for the improvement of certain harbors, which prohibits any allowance to officers for extra official duties and responsibilities, is intended to be permanent, it ought to be fully and explicitly stated, so as to bind the decisions of the courts of law. But if Congress be of opinion that it is just to allow some remuneration for extra services, in cases where great responsibilities are incurred, then it would appear better to determine that compensation by law. I would by no means recommend that any allowance should be made for disbursing the usual and ordinary appropriations for the military service; but where heavy and extra duties are imposed upon officers, involving great risk, from circumstances beyond their control and against which no human precaution can protect them, it appears equitable that some compensation should be allowed, which on every account it would be better to fix by law.

By your instructions, in pursuance of the provisions of the act of the 3d of March, 1837, authorizing you to select and cause to be purchased, for the use and benefit of sick seamen and boatmen, and all other navigators on the western rivers and lakes, suitable sites for hospitals, a commission of able and experienced surgeons of the army was appointed to discharge this duty. The accompanying report shows that they have performed it with the zeal and ability which characterizes this branch of the service; and the contracts made by them to effect the purchase of the sites selected would have been sanctioned by the department, had the sum been with the amount appropriated by Congress for this purpose. The whole amount required will be $39,968, being an excess, over and above the sum appropriated, of $24,968.

The beneficient object intended to be accomplished by Congress in directing this examination, and the purchase of the several sites selected, will not, I trust, be defeated by this circumstance, and in this hope, plans and estimates for the construction of the hospitals accompany this report.

All which is respectfully submitted.

J. R. POINSETT.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMEET,
December 2, 1837.

SIR: In the performance of my duty to lay before you at this time the condition of our Navy, I beg leave to submit the following report:

Within the year past, the repairs of the Columbus, Ohio, and Delaware ships of the line, have been completed. The ship of the line Pennsylvania has been launched, and her equipments so far advanced as to be nearly ready to proceed to Norfolk, where they will be completed. The Erie, John Adams and Ontario sloops of war have been repaired. The steamer Fulton with her engines and machinery is nearly fit for service. Two sloops of war, to be called the Cyane and Levant, have been commenced under the appropriations of last year, and are nearly ready for launching, the one at Boston and the other at New York.

For a particular statement of the condition of our vessels on the stocks, as well as those afloat at our navy yards, I beg leave to refer to the report of the Commissioners of the Navy Board herewith submitted, (marked I;) and for the amount of timber, iron, and other materials, procured for the gradual improvement of the Navy, to their report, (marked L.)

The squadron in the Mediterranean consists of the frigates Constitution and the United States, and the schooner Shark. This is less than the usual force upon that station, but is deemed adequate to the present exigencies of our commerce in that sea; and as vessels were much wanted for other stations, none have been sent to that since the return of the Potomac and John Adams.

The frigate Constitution must be recalled in the early part of the coming year, when an addition can be conveniently made to this squadron, and the ship of the line Pennsylania sent to that station, should it be deemed expedient.

Our force in the Pacific at the time of my last annual report, was composed of the frigate Brandywine and the schooners Dolphin and Boxer; since which, the Brandywine, Commodore Wadsworth, has returned to the United States, and the Dolphin has been condemned and sold. The squadron now consists of the ship of the line North Carolina, Commodore Ballard, and the sloops of war Falmouth and Lexington and the schooners Enterprise and Boxer.

This is a considerable addition to our force on that station, but not greater than a due regard for our commerce in the Pacific at this time seemed to require.

The sloop of war Erie, Commodore Renshaw, returned from the coast of Brazil on the 15th of September last; and our squadron on that station now consists of the razee Independence, Commodore John B. Nicholson, the sloop of war Fairfield and the brig Dolphin. The Independence sailed from Boston on the 20th of May last, having on board our Minister to Russia, Mr. Dallas, whom Commodore Nicholson landed at Cronstadt on the 29th of July, and then proceeded to his station on the coast of Brazil.

In the West Indies, the frigate Constellation, the sloops of war Boston, Concord, Natchez, St. Louis, and Vandalia, and the schooner Grampus, composed the squadron under Commodore Dallas. To this large force has been added the sloop of war Ontario, which sailed from New York on the 19th of August last, carrying out, in addition to her own crew, an extra number of seamen and marines.

The revenue cutters Dexter and Jefferson, which, by consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, were transferred to Commodore Dallas, after having performed the duties required of them, have been returned to the revenue service; and the steamers American and Major Dade, also under his command, have been transferred to the army, at the request of the Secretary of War.

The employment of these revenue cutters and steamboats, under the command of Commodore Dallas, has subjected the Navy Department to heavy charges, not provided for in the appropriations for the year 1837.

The West India squadron has been most actively and efficiently employed in the complicated duties of protecting the persons and property of our merchants and other citizens, in the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico; of co-operating with our land forces in the Florida war, and of preventing the importation of slaves.

The sloop of war Peacock, Commodore Kennedy, which, with the schooner Enterprise, sailed from New York in April, 1835, on a cruise in the East Indies, and along the coast of Asia, with a view to the protection and extension of our commerce in that quarter, returned to the United States on the 26th of October last, having successfully accomplished the objects for which the cruise was undertaken. The Enterprise was detained by Commodore Ballard on the Pacific station, where her services were required.

Commodore Read, with the frigate Columbia and the sloop of war John Adams, is ordered to perform a cruise in the East Indies, and is expected to sail in a few days. A part of his crews are detained a short time, to assist in taking the ship of the line Pennsylvania from Philadelphia to Norfolk.

For the purpose of protecting our commerce and suppressing the slave trade on the coast of Africa, our ships of war have been occasionally ordered to touch at the settlements on that coast. The most recent visits to these have been made by the brig Dolphin, on her passage out to the coast of Brazil, and by the frigate Potomac, on her return from the Mediterranean to the United States. These visits have given the highest satisfaction to the colonists on the coast, and will no doubt be attended with beneficial results.

Lieutenant Commandant Gedney, in the schooner Jersey, and Lieutenant Commandant Blake, in the schooner Experiment, with their officers and crews, as sounding parties, attached to the coast survey, have been actively and very advantageously employed in the harbor of New York and waters adjacent. The discovery, by Lieutenant Commandant Gedney, of a new channel into the harbor of New York, through which the heaviest ships may pass without danger, must add greatly to the commercial advantages of that harbor, and to its value as a naval station.

The survey of the harbors south of the Chesapeake made by Commodore M. T. Woolsey, Captain Alexander Claxton, and Commander E. R. Shubrick, who were sent out for that purpose in the brig Porpoise, under the command of Lieutenant Commandant William Ramsay, being finished, that brig has since been employed, under the command of Lieutenant Commandant Wilkes, in the survey and examination of George's shoals off the coast of Massachusetts.

This survey has, after much labor, been finished in the most satisfactory manner, and will add much to the safety of a navigation hitherto considered dangerous Lieutenant Commandant Wilkes is now ordered to take command of the brig Porpoise, and make an examination and survey of the harbors of Beaufort and Wilmington, in North Carolina, and a survey of May river, from Tybee bar to the Hunting island, which surveys are required by the act of the 3d of March last, making appropriations for the naval service.

Upon the application of the Board of Navy Commissioners, seventeen officers of the Navy were placed under their orders, for the purpose of making examinations required by the second section of an act of Congress of the 3d of March last, in relation to a selection of sites for lighthouses. These officers have completed the duties assigned to them in a satisfactory manner, as the Commissioners have reported to the Secretary of the Treasury. The travelling expenses and increased pay consequent upon the employment of these officers on this duty, have been borne by the Navy Department, and have to that extent increased the naval expenditures beyond what was contemplated in the estimates for the year.

The vessels enumerated in commission on foreign stations, or about to sail, including the five vessels of the South Sea Exploring Expedition, compose a larger naval force than we have had in commission at any time since the late war with Great Britain.

The satisfactory condition of our force abroad affords us the opportunity of providing for a home squadron for the protection of commerce on our extensive coast. Estimates for such a squadron are submitted with those for the general naval service for the year 1838.

Within the past year the number of captains of the Navy has been increased from forty to fifty; of commanders, from forty-one to fifty; of lieutenants, from two hundred and sixty to two hundred and eighty; of surgeons, from forty-four to fifty; and of assistant surgeons, from fifty to sixty.

This increase of officers was deemed necessary, from the increased number of ships to be put in commission, to meet the exigencies of our growing commerce.

The numbers of surgeons and assistant surgeons have not been increased in a just proportion with those of the captains, commanders, and lieutenants; and the wants of the service require a further addition to their numbers.

As the appropriations for the South Sea Exploring Expedition, in the law authorizing the same, amounting to three hundred thousand dollars, were inadequate to the expense of its outfit, it became necessary to submit estimates for further appropriations for this object, which was done at the last stated session of Congress.

With my letter to the President of the United States of the 6th of February last, and by him submitted to the House of Representatives, were statements of the Board of Navy Commissioners, by which it appears, that there had been expended upon the Macedonian from those appropriations about $62,000; upon the ship Relief, barks Pioneer and Consort, and schooner Pilot, to be taken from the same appropriations, the sum of $168,000; and that to complete the equipments of these vessels, exclusively of provisions, instruments, and contingencies, with the preparation of which the Board was not charged, it was estimated that $70,000 more would be required; making in all $300,500, exceeding by $500 the amount of the appropriations.

The estimate submitted for the annual expenses of these vessels was $346,431 00, amounting, for the three years, during which time it was intended the exploring squadron should be absent, to $1,039,293 00. In this estimate is included the sum of $43,842 50 for the annual expense of the scientific corps of the expedition, amounting, with their assistants, to the number of eighteen.

As this statement of facts could leave no doubt that the Exploring Expedition would cost nearly, if not quite, a million and a half of dollars, and as it greatly exceeded in number of vessels and men the most successful expeditions of a like character heretofore sent out by the maritime Powers of Europe, it was believed that its amount would have been reduced by withholding a part of the appropriations asked for by the estimates. This, however, was not deemed expedient, and the full appropriations were made by an act of the 3d of March last.

Before this time, Lieutenant Commandant Tatnall, who had performed a cruise to the Coast of Mexico in the Pioneer, reported so unfavorably of her sailing, that it was deemed proper to examine into her condition, as well as that of the bark Consort and schooner Pilot, which, with the Pioneer, had been built expressly for this expedition, and which, in point of sailing, were not considered equal to the Pioneer.

On the 10th of April, Commodore Jones was informed that the Commissioners of the Navy had made arrangements to have a thorough examination of the barks Pioneer and Consort, and the schooner Pilot, with a view to ascertain their sufficiency for the service contemplated; that the chief constructor, Col. Humphries, and Mr. Grice, naval architect, were ordered on this duty, and Commodore Jones was requested to join them, which he did.

On the 26th of April, at his own suggestion, he was instructed, with the vessels of his squadron, except the Macedonian, to proceed to sea, and make a full trial of their sailing; and was directed to return to Norfolk within twenty days after sailing.

Commodore Jones, on his return from his experimental cruise, reported favorably of the sailing qualities of the vessels; but recommended that they should be put into dry dock, for the purpose of the examination which had been proposed, and for such repairs and alterations as might be deemed necessary. Measures were taken for doing this as soon as the ship of the line Delaware, then under a course of repairs, could be taken out of the dock.

On the 30th of May, Commodore Warrington was directed to prepare the Pioneer, Consort, and Pilot, for going into dock. As Commodore Jones had required that another schooner should be added to his squadron, without which he should not consider the expedition complete or efficient, it seemed the more proper that the condition of these vessels should be thoroughly examined.

On the 8th of June, a board of five officers, Commodores Chauncey, Morris, Warrington, Patterson, and Wadsworth, was ordered to make such examination, and to inquire whether the expedition might not be reduced in number of vessels and men, with advantage to the country, and without prejudice to the success of the expedition. This inquiry I wished made, from the consideration that the difficulty of procuring the necessary funds for fitting out this squadron was greatly increased by the suspension of specie payments by the banks, which had then taken place, which difficulty had not been foreseen by Congress when the large appropriations for the expedition were granted, and which made it the duty of the different departments of Government to limit the usual and authorized expenditures, as far as the same could be done without injury to the public service; and from the consideration that, should a part of the vessels of the squadron be found unfit for the service required, it would be better that the squadron should sail with a reduced force, than wait until other vessels could be substituted.

On the 13th of July, the board reported that the occupation of the dock at Gosport, and the employment of some of the members of the board, prevented a meeting until the 30th of June. That the barks and schooner were put into dock and examined; certain alterations recommended, which could soon be completed, by which the vessels "might be made to answer the purposes proposed sufficiently well to justify their employment."

The board state, that had they "been called upon before any preparations had been made, to state the number and character of the vessels, which in their opinion, would be best calculated to secure the attainment of these proposed objects, they certainly would not have recommended those which have been prepared." They were of opinion that a smaller number would have answered the purposes; yet, from a consideration of the expense incurred, the time spent in preparing the force, and other circumstances which they enumerate, and as the officer selected to command the expedition was satisfied with the vessels, they came to the conclusion, that no reduction could be made in their amount at this late period, without prejudice to the success of the expedition. They, however, recommended a reduction of the number of officers and men to about five hundred, exclusive of the scientific corps. To this reduction, although in my opinion a very proper one, Commodore Jones made such decided objections, that I thought proper to yield to his wishes, and so informed him; and his force was continued at six hundred and three officers and men, exclusive of the scientific corps.

Before the proposed alterations could be completed, Commodore Jones discovered that the cooking galleys, originally ordered at his request, made upon a new plan for burning anthracite coal, would not answer the purpose proposed; and on the 1st of August he requested they might be replaced by others. The galleys wanted have been made with all possible despatch, at the navy yard at this place, and the last of them was sent to Norfolk on the 6th of October.

On the 26th of September, I issued orders to Commodore Jones to proceed with the vessels of his squadron from Norfolk to New York, as soon as they could be prepared for removal. He was not able to sail from Norfolk before the 12th of October, and arrived at the harbor of New York on the 16th of that month.

As I believed the schooner Pilot, notwithstanding the alterations made in her, was not well fitted for service in the expedition, I gave to Commodore Jones the privilege of purchasing such a fast sailing schooner as he might select, to be substituted for the Pilot. In consequence of which, on the 8th of Setember, he purchased the schooner Clara, now called the Active, for eight thousand dollars; upon which he was authorized to put such repairs and improvements as he might think necessary, at the navy yard, New York.

Although the vessels had not heretofore been in a situation to receive the scientific corps, and I could not, with propriety, order them to report to the Commodore for duty, yet, I thought it proper to put them upon pay; which was done on the 4th day of July last. And I requested Commodore Jones, if his convenience would permit, to meet a large portion of them at Philadelphia, for the purpose of having a perfect understanding with them, as to their accommodations with their books, instruments, &c. on board the vessels of his squadron. This meeting took place in July, and such arrangements, I understand, were made, as were perfectly satisfactory to the Commodore and to the gentlemen of the scientific corps.

As it was necessary to procure a great variety of articles for the gentlemen of the scientific corps, for which requisitions could not conveniently be made without a consumption of much time, I found it necessary to place funds in the hands of one gentleman of the corps in Philadelphia, and one in New York. I also placed five thousand dollars in the hands of Commodore Jones on the 29th of August last, for the purpose of purchasing such articles for the expedition as it was inconvenient to make requisitions for; and on the 12th of October placed twelve thousand dollars, subject to his drafts, for like purposes, in the hands of his purser. This unusual course was adopted that there might be no delay in the sailing of the Expedition.

The objects of removing the squadron from Norfolk to New York, as stated by Commodore Jones, were to complete the stores, and to introduce some proper apparatus for heating the vessels in cold latitudes. These, I took it for granted, would not require more than two or three weeks for their completion; and from the general order of Commodore Jones at Norfolk, I felt a confidence the Expedition would leave the United States in the month of November. I, therefore, as soon as I knew of the arrival of the squadron in New York, directed the gentlemen of the scientific corps to report to Commodore Jones for duty.

On the 3d of November I wrote to Commodore Jones that the chronometers for his squadron were ready at the depot, in this place, and requested him to send two competent officers to take charge of them. On the 10th of the month I sent him sailing instructions to be carried into effect as soon as his vessels were, in all respects, ready for sea, and on the 16th of the month twenty-five chronometers, in good order, were delivered to the officers sent for them.

Had I known the extent of work required for the vessels of the squadron, after their arrival at New York, I should not so soon have directed the scientific corps to report, or have issued my sailing instructions.

By a letter from Commodore Ridgely of the 21st of November, I find that the work upon the vessels of this squadron, after their arrival at New York, up to the 15th of the month, amounted to four thousand six hundred and thirty-one dollars; and that there remained to be done, after that day, to the amount of two thousand three hundred and thirty-three dollars, all of which requires much more time than I had anticipated.

All this work I believe, however, is necessary, and would not have been ordered by Commodore Jones, if the health and comfort of his crews, and the safety of the expedition, had not depended upon it; and impatient as the public is, that the expedition should sail immediately, it is better that there should still be some days' or weeks' delay, than that it should sail before the vessels are fully prepared.

The Commissioners of the Navy hold no correspondence with the commanders of vessels in commission, except in relation to their supplies of provisions and stores. The steps, therefore, taken by Commodore Jones, under his discretionary powers, to have the vessels of his squadron fitted out as he should deem most expedient, were not under the control of the Commissioners, nor subjected to the strict regulations generally observed in fitting out vessels for foreign stations.

It was believed, however, that but little work remained to be done on the vessels after their sailing from Norfolk, and that but a small advance would be required for completing the stores. Yet it appears from the letter of Commodore Ridgely, before cited, that the expenditures required at New York for these vessels amount to the sum of $6,932 89, and for the schooner Active, including sea stores, the sum of $14,700 96; in all, $21,633 85. To these must be added purchases, made by authority of Commodore Jones, of articles, for which requisitions have not been required, the amount of which is not known.

In my last report to the House of Representatives of the 13th of October last, I expressed an opinion that no further appropriation would be wanted for the expedition for the present year; but in ascertaining all the expenditures for the vessels since they left Norfolk, and what is still required for their equipment, it may be found that a further appropriation will be wanted for the present year, the amount of which cannot now be stated.

In obedience to a law of the 3d of March, 1835, authorizing the construction of a dry dock for the naval service in the harbor of New York, or in its adjacent waters, I caused soundings and other examinations to be made by an able engineer, Loammi Baldwin, Esq. for the purpose of selecting a proper site for such a dry dock. The report of Mr. Baldwin was decidedly in favor of the present navy yard at Brooklyn as this site; which was accordingly recommended in my report to the House of Representatives. This it appears, however, was not satisfactory; and on the 3d of June, 1836, the House of Representatives, by their resolution, directed this Department to ascertain, as far as practicable, the practicability of establishing a navy yard at or near Barn Island, in the straits called the East River, which connects Long Island sound with New York bay—also at Perth Amboy and Jersey city, in the State of New Jersey—the comparative advantages and disadvantages of those sites, and the site of the navy yard at the Wallabout, on Long Island, for the purposes of a navy yard; the expense of erecting the works recommended by Colonel Baldwin at the Wallabout, according to the plan prescribed by that engineer; the expense of a dry dock at each of the above positions; the expense of purchasing the necessary quantity of land, and erecting buildings of equal convenience with those now owned by the United States at the Wallabout, and the probable amount for which the lands, buildings, and other property of the United States at the Wallabout, might be disposed of, if offered for sale.

Under this resolution, I employed Mr. Baldwin to make the necessary examinations and inquiries, and on the 10th of December last submitted to the House Mr. Baldwin's very elaborate report, by which it would appear that the navy yard at Brooklyn, according to his former report, should be selected as the site of the proposed dry dock.

On the 22d of February last, the House of Representatives resolved that the Secretary of the Navy be directed to cause an examination to be made of the various positions not heretofore examined within the waters of the New York bay and its vicinity, which are adapted to the establishment and construction of dry docks, and to report their comparative advantages and disadvantages to the House of Representatives at the opening of the next session of Congress.

Under this resolution, I employed Professor James Renwick, of New York, to make the necessary examinations. He surveyed, with great labor and care, a bay at Constable's Point, in New Jersey, called Kill Van Kull, which, in his opinion, presents many advantages as a station for a dry dock and navy yard; which will be communicated to the House of Representatives in a separate report.

It is greatly to be regretted that so much time has been lost in making the proper selection for the site of this dry dock, the completion of which would be of the greatest advantage to the naval service.

In my last annual report, I stated that previously to the passing of the act of the 30th of June, 1834, for the better organization of the United States Marine Corps, double rations had been allowed to the Commandant of the Corps, and to the officers of the same, commanding at the navy yards at Portsmouth, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Norfolk, and at Pensacola; to the senior marine officers in the squadrons in the Mediterranean, the West Indies, on the Brazilian coast, and in the Pacific ocean: all receiving the sanction of Congress by their appropriations. By this act, the officers of the Marine Corps are to receive the same pay, emoluments, and allowances, as are given to officers of similar grades in the infantry of the Army.

The act of the 16th of March, 1802, fixing the peace establishment of the United States, authorizes allowances to the commanding officers of each separate post, of such additional number of rations as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, direct. These provisions of the last act were continued by an act of the 3d of March, 1815, fixing the military peace establishment.

The paymaster of the marine corps made payments for double rations to officers heretofore receiving the same, from the 1st of July to the 30th of September, 1834; but the accounting officers of the Treasury did not think proper to allow the same, inasmuch as the commands of these officers had never been designated as separate stations agreeably to the rule prescribed for the Army.

This was a case of difficulty which, it was respectfully suggested, required legislative interference, which suggestion I beg leave to repeat.

The rule for allowing double or increased rations should be fixed by law. This subject has received the attention, but not the final action of Congress.

The report of Commodores Stewart and Dallas, and Captain Bolton, who were appointed a board to prepare plans for the improvement of the navy yard at Pensacola, contains no estimate of the expense of carrying the proposed improvements into effect; and as that expense must be necessarily very great, it was deemed proper to employ an able engineer to make the necessary estimates.

Col. Loammi Baldwin, under whose superintendence our two dry docks were constructed, was applied to for this purpose; and an arrangement made with him to perform this service, if the professional business he had engaged to perform in the State of Georgia would permit, of which there would have been but little doubt; but his loss of health in this previous duty was such as to leave no hope that he could, during the proper season, make the examinations and estimates required.

An arrangement has since been made with Col. Totten of the Army, with the assent of the Secretary of War, to make these examinations and estimates; and he is now on his way to Pensacola for this purpose. It is hoped that, in the course of this and the next month, this important duty may be performed in a satisfactory manner by the officer to whom it is entrusted.

And the present annual charge is	$87,767 70

This statement is complete to the 1st of October, 1837.

The amount of arrears to invalids under the act of the 3d of March, 1837, is - -	$117,949 85¾
The amount of arrears to widows is -	270,125 37½
The amount of arrears to children is -	190,341 89
Total of arrears as ascertained to the 1st of October, 1837, and paid to 1st of July, 1837, under the same act, is - - - -	$578,417 12
The amount of stocks owned by the Navy Pension Fund on the 1st of October, 1837, was - - -	$1,049,232 25
On the 8th of November, 1837, there was sold Pennsylvania stock belonging to the fund, to the nominal amount of -	$55,000 00
And United States Bank stock paid for by the Secretary of the Treasury - - -	641,600 00
	696,600 00
Therefore, the present amount of stocks will be only - -	$352,632 25
But of the proceeds of the United States Bank stock, about - - may be invested in stock, and the capital of the fund for the next year may be stated at - -	200,000 00
	$552,632 25

PRIVATEER PENSION FUND.

It was mentioned in my last annual report, that this fund would probably be exhausted previously to January, 1838; accordingly, the last stock was sold in May last, and the proceeds applied to pensions.

The number of pensioners payable out of this fund is - - - - - -	36
And the annual amount required to pay them - - - - -	$2,920

Pensions to invalids were, according to law, granted to be paid during life, or continuance of disability; it is therefore recommended, as in my last report, that provision be made to pay these pensioners.

It is estimated that the annual sum of $4,000 00 will be sufficient, not only for this purpose, but also to pay the debts of the fund, and satisfy any claims that may be allowed under existing laws.

On the 1st of January next, six months' pay will be due, and should a law not be made early enough to authorize the payment at that time, most of the pensioners will, in all probability, be much distressed and disappointed.

NAVY HOSPITAL FUND.

The balance in the Treasury to the credit of this fund on the 1st of October, 1836, was		$75,717 36
And the receipts to the 1st of October, 1837 - - - -		19,293 00
		$95,010 36
Expenditures to 1st October, 1837 -		808 00
Balance 1st October, 1838 -		$94,202 36

The particulars from which the above statements are made, will be seen in the documents accompanying this report.

A separate report, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 13th of October last, will be made, of the state, condition, and amount, of the Navy Pension fund, the operation and effect upon the fund by the act of the 3d of March last, for the more equitable administration of the Navy Pension fund, and the number and names of persons placed on the pension list, the times when pensions were granted to them, and the amount of money paid to each under said act.

The duties imposed upon this Department by the operation of this act, are extremely onerous, and require, as I would most respectfully suggest, the aid of a separate bureau, under a proper head as Commissioner of Navy Pensions, with powers and duties similar to those of the Commissioner of Pensions of the War Department.

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d of March, 1836, a board of officers was appointed to ascertain the efficiency, and test the safety, of the medium or light guns of the Navy, and to compare their effects with those of the guns for which they were proposed to be substituted. The necessary preparations and other causes prevented the completion of these duties until the 28th of September last.

From the report made by the board on that day, it appears that, after subjecting the medium or light guns to severe tests, they were all satisfied with their safety when used with proper charges.

They were also unanimously of opinion that the medium thirty-two pounders were to be preferred to the heavy twenty-four pounders for the upper gun decks of ships of the line; and three of the five commissioners would prefer the medium thirty-two pounders to twenty-four pounders, for the gun decks of heavy frigates.

The comparative advantages between the light twenty-four pounders and the forty-two pound carronades, seem to leave the question of relative efficiency to depend upon the circumstances of space in our own vessels, and the distance of an enemy in case of action; which, being variable in themselves, their relative efficiency would probably be estimated differently by different individuals.

A copy of the report of the board is hereto annexed.

Commodore T. A. Catesby Jones having presented to the board his individual views in a letter, an extract of such parts of the same as relates to the subject of the resolution, is also annexed.

Upon a late report that an atrocious piracy had been committed near our coast upon the packet Susquehannah, our officers and seamen, with great alacrity, volunteered their services to go in pursuit of the supposed pirate.

In performing this duty they encountered unusual hardships and privations, for which their usual pay and emoluments form no adequate compensation. I would respectfully suggest the propriety of making provision by law for giving suitable rewards in this case, as well as in like cases, which may hereafter occur.

In my annual report of December, 1835, I took the liberty of suggesting the necessity of establishing a national foundry, for the purpose of casting cannon, shot and shells, as well for the Army as Navy. This subject I beg leave to bring to your notice as one of great importance.

An establishment for the manufacture of powder for the Army and Navy is one of nearly equal importance. It is believed that under a joint board of officers of the Army and Navy, these objects may be effected with great advantage to the country.

It is my duty to state that the building occupied as offices of the Navy Department, is not such as to afford the proper and convenient accommodations to the officers and clerks employed. The want of rooms for the documents and vouchers of the Department has made it necessary to crowd the halls and passages of the building with wooden boxes filled with papers.

This adds much to the danger from fire, to which the building, with its valuable contents, is daily exposed. It is hoped measures may be adopted for extending the building, and for the safekeeping of the valuable records and papers it contains.

By the statement marked U, hereto annexed, it will appear that of the appropriations heretofore made for the suppression of the slave trade, there remained in the Treasury on the 23d of November last, $10,763 74.

The necessary references to papers and documents connected with this report, will be found in a schedule hereunto annexed.

All which is respectfully submitted.

MAHLON DICKERSON.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
December 4, 1837.

SIR: On the 1st of July last the post routes of the United States in operation were, as nearly as can be ascertained, 141,242 miles in extent, and the annual transportation of the mails upon them 32,597,006 miles, viz:

On horses and in sulkeys - - -	11,999,282
In stages and coaches - - - -	18,804,700
In steamboats and railroad cars -	1,793,024

The increase of routes in operation during the preceding year was 22,978 miles, and of the annual transportation 5,018,620.

From the 1st of January next, the post routes covered by contracts will be at least 142,877 miles in length, and the rate of annual transportation upon them 36,228,962 miles.

The number of post offices in the United States on the 1st of July last was 11,767, showing an increase of 676 within the preceding year.

The number of post offices established within the year was 956, the number discontinued 280, and the changes of postmasters 2,235.

The number of post offices on the 1st instant was 12,099.

The postmasters generally perform their duties with admirable fidelity and precision.

The number of contractors in the mail service during the last year was 1,682. Of these, 430 have been fined more or less for various delinquencies, and the aggregate of fines imposed, and deductions made, during the year, is $41,705 95.

Most of the contractors have always been energetic and faithful, and, among the rest, there has been, within the last year, a very sensible improvement.

The revenue of the Department for the last year, including an estimate for deficient returns, was - -	$4,137,056 59
The expenditures, including an estimate of demands not adjusted, was	3,380,847 75
Excess of revenue over expenditure	$756,208 84

The increase of the whole year was 20½ per cent. over the revenue of the preceding year, producing $228,834 59 more than was estimated.

Detailed statements with estimates for the coming year will be laid before Congress in obedience to the act of 1836.

On the first instant the Department had bank funds - - - - -	$430,655 57
Specie in post offices reported subject to draft - - - -	410,662 81
Total funds on hand - -	$841,318 38

In consequence of the failure of Congress to reduce the postages at the last annual session, arrangements have been made to improve the mail service beyond the extent of the accruing revenue so as to absorb the surplus. The career of improvement has been arrested by apprehensions of a reduction of revenue, growing out of the general commercial embarrassment; but no reduction of the service contracted for is at present contemplated.

The following improvements have been made in the time of transmitting intelligence within the last two years, viz:

Of course the whole intermediate, adjacent, and more remote regions of the Union, are benefited by this increase of expedition.

The advancement of the Department in other respects is equally satisfactory.

	In 1835.	In 1837.
Post offices - - -	10,770	12,099
Miles of mail routes under contract - - -	112,774	142,877
Miles of annual mail transportation -	25,869,486	36,228,962
Revenue -	$2,993,576	$4,137,056

In 1835, the Department was laboring under an extraordinary debt of $600,000; in 1837, it has a surplus of $800,000.

Efforts have been made to organize a great mail line from New York, through Philadelphia, Baltimore, Wheeling, Columbus, and Cincinnati, by land, and down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, by Louisville, Memphis, Helena, Vicksburg, Natchez, &c. to New Orleans. Between Cincinnati and Louisville a steamboat mail now runs daily; from Louisville to New Orleans it now runs thrice a week under a recent contract, and will run daily after the first year; from Baltimore to Cincinnati the mail has been greatly expedited; and nothing is wanting to complete the plan but a contract with the railroad companies between Philadelphia and Baltimore, of which there is a fair prospect. It is anticipated, that when this line shall be in full operation, it will be expedient to discontinue the Express mails between Philadelphia and Cincinnati, at least, as little can be gained by them; and the great mail will go from New York to New Orleans by this route in about eleven days.

It is hoped the bill relative to the transportation of the mail upon railroads, which passed the Senate at the last annual session, may become a law. It is liberal to the railroad companies, and would probably remove all obstacles to making contracts with them.

For some time to come the mail transportation will be nearly stationary. The post offices will greatly increase. The revenue will rapidly advance as soon as the general embarrassments are at an end. That of the last quarter was at least nine per cent over the corresponding quarter of last year; but the same relative proportions are not to be expected in the coming quarters.

The number of dead letters returned to the Department for the last two quarters has been ascertained as accurately as practicable. For the quarter ending 30th June last they were over 222,000, and for the quarter ending 30th September last over 225,000. The average may be put down at 900,000 annually. At 12½ cents each, their estimated average postage, the loss to the Department on these letters is $112,500 a year.

Estimating the letters delivered out at the same average rate, it will appear that the whole number of letters delivered from the post offices of the United States during the last year was 29,360,992. For free letters and dead letters may be added at least 3,000,000 more. The number of newspapers, pamphlets, &c. paying postage, conveyed by mail annually, is estimated at about 25,000,000. The dead and free newspapers may be about 4,000,000.

The convenience of the public business, and the security of the books and papers, require that a fire-proof building be provided for this Department.

It is necessary that the clerks provided for in the appropriations of the last annual session be made permanent.

The great increase of the number of post offices, and in the magnitude of accounts from the old offices, together with the multiplication of contractors, render it absolutely necessary to augment the force of the Auditor's office.

I take great pleasure in saying, that more faithful, devoted and efficient public officers than my three assistants cannot be found, and that the clerks generally partake of their spirit.

Some idea may be formed of the amount of business done in this Department from the fact, that the communications of all sorts received in the different offices, excluding the Auditor's office, amount to a daily average of about 860 for the working days, equal to 269,180 a year; the communications sent, to about 470 daily, equal to 147,110 a year; and the cases actually decided by the Postmaster General to 48 daily, equal to 15,024 a year.

The magnitude of the work done by the Auditor and his clerks may be estimated from the fact, that they examine and adjust the four quarterly accounts of each postmaster, making near 48,000 accounts a year, and the accounts of each contractor quarterly or oftener, making about 7,000 a year; keeping the mass of books required in this service; closing each year the accounts of about 2,000 ex-postmasters; and carrying on the heavy correspondence growing out of these extensive duties.

Herewith is an interesting statement of the First Assistant, relative to mail transportation.

I have the honor to be,
Your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
October 13, 1837.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 1st instant, and received by me on the 5th, I have the honor to submit the following report:

1st. The resolution asks for "the balances now on hand, so far as ascertained, to the credit of the Department."

The Deparument has in bank, exclusive of outstanding warrants - -	$444,629 41
In the hands of postmasters, reported	334,580 39
	779,209 80

2d. "An estimate of the receipts and disbursements during the residue of the current year."

The nett receipts of post offices for the quarter ending 31st December next, are estimated at - - - -	$760,000 00
The expenditures for the same quarter are estimated at - -	770,000 00

3d. "The aggregate amount received and disbursed by the Department since the 1st of May last, distinguishing the amount in specie from that in other funds."

The amount desosited in bank since the 1st day of May last, is -	$124,370 62
The amount reported as received by draft offices - - -	544,812 87
The amount received by contractors from collection offices during the quarter ending 30th September last was - - - -	237,970 38
The amount received in the same manner during the months of May and June, being a fraction of a quarter, cannot be ascertained without taking more time than the present session of Congress will allow, but it is estimated at -	50,000 00
Total receipts	$1,057,153 87
The disbursements have been:
By warrants on banks - -	$452,524 35
By drafts on postmasters - -	178,832 89
By collections from postmasters without drafts, in part estimated -	387,970 38
Total disbursements	$1,019,327 62

It is not possible to distinguish the amount received and disbursed in specie from that in other funds. Of the deposites in bank, it is presumed that the greater part was in bank notes, having been made before the suspension of specie payments. The Department has no report of the funds in which warrants on banks have been paid. It is understood that five banks have continued to pay its warrants in specie since the suspension, and have so paid $28,279 62 There has also been paid by the Bank of the Metropolis the sum of $35,426 71 in specie, which was specially deposited.

It is probable that most of the balance, as well since as before the suspension, has been paid in bank notes. If so, they have been received by the creditors of the Department of their own choice; for all warrants on banks returned with proof of refusal to pay in the legal currency of the United States, have been promptly paid in gold and silver. No drafts on postmasters, drawn for the purpose of paying balances due contractors, have been returned for refusal to pay in gold and silver, and it is not doubted that nearly the whole amount has been paid in that currency. In that currency, also, the collections by contractors have generally been made. That there are many exceptions in the ten thousand post offices from which the contractors collect, is very probable; but only nine postmasters have been reported to the Department for refusing to pay in gold or silver, and their aggregate quarterly balances do not exceed $1,525. Eight other cases are reported, involving about $1,600, in which bank notes had been received by district attorneys and others for old debts due the Department. In some of these cases, the notes or certificates of deposite have been returned, in others retained, because there was a bad prospect of getting any thing else.

4. "The regulations touching the funds to be received and disbursed, if any, other than those already communicated."

No regulations not already communicated have been issued.

5. "The instances in which those regulations have been disobeyed or dispensed with."

In no instance have the regulations relative to receipts and disbursements in the legal currency of the United States been "dispensed with."

There is no law or regulation expressly requiring postmasters to collect postages in specie or its equivalent. Gold and silver constitute by law the currency of the United States, and the standing regulations inform postmasters that they will be responsible for that currency or its equivalent, and that no credit will be given them for depreciation of bank notes or for counterfeits. Before the late suspension of specie payments, the postmasters took bank notes on their own risk, being required to account for the legal currency. The ten thousand collection offices remain on the same footing still, and the only change made by the circular of May 13, 1837, to the draft offices, was to prevent further deposites in banks. To ensure greater certainty in meeting the drafts of the Department, they were required to retain the amount due in specie. The former regulations in reference to collections were not changed. The cases where postmasters have been reported for refusal to pay specie on demand, are rather violations of law than of the regulations of the Department, and are so treated.

6. "Separate statments of the aggregate amounts left in the hands of collecting officers, paid into the Tseasury, and deposited in bank, the Mint and its branches, or other depositories, since the date first mentioned."

The amount left in the hands of postmasters since the first of May, most of which would have been deposited in banks under the former system, is $544,812 87.

The amount deposited in bank, as exhibited above, is $124,370 62.

No deposites have been made by this Department in the Mint or its branches, or in other depositories, nor has any thing been paid into the Treasury.

In further explanation of the operations of this Department since the suspension of specie payments by the banks, it is proper to add, that the notes of those institutions, though to some extent tolerated by law in the transactions of the Government as long as redeemable and redeemed in gold and silver, are expressly prohibited to its use when no longer so redeemed; that it was in obedience to the law that this Department, on the suspension of the banks, took prompt measures to prevent their receipt and avoid their disbursement in its own operations; that the suspension of payment by the banks occurred in the month of May, one of those months in which the quarterly balances due to contractors are chiefly paid off; that the entire available means of the Department for that purpose were deposited in the banks; that the Department had no alternative but to continue its warrants on the banks, or stop payment altogether; that inasmuch as the banks had given no notice of an intention to refuse gold and silver or their equivalent in paying out the deposites of the Department, it was considered no violation of law to draw on them as if nothing had occurred; for that reason, as well as to avoid an absolute stoppage of payment, and gain time to accumulate a specie fund, the issue of warrants on banks was continued, but instant steps were taken to provide a specie fund for the payment of such as might be returned with proof of the refusal of the banks to pay them in gold and silver; by the time they began to return, the Department had an ample fund for their payment, and in every instance they have been paid in the legal currency of the United States. By these means, without sanctioning or countenancing the receipt or disbursement of depreciated bank notes, this Department has been enabled thus far to outride the storm, with its credit unimpaired, and is confident in its capacity to carry on its operations, according to existing laws, receiving and disbursing gold and silver only.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

Hon. JAMES K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

REMARKS OF MR. HOLSEY,
OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, Tuesday, Dec. 19, 1837.—In Committee of the Whole on the resolutions offered by Mr. HAYNES, for the reference of the President's Message.

Mr. HOLSEY addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the resolutions, submitted by my honorable colleague, now under discussion. They propose to refer, first, the subject of finance to the Committee of Ways and Means; secondly, the reissue of the notes of the old Bank of the United States, to the Committee on the Judiciary. The objections to the first resolution apply to the committee; to the second, the want of jurisdiction. I shall attempt to answer them. As to the Committee of Ways and Means: the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Reed) objects, first, that the voice of people has spoken against the system of finance reported by them at the last session, and still entertained by the committee; secondly, that they submitted to Executive dictation in receiving and reporting the draught of that bill from the Treasury Department. Mr. Chairman, when I am called upon to yield obedience to the voice of the people, I should like to know what people. If the people of the United States, I shall deny the relation of principal and agent, of constituent and representative, between this House and such a people. I derive my commission from no such authority. I am not sent here to obey its mandates. In giving my vote, I shall yield obedience, neither directly nor indirectly, to any power, but that of the people of Georgia—a component State of a federal system. The members of this House find their duties only in their obligations. They are sworn only to support the Constitution. In consolidated forms, I acknowledge the obligatory power of the vox populi. It is the standard of action for the representative. It is the vital principle of Democracy. To it, I trust, I shall ever yield a ready acquiescence. But, sir, this House is not the representative of a nation; it is a branch of the councils of confederate States, each with full power, under the compact which unites them, to urge, insist upon, and carry out, through the forms of the Constitution, such measures as may be within the scope of their delegated authority. And this, sir, you will permit me to say, is not only the theory, but it is, in an eminent degree, the practice of this Government. It is confirmed at every stage of your proceedings, when the yeas and nays are entered on the journals. In recording his vote, what member takes the voice of the people of the Union as his guide? Not one. It is in vain, therefore, that the gentleman from Massachusetts reverberates the "thunder" of the people's voice. I flatter myself it will have no terrors for a single member. The voice of their respective districts or States, of the people who constituted them, and sent them as their immediate representatives, will be the supreme law of the members of this House, in their deliberative capacity, any thing, in any supposed expression of the general will, to the contrary notwithstanding. Thus much for the law, as laid down by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts. What are the facts? He says the people have spoken against the system of finance adopted by the Administration, Concede it. Have they spoken for any other? There are but three propositions before the country: a separation of the fiscal action of the Government from banks, its connection with the State banks, and a third party advocating a Bank of the United States. Now will the gentleman from Massachusetts tell me which of these propositions is oremost in the race of public opinion? Will any one compare the advocates for the State banks, in point of number, with those of the system proposed by the Administration? Have the friends of a national bank, so signally defeated at the last session, again rallied under the cry of victory? Nothing could strengthen them but the defection of the Conservatives. Ask the Conservative if he is for a national bank in preference to the plan of the Administration. His answer is in the negative. Have the National Bank party gone over to the Conservatives? The two banks are, from their natures, antagonist powers, and cannot unite but in opposition to a third power, which assails them both. I am persuaded, Mr. Chairman, that, of the three schemes before the people, the scale preponderates decidedly in favor of the separation. I think, therefore, neither the law nor the fact, arising from the argument drawn from the influence of public opinion, sustains the objection to the committee. But, sir, I come to consider the charge of submission to Executive dictation. This is a grave charge, sir, and requires examination. The committee that could consent, and the Executive that would attempt to dictate, without the warrant of the Constitution, would be equally unworthy the confidence of the House and the nation. The question is, whether, under our Constitution, the President has the power to propose laws to Congress? In consulting that instrument for the powers and duties of the President, I find these words: "He shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient!" It may seem remarkable that, by the English Constitution, the proposing power is denied to the King; whilst in ours it is vested in the President. But the reason is obvious, if we attend to the difference between the power and influence of the two Executives. In England, where the King has power to raise and support armies, with a revenue equal to that of many of the nations of the earth, surrounded by the pomp and regalia of a throne, the power to recommend measures to Parliament might often be equivalent to a power to pass them. He is, therefore, wisely restricted to a simple negative. The American President, on the other hand, divested of the power to raise a single soldier without the consent of Congress, and, even if he could, without any sustaining power but in his own private fortune, liable to impeachment by one branch of the Legislature, and subject to trial, conviction, and punishment before the judicial tribunals, may safely be trusted with the power in question. Sir, it is a master-piece of skill, that may challenge either the past or the future, that our ancestors, after weakening the Executive arm below the capacity of extensive injury, availed themselves of the wisdom so often found in a single head to give form and impetus to the confusion and difficulty of movement which have so often marked popular assemblies. Is there any thing either in the form or spirit of the Constitution which restricts this power to mere outlines, and prohibits a specification of the precise measures which the President "shall judge necessary and expedient?" I think not. The power is general. It includes all the particulars. The power to recommend a measure comprehends that of detailing all its parts. It is particularly necessary and proper in all schemes composed of many distinct parts. General descriptions will give no adequate idea, but only serve to bewilder. Specification—detail—is not only consistent with, but in perfection of the general power. It is only the counsel of the Executive in that precise form in which you cannot mistake it—a form which imparts to all counsel its chief value. It is, therefore, in my opinion, no departure from the Constitution for a committee to receive draughts of bills, particularly if complicated in their nature, upon such subjects as are recommended by the President to Congress "as necessary and expedient."

I come now, sir, to consider the second resolution under debate, proposing to refer the conduct of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, in re-issuing the notes of the old bank, to the Committee on the Judiciary. An honorable member from Ohio (Mr. Bond) objects to this resolution—an attempt to infringe the jurisdiction of one of the States (Pennsylvania,) by reviewing the conduct of an institution chartered under her authority. Is it so? The charter of Pennsylvania bears date the eighteenth of February, 1836. It binds the bank to the redemption of such bills or notes as they shall issue. Its banking privileges commence from that date, look to the future, and have nothing to do with the past. It has no authority under the charter, then, to re-issue the notes of the old bank as part of their circulation. It cannot be made liable for their redemption under the charter of Pennsylvania, because those bills are antecedent in date to the charter. The foundation for their redemption must be sought in the charter under which they originally issued. The banking privileges of that charter expired on the 3d day of March, 1836. The re-issue must be either by the old or the new bank, or both, as partners in the transaction. If by the old bank, it is clearly contrary to law. If by the new, it is unauthorized by the law of Pennsylvania. If by both, it is equally an infringement of the charter of 1816, without the color of State authority for its protection. The principal and the agent become particeps criminis in the transaction. But the question may arise, does the circulation by the new bank, of the notes of the old one, amount to a re-issue.

I shall not deny that distinct corporations may circulate the bills of each other acquired in the fair and regular course of trade. Are they distinct corporations? Is not the same stock liable for the redemption of the circulation of both; and is not the stock of the old bank held by the president, directors, and company of the Pennsylvania institution in trust for that purpose? The act of that State incorporates the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, with the exception of the United States and their Treasurer. With these exceptions, which do not amount, I think, to more than one-fifth of the capital, there is a community of profit and loss between the two institutions.

"Not wholly different, yet not quite the same,
Their features their affinity proclaim!"

But, admit them to be separate corporations. By an agreement between them, the effects of the old bank were transferred to the new one "in trust for the discharge of its debts and the settlement of its affairs." With the funds of the former institution in its hands, in trust for the redemption of the bills of the first, is it not fair to presume that the notes of the former bank, coming into the hands of the trustee since the creation of the trust, have been purchased by the funds transferred for that purpose? If so, the character of a reissue is indelibly stamped upon their subsequent circulation. It is not in the fair course of trade, but in violation of the trust. Such a transaction by an individual would be justly regarded as downright forgery. It would be falsely uttering, or publishing, the bill or note of another. Will the consent of the former bank be urged in extenuation. Both institutions, principal and agent, would still find it impossible to escape the charge of aiding and abetting each other in violating the charter of 1816. That charter, sir, was a license by Congress, (whether constitutional or not I will not now discuss,) to the bank to use a very high prerogative of sovereign power. The power to issue a currency that shall represent the property of a nation, has always been held among the jura summi imperii, or rights of the supreme authority. The exercise of this power, by individuals or associations, without warrant from that authority, may justly be regarded as entitled to a pre-eminent rank on the list of high crimes and misdemeanors. On the 4th day of March, 1836, the power to issue money, hitherto granted to the Bank of the United States, reverted to the grantors—the Congress of the United States. Since that time, however, an association of individuals in the State of Pennsylvania, under color of authority from that State, but really without it, have continued to exercise this high political power, notwithstanding the expiration of its charter. But conceding for a moment the ægis of the State to be thrown over the bank as contended, the inquiry must still be met, how far a State may legalize the reissue of a currency originated under a distinct and independent authority? Sir, upon this question of re-issue I have no doubts. The doublings and windings of the bank, in its two-fold capacities of new and old, of principal and agent, shall not delude me. It is sufficient that a body of men, within the limits of the Union, continue to exercise a charter which has reverted to this Government. It is its duty to arrest it in a matter at all times so delicate and important as the currency. I hope, therefore, the resolutions of my colleague will be adopted.

REMARKS OF MR. NILES,

OF CONNECTICUT,

In the Senate, Thursday, December 21, 1837—On the motion to postpone the bill for suppressing the circulation of small notes in this District.

Mr. NILES said, that he hoped the motion to postpone the bill would not prevail. At the late extra session, the provisions of this bill, and those of another bill, now on the table, for compelling the banks of the District to redeem their notes, were united in one, and the sections relating to the banks were stricken out, against his own wishes, as he at that time thought it the duty of Congress not only to restrain the circulation of the small and spurious trash, but to compel the banks of the District, at some future day, to fulfil their obligations to the public. At that time there seemed to be a general readiness to suppress the shin-plaster currency, as it is called, and the bill for that purpose passed with great unanimity. He was not a little surprised, therefore, to witness at this time an effort to delay action on this subject, and prolong the existence of that nuisance, which afflicts not only the people of the District, but all others who have occasion to visit this metropolis. The two bills seem to be considered as connected, and the postponement of this, he presumed, would be regarded as a reason for postponing the bill relating to the District banks, and what he had to say would apply to the whole subject.

In regard to the small bills, they were a wretched spurious currency, which nowhere have any legal sanction, and, as a currency, are too vicious, and proceed from sources too polluted, to be tolerated a single day longer than may be deemed necessary to rid the community of the nuisance. Notwithstanding the suspension of the banks, there has been no necessity for this kind of currency; for where it has not been tolerated, no great inconvenience has been experienced in regard to change. Such has been the condition of the Eastern States, and he believed of some, if not all, the Western States, where this description of currency has been discountenanced, both by the laws and public sentiment.

The currency of this District is of but little general interest to the people of the Union; yet it is the extent of our jurisdiction on the subject: we cannot reach the State banks; we have nothing to do with them; they are not responsible to us. But as Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over the District, he believed it a duty to attempt to remove the greatest scourge which can afflict a community—that of a depreciated and fraudulent currency. What he regarded as most important, was the moral influence of the action of Congress on this subject. Does not the present condition of the country require the deliberate decision of Congress in regard to the present state of the currency, so far as we have jurisdiction? Will not the deliberate opinion of the National Legislature, carried out in our measures, have an important and salutary influence on the country, and on the State Legislatures which are now, or soon will be, in session? To hesitate to act, to pause in our course, is, in some measure, to give our sanction to the continuance of the suspension of the banks. Whatever may have been the necessity for the suspension at first, there are no reasons and no justification for its continuance; and for those who have the power, to suffer it is to disregard every sound principle of legislation, of justice, and morality.

Mr. N. said he believed that the banks here and elsewhere ought to be coerced to fulfil their obligations to the public. Will you wait to see if they will not voluntarily come forward like honest men, and agree to pay their debts? Has not this "experiment" been already tried, and failed? Have not these institutions been indulged in their voluntary, illegal, and immoral course for six or eight months? and who can say when they will resume specie payments now, any better than he could the very day they suspended?

But it is said the banks cannot resume in this District unless those in the adjoining States also resume; and we are called on to await the action of the States. This is a novel doctrine, recently promulgated, and presents a new and important feature in our banking system. It had been supposed that a bank, like any other business corporation, was an isolated institution, bound by the principles of its charter, and subject to the control, and alone accountable, to the authority to which it was indebted for its existence. But it appears that this is all a mistake; that the banks are all associated together, and form a distinct commonwealth, or political dynasty, governed by their own laws. Having openly set at defiance the laws of the States where they exist, they have undertaken to make laws for themselves, and have recently held a sort of Bank Parliament, to "regulate the currency," and to decide the important question when it would be reasonable and expedient for them to pay their debts. The result of this deliberation is well known; they have not only resolved to persist in their bankruptcy, but had the audacity to decide that they would not even fix on a future day when they would begin to pay their debts. And with these proceedings staring us in the face, are we to be called on to wait the action of the banks?

But, Mr. N. said, he protested against the principld that the banks of this District, or that the banks of a particular State, were to be controlled by the banks of any other State. What is this principle but a subversion of the laws and authority of the District or the State, and subjecting local institutions to a foreign power—to an alien influence? Whether this control proceeds from another State, or from a foreign country, is of little consequence; the principle is the same. If the banks in one State are to be subject to the control of those of another, may they not also be controlled by the Bank of England? If the banks of this country are so connected together that one cannot act independently of the rest, are not the principal banks here more intimately connected with the Bank of England, and equally liable to be affected by the course of action of that powerful institution? And what is the practical consequence of uniting the banks of the country together into a joint stock concern? Is it not to render the whole of them subject to the control of a few of the large institutions in our principal cities—perhaps subject the whole to the control of a single institution? He believed that banks, like all other local institutions, should be subject to the exclusive regulation and control of the authority that created them, and that, as regards the banks in this District, it is the duty of Congress to decide when they can, and ought to, redeem their bills and pay their debts. In determining this question, it was no doubt proper to look at the whole subject, the condition of the currency generally in the country, the state of the exchanges, and the ability of the banks to resume business on correct and honest principles. He would look at facts, and be influenced by them, but would discountenance the legislation of banks, and all alien influence. The banks of this District cannot rightfully be controlled by those of other States; they are under the jurisdiction of Congress alone; they are not to be "regulated" in their action by the legislation of a dynasty of associated banks. Such a principle, whether applied to the banks of the District or the local institutions of a State, is subversive of State sovereignty, of all law, and of every sound principle. He regarded this question as important only for the principle involved, and from its general bearing on the condition of the country in regard to the currency. He had no wish that any course should be adopted that would be oppressive and injurious to the people of the District, and had no objection to fix a day for the restoration of the currency of the District, so far ahead as to render it perfectly safe and easy for the banks to return to sound principles, and to an honest course of business. But it was for Congress to say when that time would come; he was not willing to refer the question to the banks of Philadelphia, or any other city. He was opposed to the combined power of banks, and to their concerted movements.

What are the difficulties in the way of the banks speedily resuming? When this question was under consideration at the late session, it was claimed that the subject was involved in so much doubt and uncertainty, that we could not safely fix any time when the banks could resume payment. Now we have an entirely different state of things. I avail myself (said Mr. N.) of this opportunity to congratulate the Senate and the country, on the happy results which have followed the wise and judicious measures adopted at the late session of Congress. The effect of those measures had been astonishing, and wholly unexampled in the history of this, or any other country. It is but three months since we assembled here, under extraordinary circumstances; a great calamity, or what was so regarded, had suddenly fallen upon the country; in the midst of profound peace, and of apparent success, the prosperity of the country was struck down at a blow. A terrible explosion had take place, and all the great interests of the country were prostrated by it. Money suddenly all vanished; foreign exchange rose to nearly twenty-five per cent. and specie to ten or twelve per cent. and bank paper, worthless as it was, could not be had. All business was at a stand; the wheels of commerce had stopped; the merchant shut up his shop; the manufacturer dismissed his hands, and shut down his gates; the mechanic was without customers, and the laborer without employment, if not without bread. Men looked silently at each other, as they passed in the streets, and spoke not; the whole country was mantled in gloom and despondency; and a deep impression seemed to prevail, that as the banks had failed, universal bankrupcy was to follow, spreading ruin and desolation far and wide.

Such was the condition of the country, as exhibited by the panic orators, on the assembling of Congress, who immediately raised the cry of distress and ruin, and called for measures of relief. The Government and the public Treasury, were of no consequence. What if the Treasury was empty, and the banks and the merchants did refuse to pay their debts? Of what consequence was this. The great object was to help the banks and the merchants, and to relieve the people—the poor suffering distressed and ruined people. Well, measures were proposed, intended to relieve the Treasury and the country; but they were opposed, because they were not calculated to afford the necessary relief to the people. But, with one exception, these measures were adopted. And what were they? They consisted in substituting the credit of the United States for the capital or credit of the banks and merchants, who were the debtors of the Government. The Treasury had ample resources; but, to make them available, would have pressed hard on the public debtors, and thus increased the general money pressure. To avoid this, the Government agreed to forbear to collect its debts; and to use its own credit, which is better than the credit of all the banks in the Union. This substitution of the credit of the United States for the dues of the Government, was, in its immediate effect, equivalent to the creation of so much capital, as it permitted the large sum of from four to five millions, due from the merchants, and eight or nine millions due from the banks, to remain in the hands of the citizens, as private capital, its place being supplied by the credit of the United States. And what have been the effects of these wise and healing measures? Let the present condition of the country answer! Where is the distress now? Where are the dark clouds that lowered over the country? Scattered and gone; all gone. And where are the panic orators, the heralds, who, from these halls, proclaimed and spread through the land, from Maine to Arkansas, the saddening notes of their country's ruin? Are these heralds of woful tidings silent? He had not yet heard from them here; yet they had, some of them, been heard from elsewhere; but they have changed their notes, and struck up a new tune—lively, joyous, and animated. The sudden tide of prosperity which has rushed in, like a flood, upon us, has revived the drooping spirits of those who were most distressed, and rendered them frantic with joy. I again ask, said Mr. N. where is the distress? Shall we look for it in the commercial cities North and East, where it prevailed most; where the complaints were deepest and loudest? Sir, we should look in vain: the scene is changed; the cries of distress, the weepings and wailings are all changed into songs of joy and shouts of triumph. Those recently distressed cities, which, like the cities of old, were so lately clothed in sackcloth and ashes, have since been filled with feastings and rejoicings, illuminations, the roar of cannon, public meetings for general congratulation, and the expression, by speeches and resolutions, of the strong and overflowing feelings of joy, are among the signs of the times that the distress has past off, and been succeeded by unexampled prosperity.

How sudden, how astonishing the change! How rapidly, almost instantaneous, the country has recovered from a state of distress and ruin! Such have been the happy fruits of the wise and judicious measures of the late session. The country has been relieved, its dormant energies revived, and its wonted prosperity restored. Does any one doubt that these changes have proceeded from the measures of the late session? We were then told that the national prosperity depended alone on the action of Congress; that credit and general confidence could not be restored but by Congress, and that it was in vain to look for the return of the prosperity of the country, until Congress adopted measures to bring about such a result. If Congress alone had the power to restore the general prosperity, it is conclusive that the bright aspect our affairs have assumed, must have proceeded from the wise and prudent measures recommended by the President and carried out by Congress.

Mr. President, let us all rejoice at the returning prosperity of the country! Let us rejoice that the days of the distress are past; that the panic is gone, and that the sounds of joy and gladness are again heard in our borders! The panic has answered its purpose; its end and aim have been accomplished; it worked well for a season; it helped out the elections admirably; but they are through for the year; the "experiment" has worked well, and accomplished its object; but let no one think it can be prolonged. When the people are prosperous and happy they feel it and will speak out: from the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh. These public demonstrations of joy in all our commercial cities—the illuminations, the firing of cannon, and other public demonstrations of rejoicing, mean something. They speak a language which cannot be misunderstood, nor misinterpreted. They prove that the distress is over, that money has become plenty, that commerce has revived, that business is restored to its usual activity. With such evidences as these of the general prosperity, he trusted that we should hear no more of the cuckoo notes of distress, or of the scarcity of money, or other evils of the times.

Such are the results of wise legislation; the measures of the extra session had an instantaneous effect; they immediately reduced the price of foreign and domestic exchange, and specie fell at once from eight or ten to five per cent.; exchange from twenty-two to sixteen or thereabouts, and has gone on improving until foreign exchange is two or three per cent. below par, and domestic exchange more regular and favorable than it has been for many years heretofore; that on New Orleans had fallen from fifteen per cent to one and a half, and would soon be at par. He had attributed these results to the late measures as a fair deduction from the premises and reasonings of others; in his own opinion, other causes had operated; and he had never considered the country as entirely ruined, or the people as really in a state of suffering in consequence of the general failure of the banks.

Sir, at such a time as this, with such a flood-tide of prosperity rushing in upon us, are we to be told that the banks have got no money: that they cannot pay their debts? This will not do: let them not think any longer to find countenance and protection under a fictitious panic, or to escape from the opprobrium justly due to a violation of law, and of common honesty!

At such a time of unusual prosperity and rejoicing, is it not proper to require the banks to act like honest men, and pay their debts? Is there any thing unreasonable in this? Will it be unjust, oppressive, or "making war on the banks?" Do not individuals have to pay their debts? and do not the banks make their debtors pay them, to the uttermost farthing? What objection can there be to this measure, either in this District or elsewhere? Have not the banks ability to pay? Those which are sound no doubt have; and those that are rotten, as no doubt some are, will not be more able. Shall we wait their motion, and see if they will not voluntarily resume payment? That "experiment" has been tried, and the result is known. The public expectation has been disappointed by the late Bank Convention, and their confidence in no small degree shaken in those institutions. But he hoped it was the last Bank Convention that would be witnessed in this country. Whatever considerations may have led to the decision, whether politics or speculation on the part of the large institutions, the public will not approve of it. Some sinister purpose must have controlled the result, as there are no substantial reasons why the banks cannot resume their regular course of business immediately. It is true that, at that time, money and exchange were not quite as favorable as they are now; but they were rapidly improving, and nothing could be clearer than that a general return to specie payments by the banks would have brought both down to par; and they have come down without such resumption.

There is no place that a return to specie payments can be more easy than in this District, where there are three millions of dollars a year disbursed by the Government, a considerable part of which is now paid in specie, and the residue in Treasury notes, or other funds which are equivalent to specie, or nearly so. The condition of the country, in regard to specie, is highly favorable. We have just heard a statement from the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) derived from official sources, by which it appears that the importation of specie since 1832 has been over sixty millions, and its exportation only about twenty millions; making an increase, in five years, of more than forty millions. There is now more than eighty millions of specie in the country, of which from ten to fifteen is in gold coin. If this money is not in circulation, it is in the banks. It must be somewhere; and if the banks could sustain their circulation in 1832, when there was less than twenty-five millions of specie in the country, can they not do it now, with more than eighty millions?

What has enabled the country to recover so rapidly from the paralizing effects of the general suspension of payment by the whole banks of the Union? What has occasioned the great differences between the present condition of the country, and that when the banks suspended in 1814? Then, it took years to recover from the shock; now, a few months has accomplished more than as many years did then, with the aid of a United States bank. Then, after the lapse of six years, in 1820, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Crawford, declared the currency to be in a very unsound condition; that although there had been a reduction of the paper issues of nearly fifty per cent. a still further reduction was necessary before the currency could become sound. Although the banks commenced the redemption of their notes in 1817, many of them had to suspend again in 1819; and the next year, Mr. Crawford declared that the payment of specie by a large portion of the banks was only nominal. The difference in the two cases is no doubt owing in part to the more ample resources of the country now; but must be mainly attributable to the bareness of the country as to specie then, when the amount did not probably exceed fifteen millions, and the great supply of the precious metals with which it now abounds. That is the true reason why the country has been enabled to recover so rapidly from the terrible shock which is always felt by an explosion of a credit currency. Whatever may be said in favor of a paper medium, the specie in the country is our only security; it is the only true basis on which the whole credit of the country rests; both the credit of the banks, or that credit which serves as a currency, and mercantile and private credit of every description, repose on the precious metals in the country. This is the only solid foundation of credit; and if this is taken away or weakened, credit will fall or be weakened, whatever may be the property or other resources of the nation.

The large amount of coin in the country, wherever it may be, whether locked up in the banks, or hoarded by individuals, is our main reliance; it is this which has carried us through the present crisis, and sustained the credit of the banks and the country, and enabled us to recover so rapidly from the shock of a paper explosion, which, on a former occasion, bore down the energies of the nation for eight or ten years.

There are no difficulties in the way of the banks resuming immediately. And if they will not voluntarily do it, ought they not to be compelled to redeem their notes? When will they be better prepared? they are, no doubt, in a much sounder condition now than they have been for many years. He was disposed to do the banks justice; and they ought to have the credit of generally having conducted their affairs prudently and cautiously since the suspension; although there were some exceptions, yet most of them had curtailed their discounts, reduced their circulation, and increased their specie, so that they were stronger and safer than they had been for some years. So far as this has been the voluntary course and policy of the banks to prepare themselves for resumption, they were entitled to great credit; but, to some extent, he believed it was the result of the times. For the last six or eight months, the business which gives employment to bank capital has been suspended. It has been a long day of reckoning, and no country ever wanted such a reckoning day more. Merchants, manufacturers, and all classes of business men, have, since the suspension, refrained from engaging in any new enterprises; some have closed their business entirely, and all have been cautious, and have done but little. The general employment of all has been the settling up of outstanding claims and demands; and, except so far as was necessary to keep along such part of old liabilities as could not readily be paid, there has been little demand for bank accommodations.

But this state of things will not continue long; it cannot, under any circumstances, go beyond the coming spring. Business will revive, and that speedily; the merchants have a keen appetite for it, and it will be impossible to prolong the present state of things. Trade and manufactures will revive in the spring; the natural and habitual enterprise of our citizens cannot be longer repressed; however desirable it may be with some to keep up the present disorders in the currency, and a suspension of business for political purposes, they cannot do it. It is utterly impossible. If there are many of the merchants who love the political fruits of a panic, they love their money more. The causes which produced the temporary derangement and interruption of business, have ceased. This is now apparent to the most common observer, and it will not be practicable to make any man of common sense believe the contrary. The resources of the country have not been touched or diminished in the slightest degree. The difficulty was only an obstruction, a derangement of the machinery by which business is conducted. That obstruction is now removed, and things have got back into their usual channels. Business will commence, no doubt, in the spring, with unusual activity, and extensive accommodations will be obtained from the banks. Their loans, which are now contracted, will be rapidly extended; new enterprises will be engaged in, property purchased, debts contracted, and the whole commercial machinery set in motion, and all based on an irredeemable, depreciated paper currency. Will it not be more difficult for the banks to resume after this state of things takes place, (and take place it certainly will,) than it is now? But this is not all: property will be purchased, and contracts made, upon a paper standard, and a depreciated currency. Millions in liabilities will thus be assumed; and will it be just, after having countenanced an irredeemable paper currency for a year, and given it an implied, if not an express legislative sanction, to require debts thus contracted to be paid in a specie currency, or its equivalent?

Sir, depend upon it, if the banks are not compelled to return to honest principles of action in the course of the winter, or early in the spring, we shall have fastened upon us, for years to come, that greatest of curses which can afflict a nation, a depreciated and fraudulent currency. When did a bank voluntarily redeem its notes with specie if suffered to continue its issues of irredeemable paper? He believed there was no such example on record. We have a memorable instance in the Bank of England, which suspended payment by permission of an Order in Council, issued on the Sabbath, and afterwards obtained the sanction of Parliament for six months; and under that authority continued its suspension for twenty-five years—its irredeemable paper constituting almost the entire currency of the nation. The bank found that state of things so very convenient and profitable, that its whole influence was exerted to resist every attempt to compel it to resume; and such was the dependence of the government upon it, that the whole influence of the ministry was exerted to justify and sustain the bank in its course. There, as has been the case here, the question became connected with the politics of the day, and the bank party and the Government party becoming identified, the institution was enabled successfully to resist all attempts to compel it to redeem its notes for a quarter of a century. During a part of this long period its notes were at fifteen per cent. discount; and whilst the whole nation were suffering from a vicious and fraudulent currency, the bank was rapidly making money, and greatly increasing its profits, drawn from the industry of the people. Its dividends, which, previous to the suspension, had not exceeded seven per cent. immediately arose to ten, and, in addition to the dividends, a surplus fund was accumulated of more than fifty millions of dollars. Will examples like this be lost on the people of the United States? He hoped not. Banks are governed by the instinct of profit; and, unfortunately, their interests are not often consistent with the interests of the community. He regarded the principle, that the banks ought to be coerced to fulfil their engagements to the public, to conform to the obligations of laws, of justice, and good faith, of the highest importance; and to sustain that principle, and to give to it all the moral force and influence which may flow from a solemn and deliberate decision of Congress, he hoped that neither of the bills relating to the currency of the District, would be postponed; but that we should promptly act upon them, and thus set an example which might perhaps have some influence on the country.

DEBATE ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

In SENATE, Dec. 26, 1837.

The bill authorizing the States to tax lands within their respective limits sold by the United States being under consideration—

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky spoke of this bill as only another attempt to disturb the land system, which had gone on prosperously for so many years. The object of the old law was to hold out inducements by an exemption from tax for five years to purchasers of the public lands. When speculation was rife, as it was when this bill was first presented, there would have been some reason in the measure; but at present there was none. Fevers of land speculation were periodical; he could recollect three distinct epochs when the disease raged in all its violence, and the price of the public lands were run up to an enormous height; but the evil had generally cured itself. Gentlemen should look into all the various projects set on foot in relation to the public lands; the effect of this law would be to take away the great inducement the honest purchaser had to settle on the public lands—exemption from taxation for the period of five years. Mr. C. intimated that the number of bills in relation to this subject evinced a disposition to take from the United States all the public lands as rapidly as possible.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama deprecated the course the debate had taken. He said he saw no propriety in drawing into the discussion of this bill other measures that were in progress, as had been done by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay.) The bill under consideration, he said, simply proposed to place the other new States on the same footing with the States of Michigan and Arkansas, as provided in the acts for their admission into the Union, as to the right of taxing lands hereafter to be sold within their limits. He said the reason which induced Congress to impose the restriction, on all the States before admitted, not to tax lands sold by the United States for five years after the day of sale, had ceased to exist. That restriction originated in the credit system which formerly prevailed; for lands then sold, only one-fourth was paid down; complete payment was not required till the expiration of five years, and if not then made, the land and money were subject to forfeiture. To have allowed the right of taxation to the States, in the mean time, might have involved and jeoparded the reversionary interest of the United States in the land thus subject to forfeiture, as it might have been sold by the States for taxes. It was not for the sole purpose of encouraging the settlement and sale of the public domain, if at all, that the restriction was imposed. Mr. C. said, as an evidence that this view of the subject was correct, the first and only States admitted since the commencement of the cash system had been received free from all such restraint of the taxing power; and was it not fair and just that the States, before admitted should be placed on equal footing, in this respect, as it regarded all sales hereafter to be made?

He said the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) had, to say the least, very unnecessarily drawn into the discussion another bill which had been reported, to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands. As to the policy and justice of that measure, he said, he hoped to be able to satisfy the Senate, when it came up; he thought it unnecessary now to occupy time in its discussion.

Mr. NORVELL said, there was a principle involved in this bill, which, to him, rendered it more valuable than any pecuniary or financial advantages which could result from it. This was the principle, that the States ought all to have the right to tax the property held by individuals within their domains, if their policy required them to impose such taxation. It was a sovereign State right, which ought never to have been taken from them. He believed that by the Constitution, certainly by the ordinance of 1787, when new States were admitted into the Union, they were to be admitted on a footing of perfect equality with the old States. Now the old States possessed and exercised the power of taxing the lands within their boundaries, by whomsoever they might be held. Until the admission of Michigan and Arkansas into the Union, the public lands sold to individuals within the new States, were exempt from taxation for five years after they were sold. The bill before the Senate proposed to place all the States, new and old, upon a footing of equality, as regarded the power of taxing the real estate owned by their citizens, or by non-residents, within their territorial limits. In relation to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky, touching the advantages which the new States might have derived from the favors conferred upon them by the old, in their legislation upon the public lands, he could only say, that the benefits which the whole Union received from the industry and enterprise of the new States, in improving the value, and encouraging the sales of the remaining public lands, far outweighed any disadvantages which might have resulted from the spirit of encroachment imputed to the new States by the Senator from Kentucky. He did not, therefore, think that the people of the new States were under such immense obligations to those of the old, as had been supposed by that honorable Senator.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky still maintained that the great motive persons had for securing establishments in the West, was the privilege they enjoyed of exemption from taxation for five years; and if the bill before them were passed, that great inducement for a settlement there would be taken away. In the course of Mr. C's remarks, he alluded to the squatters, who had gathered in great numbers, and seized on the public lands, organizing themselves into companies, and threatening destruction to any man who might choose to purchase, thus taking from the Union the public property. These were the people who came after their pre-emption rights, to secure them in their ill-gotten possessions. There was a law in existence, he believed, which authorized the Government to use a military force to drive off these intruders. What right had they to the public domain more than to the public ships? Were not both alike the property of the whole nation?

Mr. C. alluded to the inequality in which the old States stood; and for proof of it, he would point to the committees, where the power was almost exclusively given to the new States, and from these committees bill after bill had been reported, all having the same object, and all tending to the same end.

Mr. WALKER said this bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, contained no new principle, nor did it set forth any new views. It was the same, in all respects, as the bill which had been discussed in the Senate at a prior session; and he hoped that the measure would not be prejudiced by the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, which, in his opinion, had no bearing on the merits of the bill before them. At the period referred to by the Senator, the public lands were sold on credit to settlers and others; and the exemption from tax, for the period named, might have been a salutary measure. Now, however, they were sold for cash, and the exemption was no longer necessary. Besides, the two new States, Arkansas and Michigan, were permitted, on their entrance into the Union, to tax; and all that was asked by the bill was, to put the other States on an equal footing, by granting the same privilege to all.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he must ask the indulgence of the Senate to say a few words in reply to the remarks last made by the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay.) Mr. C. said that gentleman (Mr. C. of Kentucky) seemed to be endowed with a peculiar facility for changing positions, and adapting himself to the advocacy of almost any cause, or any description of individuals. It was but the other day, that, in the discussion of a little measure, which he thought proper to denominate a picayune bill—the bill to suppress change bills, commonly called shin-plasters in this District—he thought proper to bring into discussion the Sub-Treasury, and many other important principles of the Administration. He was then the advocate of the poor—appealing to our sympathies in behalf of the poor negroes and beggar girls of this District. Now, he had espoused the cause of the powerful monopolist and rich land speculator, withholding all his sympathy from the poor but industrious and enterprising settler on the public domain. Indeed, Mr. C. said the Senator from Kentucky had gone further and denounced the settlers as violators of the law, who had trespassed and seized upon the public property, and were entitled to no favor. Sir, said Mr. C. although this is not the time to discuss the claims of that meritorious class of citizens, I cannot pass by these unjustifiable denunciations without some notice. Even in regard to the amount of money received, he said, it was not a question of interest with the Government. It would be found, on a review of the history of our land sales under the cash system, that land had sold more rapidly during the existence of pre-emption laws, than at any other period. It would be found, moreover, that the average excess, above the minimum, received since the commencement of that system, had not been more than two or three cents per acre. Let the Senator from Kentucky wait till the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office comes in, responding to a resolution which had been adopted at the extra session on his (Mr. C's) motion, and he would see the Government gained nothing, in money, by selling the public land at auction. The true question would be found to be, whether the Government ought to put it up at auction, and sell it to combinations of speculators at the minimum price, or little more, and thereby place it in their power to extort inordinate profits from the cultivators of the soil, or suffer it to be bought, for the same money, by the honest, poor, and enterprising settler, who had, by the sweat of his brow, cleared and fenced his little farm, and built his cabin to protect his family from the inclemency of the weather. But, he said, he would repeat that it would be time enough to go into this discussion, and he pledged himself to be ready to meet it when the proper bill came up. He would then be ready to show what description of people, and whose interests, the Senator was advocating. At the same time he hoped to be able to show the meritorious character of the claims of those intended to be benefited.

But (said Mr. Clay) the Senator from Kentucky, by way of giving force to his imputations against settlers on the public lands, has thought proper to refer to an act of Congress, passed more than thirty years ago, which authorized the President of the United States to cause intruders to be removed by military force. He seemed to imagine that the mere existence of this law upon the statute book would be sufficient to stamp with odium the conduct and characters of those who went upon the public lands without previously purchasing. It is true, sir, (said Mr. C.) that such a law had been passed at the time mentioned; but what Chief Magistrate had ever enforced it, unless connected with the actual or supposed intrusion of the settlers upon the rights of the Indians, from whom the land had been obtained, and who still remained upon it under the treaty? For his own part, (Mr. C. said,) although he had resided for more than twenty-six years in one of the States where most of the land had been acquired from the Indians, in the mean time he had known of no instance of an order to remove the settlers on any other ground than he had mentioned, by military force. Indeed, he might ask, what Chief Magistrate ever would attempt to expel settlers, by such force, from the public domain? Would the Senator from Kentucky advise the exercise of such power? Public sentiment would revolt at such treatment of the hardy pioneers, who went forward improving the country, giving increased value to the public lands, and facilitating permanent settlements. Nor did he know of any penalty prescribed by law for cutting and using any other timber than that reserved, and suitable, for ship-building. There had been a general acquiescence, he believed, by every Administration, for twenty or thirty years, in the settlement, use and cultivation, of our newly acquired territory, with the exception before stated. Hence he had been warranted in saying, as he had done, when up before, that the Government had yielded a tacit permission, which exempted the class of persons alluded to from the charge of being mere trespassers.

Mr. C. said he did not know to what part of the country the Senator from Kentucky referred when he charged the settlers with using threats of violence to deter others from the purchase of their improvements. He said he knew of but one charge of that nature having been made against any of the citizens of Alabama; and that was some seven or eight years ago, on the eve of taking up the bill, which contemplated the first general grant of the right of pre-emption. But, it happened, fortunately, that there were those present who were able to contradict the charge, or so explain the circumstances, as to give entire satisfaction; and the measure passed by a triumphant majority, and had long since diffused its incalculable benefits. He said he had heard of no other similar charge against the people of Alabama, or those of Mississippi, close in his vicinity, where large quantities of the public lands had since been brought into market and sold. But, if such threats had been used by a few settlers in some particular neighborhood, was it fair, or just, on that ground, to assail all others, and deny them the benefits to which they were entitled? Was it compatible with justice to make a whole class responsible for the indiscretion of a few individuals?

The gentleman from Kentucky had thought proper to complain, too, of the organization of the committees; having, perhaps, especial reference to the Committee on the Public Lands. This objection, Mr. C. thought, came with a bad grace from that gentleman. If he would look back to the journals of the Senate two or three years ago, when the Senator from Kentucky and his political friends had the majority in that body—nay, if he would cast his eye upon the columns of one of the daily papers of this city, published a day or two since—he would find that there were at least four or five important committees at that time, upon each of which the then Administration had but one friend.

Mr. C. concluded by again deprecating this discussion as ill-timed and out of place, reminding the Senate that the bill under consideration only contemplated placing the new States, admitted into the Union under the credit system, on an equal footing with those since admitted, as to the power of taxing lands hereafter sold by the United States, and expressing the hope that the measure would be considered and decided on its own proper merits.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said, in speaking on this subject, he had reference to the land bills generally, those that emanated from the committees on public as well as private, they all appeared to have the same tendency, to wit: to wrest the public domain from the grasp of the Union. Mr. C. wished that gentlemen who had the poor so much in their mouths, would have their true interest more at heart. He contended that the pre-emption law led to the most infamous speculation, that the public lands had been engrossed by intruders, who their sold pre-emption claims in the shape of floats to an indefinite extent; these persons had constituted themselves into an organized force, threatening with violence all who attempted to disturb them, by purchasing from Government. They had traced out all the most beautiful spots of the unsurveyed lands, embracing the finest soils. They were continually bounding over the public domain, seizing on the public property, and appropriating it to their own exclusive advantage. As well might they seize on the North Carolina, or any other of our armed vessels of war. By what code of law or morality could such a course be defended? There was a spirit of lawlessness and violence abroad that he would like to see suppressed.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he did not rise with a view to make any remarks in relation to the pre-emption law, which was not now the subject of discussion, but merely for the purpose of justifying the vote he was about to give. Mr. B. said he happened to be on the committee to which had been referred the subject of the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and he would add a very hopeful and promising young sister she was. At that time he recollected there was a great deal of discussion in relation to the public lands, several contending that the lands of the United States should not be subject to taxation; the committee had, however, at last come to the conclusion that, on the whole, it was the safest to vest the power with the States; that while it could do no injury to the General Government, it might be the means of protecting the States from having their lands bought up by throngs of speculators, and remain uncultivated, unless sold at an enormous profit to the industrious and enterprising agriculturalist. What the new States wanted was honest settlers, who came to till the soil, and who, while they improved their own condition, materially added to the value of the surrounding lands and general interests of the States where they were located. Mr. B. was desirous of putting all the States on the same footing of equality, which was all that was asked by the bill before them; and he did not think its passage would prejudice the sales of the public lands, nor did he believe it would altogether suppress speculation.

Mr. ALLEN replied at some length to Mr. CLAY, chiefly in relation to the reflections which he considered had been passed on the CHAIR, in relation to the appointment of committees from the new States.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky denied that he intended any reflection on the CHAIR, and spoke for some time in reply to Mr. ALLEN.

Mr. ALLEN rejoined at some length, and with much animation; when the vote was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 35, nays 4.

DEBATE ON THE DISTRICT CURRENCY.

IN SENATE, December 22, 1837.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to restrain the circulation of small notes in the District of Columbia. The question being on the amendment of Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, to exclude the informer from receiving half the fine—

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, said yesterday he had moved to amend the bill under consideration, by striking out that part which created a common informer, and gave to him one-half of the penalty. During the discussion on that question yesterday, he had heard from different parts of the Senate the opinion expressed that there was no case known to the law where a person interested in the event of the prosecution could be a witness in favor of that prosecution. He would not at this time detain the Senate with a recapitulation of the arguments which he then submitted at length to the Senate in opposition to these opinions: the array of legal talent maintaining an opinion so opposite to that which he entertained, had caused him almost to doubt on the subject. He had, therefore, as a lawyer would say, since the adjournment last evening, consulted the authorities on the subject, and the result had been entirely satisfactory to his mind, that he was not mistaken on yesterday in the matter. He would read to the Senate from Starkie on Evidence, a standard work, what is now believed to be the law of the question. Mr. SMITH then read from the second volume of Starkie: "So in an action by the party robbed against the hundred, he is a competent witness as to the fact of robbery, although he is not only interested, but the plaintiff in the suit. So interest is no objection to competency if all persons who are likely to know the fact are equally interested. And therefore the loser of more than 10*l.* at a sitting, is a competent witness upon an information under the statute of 5 Anne, sec. 5, which subjects the winner to the forfeiture of five times the money won, upon conviction, and authorizes any person to sue for it, and therefore any person is as much entitled to sue for it as the witness. So in the case of extortion by duress, and in other similar cases which, from their very nature, admit of no proof but by the testimony of the party injured, he is, according to Lord Holt, a competent witness from necessity." This clearly sustains the position that the Court, without any enactment by the Legislature, will, ex necessitate, admit the witness, although he may be interested in procuring the conviction of the accused.

He (Mr. Smith) was opposed to creating interested common reformers; the remedy was, in his opinion, worse than the disease. What! will you bribe a set of men to haunt your taverns, market houses, railroad depots, and other places of public resort, to lay wait for, and act as spies upon, all who may visit your city, and then, in a prosecution instituted by themselves, swear money into their pockets? He trusted not. He would, however, to accommodate this matter to the views of those who view it as an important part of the bill, as far as he consistently could, withdraw the amendment he had moved on yesterday, and move what appeared to him to be an amendment which would, in a great degree, correct the evils he complained of. Mr. SMITH then moved an amendment which provides that if the prosecutor shall offer himself or be admitted a witness for the prosecution, he shall forfeit all claim to any part of the penalty; which amendment was adopted without a count. Mr. SMITH then moved to strike out the following clause of the bill as reported by the committee: "Summarily and without delay, and with the right of immediate discovery on oath in all cases where the defendant shall deny the issuing or passing, or attempting to pass, the note, bill, check, draft, or other paper in question."

He, (Mr. SMITH,) in making this motion, had two objects in view: first, to obviate a constitutional objection which had been suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) and which, in his mind, had great weight; and, secondly, to remove a feature which he could not be induced to retain in the bill—that of requiring the accused to answer on oath to the fact of his guilt or innocence. Sir, (said Mr. Smith) every Senator must see at a glance, that this bill without the amendment may exclude the right of a jury trial, in direct contravention of the principles of the Constitution. While he readily admitted himself to be a disciple of that school which recognises the power of the Supreme Court to declare a law passed by Congress unconstitutional and void when clearly in conflict with that paramount charter of our liberty, yet it is not the less the duty of the legislative department of the Government to see that it does not transcend its constitutional power in its enactments. The amendment on that point puts this question at rest; it leaves the question to be decided by the court trying the case, under the Constitution and laws governing the same.

The other object of the amendment he (Mr. Smith) had already avowed. This bill is one creating an offence heretofore unknown in this District, and punishing that offence with high pains and penalties; and how is it proposed to carry into effect its provisions? The answer to this question is furnished by that part of the bill proposed to be stricken out, by compelling the defendant, upon trial, to answer, on oath, as to his guilt or innocence; to criminate himself, to discover his own guilt, to subject himself to the pains and penalties of the law. Sir, (said Mr. Smith) such a proceeding never can be tolerated in this country. It can be resorted to with approbation only where inquisitorial power is supposed to be necessary to calm the guilty fears of some despotic tyrant, or to furnish victims for an inquisition. But in carrying into effect our laws for the suppression of offences, either mala in se or mala prohibiti, the principle has been justly discarded, and he could see no reason why it should be resorted to in this case. He had been long since well satisfied that there was no greater error committed by legislators than that of multiplying oaths on all occasions, and particularly in cases where the person swearing is interested in the matter in controversy. It has been truly said by writers on the subject, that "where you sow oaths you must reap perjuries." He was therefore constrained to say that he could not support the bill unless that provision was stricken out.

Mr. S. said he had occupied so much time yesterday and to-day on the questions of amendment, that he could not ask the Senate to listen to many additional remarks from him; he was unwilling, however, to resume his seat until he had said a few words relative to the merits of this question. He regretted to have seen in the progress of the debate a disposition manifested on the part of some Senators to give this measure a party direction. Is it possible that every measure introduced here is at once to receive the mark of approbation or disapprobation, as this or that party may think it may militate for or against it, regardless of the merits of the proposition? He (Mr. S.) had heard with surprise, nay, with astonishment, the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton.) That Senator had created his man of straw, had given life and animation to this object of his creation, called by him a "shin-plaster" party, merely that he might, by arguments that no one denied, prove that he was unworthy of the public confidence. That Senator not only attributes this state of the currency to a party he is pleased to call a "shin-plaster" party, but says that the party thus created by himself is interested in, nay, resolved to continue, the "shin-plaster system." Who compose this "shin-plaster" party, the Senator has not told us; the presumption, however, is, that he does not mean himself or political friends; then he must allude to the Opposition.

He (Mr. S.) was not aware, nor did he believe the fact to exist, that there was any party in this nation favorable to a "shin-plaster" system, as it is understood here. No, sir, it is a system, if a system it can be called, openly denounced by all parties. For himself, (said Mr. S.) he wished it to be distinctly understood that the remarks of that Senator could not apply to him. So far from being favorable to "shin-plasters," to corporation and individual rags for money, his objection to the notes of the State incorporated banks had always been that even they were too local in their character to answer the purposes of a general and extended circulating medium. He had, ever since he had been a public man, contended for, and still insisted on, a sound mixed currency—specie and local bank paper, redeemable at the will of the holder in specie, as a local medium; and a national paper currency, redeemable on demand and convertible into specie at the will of the holder, of universal credit and circulation, equally current from Maine to Georgia, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, as a national or general medium of circulation. Sir, (said Mr. S.) the charge, as he had heretofore understood it, was, that the party to which he belonged favored a great monopolizing institution, sufficient in power to annihilate all the local issues. Now, it seems the charge is to be, that it is not a "national bank party," but a "shin-plaster party." Sir, (said Mr. S.) his first impression of this matter was, that these shin-plasters were a mere excrescence, a fungus, growing out of a vicious state of the currency; and he still believed that, whenever the banks shall resume specie payments, public opinion will greatly lessen the evil; yet the facts admitted by all, that the same cause does not produce the same effect at other places, was very conclusive to his mind that these small notes were issued more for private gain than for the accommodation of the public. He could not, therefore, come to the conclusion that the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) did, that the suppression of these bills, before there was a surrounding resumption of specie payments by the banks, would operate oppressively to the poor, the market people, and others transacting the small concerns of the city. He (Mr. S.) was of the opinion that the result would prove otherwise, and that those were the very persons most likely to be benefited by the suppression of these bills, because they are the most likely to be imposed upon by them. Under the impression that the measure will prove a salutary one, that it will rid the District of its vitious circulating medium, that the vacuum will be filled by specie small change, much to the public credit, and beneficial to the people here. He should support the measure, if the amendment should be adopted, without at this time inquiring into the question how the course of policy heretofore pursued had contributed to produce this state of things, or what party did or did not support the bill.

Mr. MORRIS again remarked on the great ambiguity or want of clearness in the bill, doubting whether he understood it as it was intended; but if he did, he should vote against it. It authorized the prosecutor, as he thought to retain the note which had been passed to him, to recover its value, fifty per cent. damages, and half the fine, and then to present the note itself for redemption. He commented on other features of the bill, which he thought highly exceptionable.

Mr. PRESTON thought there was much in the views expressed by Mr. MORRIS. The bill appeared inartificially framed to meet the cases proposed. Usually special provisions were made for the punishment of slaves, which were not here to be found. He thought, from the too great neglect of attention to the concerns of the District, the Senate ought to recoil from passing any severe measure not recommended by the District Committee. He concurred with Mr. MORRIS, that a great oversight had been committed, in overlooking slaves, by whom a great portion of these small notes were and would be passed. He insisted that all statutes creating new crimes, as this did, ought to be very perspicuous, a point in which this bill was particularly defective. He characterized as tyrannical the summary process proposed, of dragging the accused at once before a tribunal, and compelling him to criminate himself, on oath, in violation, in two respects, of the letter and spirit of the common law. He censured, with much severity, the practice of making the District a kind of crucible in which to make experiments, which the experimenters had not the power to carry in their own States.

If (said Mr. P.) Maryland of Virginia tolerate these notes, shall it be said that on one side of a line the law permits a thing which on the other side is a crime? Shall they who cross the line from such neighboring States, on entering the District, be obliged to change their money? It appeared to him that the Committee on Finance had not shown itself competent, and was not competent, to legislate exclusively in such a matter for this District. Mr. P. then deprecated the principle established in the bill, by which any individual might be dragged before a magistrate and compelled to swear to his own commission of the new-invented crime of this bill. Here is sown a crop—of oaths, and the harvest will necessarily be a plentiful crop—of perjury. It was a trap and a snare leading to perjury. The Finance Committee, Mr. P. said, had entered upon a series of wild and fantastical experiments. Their experiments had resulted in the flood of such paper as this. Such is the result; and what, he would ask, is the natural remedy? Is it not to remove the cause which has produced these fatal results to the country? But no; they continue their projects, and come here into the District to create crimes against their misshapen theories, and to set up a new set of penalties for the contempt which has fallen upon their abortive experiments. Their miserable new system of finance is to be enforced by a new system of pains and penalties, by a sort of revolutionary tribunal having summary and instantaneous power over the property of citizens—it might be to the amount of every cent of their property. It appeared to Mr. P. that the Committee on the District ought at least to have been consulted: he therefore moved that this bill be recommitted, for better consideration, to that committee.

Mr. BROWN, in reply to the reproach of projects and experiments, said, that there was a grand project on foot to perpetuate the paper system and to prevent the resumption of specie payments. As to the promotion of perjury, such an argument, if valid, would justify all crimes; arson, burglary, &c. must be tolerated, for fear of reaping a crop of perjuries, if this crime is to be tolerated on that ground. North Carolina is now enjoying a general specie circulation, obtained by a law similar to this. It is time, said Mr. B. for the Congress of the United States to set an example, and if the States do not choose to follow, let them suffer the inconveniences of the paper system.

Mr. WRIGHT did not rise to debate the bill at this late hour; he would, however, give a simple history of its origin, and would show who were its authors, and how far the Committee on Finance had gone out of the way in this matter, as had been rather unkindly alleged by the Senator from South Carolina.

[Mr. PRESTON interposed. He had made no such allegation. Mr. P. had said the bill was beyond the province or out of the way of the Committee on Finance.]

Mr. W. continued by observing, that by a resolution of the Senate the committee had been authorized to consider this subject; it was by the express order of the Senate that they had gone out of their way, if indeed they had done so, as had been alleged. The bill originated in this manner, and, after undergoing several amendments, was passed last session. Mr. W. understood Mr. P. to say, rather unkindly, that the committee had gone out of their way. It was the study of his legislative life never to impute improper actions to any member of the Senate; he might, perhaps, have misunderstood the honorable Senator. Mr. W. denied that any disappointed feelings brought from New York had in any manner influenced him in the severity of this measure. He understood Mr. P. to say that the wild and chimerical measures of the committee had produced this state of things in the country. If Mr. P. would reflect, he must satisfy himself that this was an ungrounded charge. No law presented by the committee had been passed, at all affecting the currency. He knew of no other than one bill, and that one proposed only, which never was passed; this surely had not affected the currency! He considered rather that Mr. P. himself had gone a little too far out of his way in alleging that the committee had been enlisted in ultra notions, not considering that those notions, whatever they might be, had never become the law of the land.

Mr. W. had no particular attachment to any feature of this bill: he was quite willing to receive some of the amendments proposed; but as the Senate had once solemnly passed this very same bill, he did not think himself entitled to propose any different one than this, to which it had already given its assent.

Mr. PRESTON said he regarded the committee as the exponent of the will of the Executive. How it had responded to all the sentiments and fantastic chimeras of the Executive, was well known to every body. It had reflected back all the projects of the Executive, and he therefore held the committee itself to be responsible. The committee had exhibited its servile adherence to the war against banks and paper and credit. It is the knowledge that this spirit exists in the Executive, and is responded to by the strongest party here, which prostrates the credit of the country at this present moment. Why is the silver locked up? Why can the people not get a quarter-dollar in change? Is it not because the country knows too well that the Executive and his supporters on this floor are struggling by spasmodic efforts to force their glorified specie currency and hard-money schemes upon the country? forcing up the price of specie, and effectually driving it out of circulation, by forcing the people to buy up, as a dear commodity, that which before was in common circulation as a currency, and would be so now, but for the measures of the Administration, servilely copied and responded to by the Committee on Finance.

Let the committee dip the statute book in blood, and press their pains and penalties upon the country; but did they imagine that by so doing they could restore a sound currency, and re-establish, by measures of force, that which they had disturbed and ruined by measures of folly? He repeated that the committee was out of its way; for it was not properly a committee of general currency. The Government proposes to have nothing to do with the currency, (after having done so much and so fatally;) why, then, does it now meddle by its Committee on Finance? Nothing which he (Mr. P.) had heard had changed his views of the propriety of recommitting the bill: he would therefore press his motion to that effect.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said it struck him that the reference to the Committee for the District would be proper. There were many facts and laws to be inquired into which they ought first to ascertain before passing an act of such a sweeping and general effect. There were people of business, merchants, mechanics, bankers, and others, whose opinions and views ought to be known and understood, if it was desired to pass a law of such importance in a proper manner. Especially it ought to be inquired into and ascertained whether (supposing no resumption of specie payments should first take place out of the District) the banks in the District would be able, alone and isolated, to resume? It ought first to be ascertained whether there could be the necessary circulation for necessary purposes, under existing circumstances, without the use of this kind of paper, or without the substitution of any thing in its place? It ought to be known and ascertained whether, if you put down the District paper, other paper of the same description will not, by unavoidable necessity, come into the District from other places, and circulate instead of the paper you have put down? It ought to be inquired if it is possible for this District to stand alone, an isolated solitary spot, and maintain an exclusive specie currency, when such a currency exists no where else? Surely this possibility ought first to be inquired into. And it appeared to Mr. CLAY that, since there existed a Committee for the District, for the especial consideration of things relating to the District, the Committee on Finance was not so competent as that committee to enter into these inquiries, and to do the subject that justice which it surely required.

Mr. C. would ask whether, under the general term "individuals," as employed in the bill, slaves were not necessarily included. When terms so general as these were used, it certainly did appear to him that people of color were comprised in their meaning. But suppose for a moment they were not included in this description, then a dilemma arose in his mind; for, if they were included, here was a species of trial affecting only free persons, and altogether inapplicable to them, imposing a pecuniary mulct which slaves who had no property could not pay. On the other hand, if they were not included, then what would be the use of the bill, since it was chiefly by and among them that these notes were circulated, either instrumentally or directly? Whichever horn of the dilemma gentlemen might take, the bill fails altogether in its object and intention, and becomes perfectly inoperative. It, therefore, clearly appeared to him that some amendment to the bill was necessary in its present crude state, and the Committee for the District was the most suitable to take this subject into consideration.

There was another description of persons whom this bill would chiefly affect, who would be rendered liable to its pains and penalties. They were minors—little boys and girls—children—the very beggars whom we meet on the avenue! These were the persons, these were the unfortunates, who were to be punished by this bill! As to the authority of the Committee of Mays and Means, that was not disputed; true, they had received the authority which they had exercised in framing this bill, and so far the Senator from New York (Mr. Wright) was perfectly correct in his statement. The resolution authorizing them to undertake this business had been passed without notice, and without any Senator dreaming of its purpose and intention; it was a resolution passed the last session, having reference to the means of relief generally for the country, and he for one never contemplated in such an ordinary resolution, a bill of pains and penalties of this description, to be inflicted on this little spot of ten miles square! This was not the idea he had entertained of the relief to be afforded to the country at large, which it was anxiously hoped would have been devised at the last session. But the committee have totally reversed the natural order of things; they have begun at the wrong end; they were looked to for some remedy to the disordered state of the currency; we had hoped for some cure to the general disease; but, instead of that, they begin with this little District. Instead of going to the fountain head, and applying some remedy for the general suffering produced by the heedless measures of the Executive, they begin with applying their remedies of pains and penalties against credit to this little District. If they had, however, begun there where they ought to have done—if they had removed the well known cause of all the country's suffering, then, without any further trouble, without any violent and isolated measure of this kind, instantly they would have re-established order and regularity in the currency of this District. Now, however, in view of the general and yet unmitigated evils affecting the currency in every other section of the Union, they begin here, at this little spot, to operate upon the whole Union, without knowing or inquiring whether any of the States have put down this small change; without knowing or inquiring what the banks have done or will do; without knowing or inquiring whether, if they put down the only existing medium of exchange in small affairs, there will be any kind of substitute whatever to supply its sudden removal; without even inquiring whether it will be at all possible to transact the little business of common life, when the only existing change is thus violently removed by the terrors of penalties and punishments! Again, (Mr. C. observed,) this bill is aimed at the poor, the miserable, the wretched portion of the community; against slaves, negroes, and beggars; against infants, women, and children! Here are fines to punish boys and girls if they go to market, or offer to buy any think with the only money you have enabled them to have in their possession. Do not (said Mr. C.) make this unfortunate District the scape-goat for an offence which is committed throughout the whole Union, and into which (if it be a crime) your own fatal measures have driven the country! Do not let your indignation against the banks and the credit system vent itself in this splenetic measure against this District! It is a bill of pains and penalties, a bill to force a man to swear against himself. Under its operation any person, any member of Congress, may be put upon his oath to say if ever he has passed a sixpence of this currency. It is a measure of swearing and punishing people, of which the committee ought to be ashamed of itself for introducing. It is true (said Mr. C.) the bill was run through the Senate last session, but how did that happen? We were all absorbed in considering and debating that execrable scheme which (thank God) the patriotism of the other House defeated, and he hoped forever. No one noticed the bill, and it was arrested in the House of Representatives, where also that execrable and abominable scheme of an Executive Treasury was arrested, and received its quietus. Do not (said Mr. C.) attack negroes and little children, whose necessities may drive them to spend their little all in this your own created currency. Strike, rather, at higher game. Go to the banks, if you please; attack them; but spare, oh! spare, the little game, the poor, the weak, the helpless, the unwary, the women and children, and market people. They must take money in some shape; they are compelled to dispose of their few commodities; they are obliged to carry home something from the sale of their little adventures. Do not then attack them, and inflict the vengeance of your wrath against credit and paper and banks upon the helpless and necessitous, who have no remedy but to take and pass this money. Attack more noble game.

Mr. C. concluded by expressing a hope that this bill would be recommitted to the Committee for the District, and that they would inquire if it be possible that the daily business of the people of this District can be transacted without money, either silver or paper; whether, also, if this system be attempted for the District, if it can be possible for the citizens of the District to get along on the genuine hard-money plan, while all the Union besides was driven upon the only resource which the experiment had left to the country. For my own part, (said Mr. C.) if this currency can be put down by fair and honorable ways, I shall be rejoiced; it is a disgraceful medium, forced upon us by the still more disgraceful measures of the Executive; forced upon us by the acts of Executive will, which, to the misfortune of the country, has received too much sanction from Congress. Glad should he be if this madium could be put down; but let it be by fair means, and beginning at the right place.

Mr. ROANE, as chairman of the Committee for the District, was opposed to the reference to that committee, because he thought the subject did not belong to it. Mr. R. then proceeded at some length to advocate the general measures of the Administration, and the particular measure of this bill. In adverting to the encouragement held out to informers, Mr. R. referred to the happy effects produced in Virginia by such a system, and instanced particularly the literary fund, which had been greatly enriched by the operation of informers, by money poured into its coffers through their instrumentality.

Mr. BROWN followed on the same side, and entered into an exposition of the dangers of the banking system, and of the conspiracy which it seemed to him existed to bring forward a national bank.

Mr. B. also maintained that these small bills had been issued mainly by corporations, in violation of existing laws; and yet gentlemen of the Opposition had openly applauded these violations of law, with a view to scourge the country into submission to a national bank. This he did not make as a direct charge against them, but drew as an inference. Mr. B. wished to save the community from these paper systems and experiments, which honorable gentlemen were so earnest to perpetuate.

Mr. B. regretted the antipathy which gentlemen of the Opposition manifested when gold and silver were alluded to, and insisted that if these small bills were suppressed, an abundance of specie change would, of course, come into circulation. He closed by treating as idle the objection which had been insisted on in relation to informers.

Mr. YOUNG of Illinois said: My object in rising, Mr. President, is not to discuss the merits of the bill under consideration, but for a very different purpose. That purpose is, if I can, to defend the honorable chairman, and the Committee on Finance generally, from unmerited reproach; or if it shall be believed that blame or censure is justly attributable to the committee for having reported and recommended this measure, that all the parties concerned as originators, abettors, or otherwise, may fare alike in the judgment of condemnation to be awarded by the much injured inhabitants of this "miserable, unrepresented," District. Before I proceed, Mr. President, I will ask the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. Wright,) whether the bill under consideration, as reported by that committee at the present session, is not precisely similar to the one which passed the Senate at the late extra session, on the same subject? [Mr. WRIGHT having answered in the affirmative, Mr. YOUNG continued.] This, Mr. President, is as I supposed. The honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay,) by way of ridicule, calls this a "picayune bill," the provisions of which, he contends, if adopted and carried into practice, will strike directly at the negroes, the little boys and girls, and the poor beggars of the District; and concludes by saying, that the committee ought to be ashamed for having recommended such a measure. Now, sir, for the history of this transaction. At the late extra session of Congress, a bill containing three sections, as well as I remember, was reported by the Committee on Finance; the first two sections of which related to the banks of the District, and the third was intended to suppress the circulation of small notes, usually called "shin-plasters." Near the close of the session, the bill came up for consideration. After considerable debate on the several propositions submitted by the committee, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts (Mr Webster,) not now in his place, (who then was, and still is, a member of the Finance Committee,) moved to strike out the first two sections of the bill in relation to the banks; about which, he said, there was so much disagreement, and proposed the adoption of the third section, to suppress the circulation of shin-plasters, about which, he said, there could be as little disagreement. Well, sir, what followed? The two first sections were stricken out on the motion of the honorable Senator, as if by unanimous consent; and the third, or shin-plaster section, was adopted and passed by an overwhelming vote, (without distinction as to party:) the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay,) and two or three others only, voting in the negative. What became of the bill in the other House, I know not; suffice it to say, it did not become a law. The substance of that bill, perhaps, in precisely the same language, has been again reported by that committee, and is now under consideration; and such are the epithets which are now applied to the measure, and the denunciations of those who have believed it to be their duty to bring it forward. I again repeat, if odium is to attach to any, let all who have participated in the sin, come in for their reasonable share. But we are admonished by the honorable Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) to wait, to pause, until something shall be done by the neighboring States—of Maryland and Virginia—to wait for the action of Baltimore and Richmond, until something shall be done, looking towards the general resumption of specie payments. Sir, do we not all understand this language? Those opposed to the resumption of specie payments in and about the State Legislatures, when the matter is urged upon them, say, "wait" for the action of Congress; and those in and about the Capitol who have such a dislike for gold and silver, as almost to recoil at the mention of it, tell us "wait" for the action of the State Legislatures; and between the two, their admonitions if attended to, would lead to indefinite post ponement. Mr. President, can any reasonable man (unless he shall purposely close his eyes) be so blind to what is going on, as not to perceive the mighty influence which was brought to bear in the recent bank convention in New York, and which still is operating to prevent, if possible, the early resumption of specie payments by the banks? Can any one doubt as to the location of that power, or by whom it is sustained in its unlawful purposes? And shall we, too, succumb to it? Sir, they will fail in their object. The honorable Senator from Kentucky, tells us that already one of these banks has resolved on specie payment. Yes, sir, others will follow; the sound institutions of the country, one by one, will come to the rescue, and this mighty combination of moneyed influence will yet fail of its grand object—another Bank of the United States, with unlimited capital, which only can be accomplished by keeping up a deranged state of the currency.

But, Mr. President, why should these small notes be regarded as so essential to the convenience of the people of this District? Of all other places, I would suppose that here there was the least necessity for resorting to such expedients. If I am correctly informed, the public officers, and members of Congress, furnish by far the greater part of the circulating medium in this city. Under the existing arrangement, two-thirds of their compensation is paid in gold or silver. Then why not pay out this gold and silver in payment of our ordinary expenses here, and those who receive from it from us, again pay it to such as have demands upon them? In this way, if I am not greatly mistaken, specie would very soon fill up the vacuum, which will be produced in the community by the withdrawal of these paper change tickets, if the provisions of this bill shall be suffered to go into operation; and irresponsible or dishonest persons, disposed to commit frauds upon their neighbors, by issuing notes they never intend to redeem, either from want of ability or inclination, thereby prevented from further unlawful speculation upon the supposed neeessities of the people, growing out of the present deranged state of the currency.

How is it now, sir? If a member should pay his landlord, or more properly his landlady, according to the fashion of the times in this fashionable metropolis, what becomes of it? Is it not forthwith (to use a back woods phrase) sent off and exchanged for "shin-plasters" at an advance, to pay for fuel, marketing, and such articles as are generally purchased in small parcels to sustain and keep up the household? Are not, in fact, these small notes almost in universal use, by every one, to defray the smaller class of expenses; and is not the specie, which ought to circulate in their stead, as universally bought up by the brokers, and excluded from circulation? I repeat, sir, that the further continuance of this miserable trash in circulation, is not necessary to the welfare of the people of this District; but on the contrary, is productive of much mischief, in depriving them of a sound and really valuable currency, which never can circulate to any extent until this wretched substitute of paper change, counterfeits and all, is altogether and entirely banished from the country.

Mr. President, I reside in a State where the banks, as in other places, have suspended specie payments. We have no paper currency under five dollars, and nevertheless have change enough to answer all our reasonable purposes. The prices of produce and of labor are both high, and readily command the money; and so far as my immediate neighbors are concerned, I wish they may never see worse times. I also fully concur, Mr. President, in the statement of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) when speaking of the present prosperity of the city of St. Louis. I did not, sir, in the whole course of my travel in returning from my place of residence (which is one hundred and eighty miles above that place on the river Mississippi) to this city, since the late extra session and just before the commencement of the present, see as many steamboats, (and many of them of the largest class,) as many boxes and barrels, and merchandise and produce in different forms, with all that stir and bustle of people, wagons, carts, and drays, incident to an active and business, and I might add prosperous, community, as I saw at the wharf of that infant city, St. Louis. And yet, Mr. President, as often as I have been there, which is not unfrequently, I have not yet seen the first "shinplaster" in circulation in that place, or the man who has seen one, to my knowledge.

The Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston,) in alluding to the condition of things here, by way of pity and commiseration for the people of the "ten miles square," called this a "poor, little, miserable District!" Mr. President, this reminds me forcibly of a circumstance which occurred in the Legislature of the State in which I reside, many years ago, which (without intending the slightest disrespect for the gentleman concerned, whom I regard as one of my best friends, politically and otherwise) I will mention as a case in point. An honorable member of that State, (who is at this time a Senator of that State, and deservedly popular with his constituents) with that laudable intention which is always conceded to politicians, in which love of self merges into the interest of the people, (the farming portion and the poor especially,) and with the further lawful design of ingratiating himself still more in the good graces of the good people of his district, introduced into the Assembly a bill "to enable poor people to marry." This, sir, was the title of his bill. It commenced, according to the old fashion of doing up such things by our early law-givers, with a preamble, in which was set forth that, "WHEREAS, there are now resident in the counties of —— (the counties composing his district) divers poor persons, both male and female, who are anxious to marry, but who, for want of means to obtain licenses, and to defray the other necessary expenses, such as celebrating the bans, etc. on account of the difficulties and privations incident to the settlement of a new country, whereby many well-disposed persons are prevented from carrying their lawful and praiseworthy designs into execution:" "THEREFORE," etc. The honorable member stated, from his place, in support of the measure, that he had already made an arrangement with a certain clergyman of good standing in his church, whose name he mentioned, by which all the marriages contemplated by his bill were to be consummated by the minister, without fee or reward, (except, I believe, that he was not to be debarred from the privilege of accepting presents on such occasions;) and concluded by expressing the hope that his bill would be permitted to pass, so that the poor people of his district might in future obtain licenses from the clerks, also without compensation. Such, Mr. President, was the scope of the honorable member's bill; the benefit of its provisions being expressly limited to his own immediate constituents. Shortly after its introduc- Madam Rumor, who is always busy on such occasions, sent forth the report that the honorable mover of this wise and wholesome proposition, who doubtless acted in all sincerity of purpose, represented a "poor, little, miserable District," and that his constituents were wholly unable to marry, unless some law could be passed to remove their disability. Well, to the utter amazement of the honorable representative, his constituents unexpectedly flocked to the seat of Government to inquire into the matter, and demand an explanation; and, instead of the anticipated greetings on all sides, of "well done, thou good and faithful servant," for his exertions and good intentions in their behalf, they upbraided him with reproaches and bitter denunciations; declared that they were as able to marry as the people in other parts of the country, and demanded the immediate abandonment of the favorite project. The member, chagrined and mortified at the dissatisfaction he had unintentionally produced with the best of motives, and disappointed at the sudden reverse in the prospect of his favorite scheme, which, in the language of the day, was now "blowed sky high" by his constituents, apologized for his error, promised better things in future, was forgiven by his incensed neighbors, withdrew his bill, and there the matter ended, and I trust will rest in oblivion, henceforth and for ever.

So, sir, I doubt not the good intentions of the honorable Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Preston) towards the good people of this fashionable and high-toned city, and the country hereabouts, when, with pity and commisseration, and all the finer feelings of the philanthropist, he calls this a "poor, little, miserable District." But, sir, is not the honorable Senator mistaken in supposing that the people will be gratified with this squalid picture of their condition? Mr. President, I am much mistaken in the character I have formed of the people of this District, (poor as their soil may be, and, God knows, it is poor enough) if that shall be recognised as a true description of their situation. No, sir, poor as they may be, they are still not so poor and dependent as to thank honorable Senators for such ill-timed sympathy.

But, Mr. President, to my mind, a most extraordinary objection has been made from several quarters to one of the provisions in this bill, to which I supposed there could be no reasonable objection. It has been emphatically asked, if you will first compel a defendant to answer in the civil action for damages upon his oath, and then suffer the plaintiff to call witnesses to impeach his statements, and thereby subject him to a prosecution for perjury? I answer, why not? Is it not the every day's practice in our courts of chancery to compel the defendant to answer the complainant's bill on oath, and afterwards to permit the complainant to call witnesses to disprove that answer? Most certainly, sir. Then where is the difference in principle, except that in the one case, the pleadings and testimony are in writing, and in the other by parol. Mr. President, courts of chancery do not ordinarily possess jurisdiction in such small causes as are intended to be embraced by the provisions of this bill. If then, the plaintiff is not to be permitted to call upon the defendant, thus to answer upon his oath to the correctness of his demand, I venture to say that in nine cases out of ten, the party injured will be without a remedy. A passes a "shin-plaster" to B, and how is A to prove it? I repeat, sir, that in most cases it will be impossible. Why, sir, the thing from its very nature is impracticable: suppose C should be present at the transaction, and should even hear the amount of the note mentioned, which is very improbable; could he afterwards, if called upon as a witness to testify as to the passing, identify that note, one time in a hundred? Impossible. If, therefore, I am correct in my apprehensions, Mr. President, upon that feature in the bill, the private remedy mainly, nay almost exclusively rests; take it away, and the remedy, in most cases, is gone.

But, Mr. President, my principal object in rising, was to give the history of this measure as a matter of equal justice to the members of the Finance Committee, who have again concurred in reporting it for the action of the Senate at the present session. I will only add, sir, that it has once passed this body by an almost unanimous vote, and I hope for the good of this District, will not only pass again with equal unanimity, but will in the end become the law of the land.

Mr. HUBBARD said that so far from this bill passing without consideration, he believed that no bill had been more fully considered. A Senator from Massachusetts had given it his especial attention, and much of it was adopted on his motions and by his sanction. He had never heard that the banks or the people of the District had complained of it, and he repudiated any design to oppress or embarrass any class of people in the District. He regarded it as a measure calculated to promote the best interests both of the banks and the people of this District, from whom he had heard no word of complaint. He demanded the yeas and nays on the question of recommitment; which was decided in the negative—ayes 9, noes 30.

The question then recurring on Mr. SMITH's amendment, striking out the requisition that the accused should be summarily examined on oath, Mr. SMITH called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, which were ordered.

The question on the amendment proposed by Mr. Smith, of Indiana, viz. to strike out the words "summarily and without delay," was then taken by yeas and nay, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, King of Alabama, Knight, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tipton, Wall, and Williams—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Niles, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, White, Wright, and Young—16.

Mr. STRANGE offered, as an amendment, to insert the words "or receive," after the words "offer to pass."

Mr. S. explained the object of the amendment, whice, on some remarks by Mr. WILLIAMS, was withdrawn.

The question on concurring in the several amendments offered in Committee of the Whole were then taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The question on the engrossment of the bill was then taken, on which Mr. WRIGHT called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lumpkin, McKean, Nicholas, Niles, Morvell, Pierce, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—31.

NAYS—None.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The Senate then, on motion of Mr. NORVELL, adjourned.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

In Senate, Thursday, January 4, 1838.—The Senate having resumed the consideration of the resolutions offered by Mr. CALHOUN, the third of the series being before them,

Mr. NORVELL rose to move that so much of the third resolution of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) as pledged this Government to give "increased" stability and security to the domestic institutions of the States, and as pronounced it to be its duty to "strengthen" them, be erased from the resolution. It would then read: "that this Government was instituted and adopted by the several States of this Union as a common agent, in order to carry into effect the powers which they had delegated by the Constitution for their mutual security and prosperity; and that, in fulfilment of this high and sacred trust, this Government is based so as to exercise its powers as not to interfere with the stability and security of the domestic institutions of the States that compose the Union; and that it is the solemn duty of the Government to resist all attempts by one portion of the Union to use it as an instrument to attack the domestic institutions of another, or to weaken or destroy such institutions." He said that no member of this body entertained a deeper abhorrence of the whole abolition movements in the North and Northwest than he did. If not intended to bring about a dissolution of the Union, they were well calculated to accomplish that disastrous result. They were unconstitutional, a breach of faith towards our Southern fellow-citizens, and contrived to spread all the horrors of servile war among them. Under the pretext of being a religious duty to extirpate slavery from the face of the earth, the incendiary leaders of Abolitionism had enlisted even women and children to petition for the object which they had in view. As if men were not adequate to the task of accomplishing their cruel purposes, women had been invoked to seize the dagger of Abolitionism, to complete the work of death and desolation in the South, begun by more timid man, "too full of the milk of human kindness" to carry out his murderous intent. In yielding to this misguided spirit, woman "unsexed" herself—

> "Stopt up the access and passage to remorse,
> That no compunctious visitings of nature
> Shake her fell purpose."

Was it a religious duty, sir, to violate the Constitution of the United States? Was it a religious duty to commit a breach of faith toward our sister States? Was it a religious duty to instigate the slaves of the South to rise up to slaughter their owners; to perpetrate murder in its worst aspect; the midnight murder, which spares neither age nor sex; of which female honor and helpless infancy are equally the victims? Sir, this is the same religious spirit which bound the human body, the shrieking mother and the innocent child, to the stake of persecution, and consumed them to death amid fire and flame, for a mere difference of opinion on sectarian points. It was this christian spirit that prompted civilized Europe to commence the slave trade, for the purpose of converting the pagan African to the knowledge of the true and living God. It was this religious spirit that, in the earlier ages, impelled half civilized Europe, in a mass as it were, led on by fanaticism and frenzy, to engage in crusades to the Holy Land, in order to re-conquer from heathen idolators the city of Jerusalem, at the expense of the sufferings and blood of countless myriads of human beings. It was, sir, a profanation of the name, an insult to the character, of the Savior of mankind, to call this a religious spirit. It was the spirit of Abolitionism. It was a demoniac spirit, which instigates the destruction of the enlightened half of one great section of our Union, in the frail hope of rendering the other ignorant and degraded African half fit subjects for the enjoyment of liberty; in the more wicked hope of rendering them fit associates, companions, husbands, and wives of our northern and northwestern women and men of Saxon descent.

He was thoroughly and unchangeably opposed to this entire abolition spirit. We of the non-slaveholding States are free from the evils of slavery. It is no grievance with us. It is not our business to intermeddle with it. It is no part of our constitutional right or duty to petition Congress on the subject. Congress have no control over it. It is a subject reserved exclusively to the respective States within which slavery exists. Before the adoption of the Constitution, each State of this Union was an independent sovereignty, with all the rights and powers of independent nations. They are equally so now with regard to all the rights and powers not delegated to the Federal Government. Nothing but the monstrous supposition that this is a consolidated, and not a federative Government, could excuse our petitions for the abolition of an evil which has no existence with us, which is remote from us, which exists only in distant sister States, whose citizens alone have any right to touch or interfere with it.

Slavery in this country was entirely a domestic question. Congress could not touch it. The States in which slavery was still tolerated had never, even by implication, given up any portion of their exclusive power over the whole subject. They could not, with any regard to their own safety, permit it to be drawn into question by their sister States, or by the General Government. It was not a subject open to discussion with a view to legislation any where but in the States recognising and suffering the existence of slavery. Nor could Congress, in his opinion, either constitutionally, or consistently with the public faith, abolish it in the District of Columbia, unless the people of the District desired it, and petitioned for it. The Distric was ceded to Congress by the States of Virginia and Maryland, on the condition that the rights of private property, as before existing, were to be held sacred; and the United States received the cession upon that condition. The power granted to Congress, to "exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over the District," conferred no authority to violate the public faith, or to take from its inhabitants their property without their consent. It simply and clearly meant, that legislative powers could be exercised by no other body than Congress over the District. It meant no more. It did not mean that Congress could pass any law dictated by its arbitrary will and pleasure, in violation of the right of property, or of any other right asserted in the acts of cession to the United States. If Maryland and Virginia had imagined that this question would have been here raised, they would never have ceded the District. He was was no friend to slavery. He reprobated every appearance of it. Though born in a slave State, he had, when, at the age of nineteen, he left the paternal roof of his father, refused the offer of slave property made to him, and as decidedly refused to receive the proceeds of the sale of such property. He had, on two or three occasions, subscribed money for the emancipation of individual slaves. He had, when a member of the convention by which the Constitution of Michigan was formed, introduced the resolution against slavery, and reported the article, which was unanimously adopted into that Constitution, declaring that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude should ever be introduced into the State, except for crimes of which the party shall have been duly convicted." His own skirts were free from the imputed sin of slavery; but he was not, because opposed to domestic slavery, justified in engaging in an unconstitutional crusade against the Southern and sister States of Michigan, for tolerating an evil which they did not consider as such, which was entailed upon them, and which the compact of union recognised their right to tolerate and to endure. He was not justified in urging Congress to violate that sacred compact, to put an end to the peace and integrity of the Union, for the suppression of an alleged moral sin, from which he and his fellow-citizens of Michigan were entirely exempt, and for which they were in nowise more responsible than they were for the oppressions under which the subjects of Great Britain in India or Ireland suffered and groaned. It was only upon the absurd assumption that the General Government was a consolidated National Government, possessing all power within and over the States, that any interference on its part in this subject could be contemplated. He had no hesitation in affirming that such an idea had never seriously entered the minds of the framers of the Constitution, and that any interference of the kind would extinguish all hope of the perpetuation of the Union. And what would the Abolitionists gain by a result so disastrous to their efforts? Sir, not a slave would they emancipate. Their fanatical exertions would throw back for fifty years every hope of emancipation. Disunion, dissension, and civil war, would ensue. And would they in that case take up arms to wage war upon the South? Would they enter the armies of the North, even to defend its soil, in case of Southern aggression? Would the non-combatant abolition clergy, the feeble women and children, who swell the lists of abolition petitioners, draw the sword for us of the North and the Northwest, in the event of a civil war, brought upon us by their gratuitous and maudlin shouts for negro emancipation? What atonement could they make to their suffering country for its Union split to pieces—for its villages and towns laid in ashes—for its safety undone—for its fields laid waste—for the seas of human blood shed in the unholy and terrific civil strife, which they had instigated to effect the abolition of slavery in distant States? Sir, there is no foretelling the extent to which fanaticism, assuming the sacred garb of religion, will carry its deluded victims. The Abolitionists commenced with petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; then they petitioned for the abolition of slavery in the Territories; now they are demanding the prohibition of the trade between the States; and their next step will be to require Congress to usurp the power to suppress slavery in the Southern States. And all this they do in the name of humanity! Their humanity only rivets the chains of slavery still tighter. It only divests the slave of all hope, and goads his Southern owner, formerly and naturally inclined to loosen the bands, to a more resolute determination to maintain the mastery over him, without any relaxation. He had heard much said about the right of petition as in danger of violation from the passage of these resolutions. What was the right of petition, as guarantied by the Federal Constitution? It was simply that Congress should pass no law preventing the people from assembling to petition for a redress of their grievances. Was slavery in distant States a grievance to the people of the North and the Northwest? If it was, the Federal Constitution, the Federal Union, was to them a grievance! Did the resolutions propose any such law as to prohibit assemblages of the people to petition for any grievance of their own, or for any grievance not their own? Did they propose any thing like it? But the liberty of the press and of speech was in danger! The assertion was destitute of all foundation. What was daily going on here; what was daily going on in all the Northern States, demonstrated the idle nature of the allegation. The resolutions left the freedom of speech and of the press where the Constitution placed them.

They offered no restraint to any of the constitutional rights of the people. They only declared that this Government should not be used as an instrument of attack upon the States, the domestic institutions of the States, the reserved rights of the States, or the union, peace and tranquillity of the whole country. That was their import; and he trusted that this Senate, as the peculiar representatives of reserved State sovereignty, would always firmly maintain the ground assumed in these resolutions. The Federal Union could only in that way be preserved. If he were disposed to look at the abolition of Southern slavery as a question of interest and happiness in its effects upon the Northern and Northwestern States, he should pronounce the measure to be fraught with incalculable evil to them. It would bring upon them, in shoals, a species of idle, vagrant, worthless black population, stamped with inferiority by the hand of nature. It would degrade the high character of the discordant Saxon race, by whom our soil is cultivated, our intellectual condition improved, and all the arts and comforts of life elevated and extended. It would bring us, our wives and children, into association with a description of human beings, whom the Author of creation has set apart as a distinct caste; and, finally, our population might become a mongrel race of mulattoes and quadroons. What father, what mother, what brother, could look upon such a state of things, without shrinking back with loathing at the contemplation!

But taking views, as he did, of the subject, he could not agree to confer upon this Government, by implication, any right to give increased stability, security, and strength to the domestic institution of slavery in any of the States. He was not willing to pledge this Government so to administer its affairs as at all to interfere, on one side or the other, with a subject which the Constitution had not confided to it. The South cannot desire this. All that the South asks on this subject is to let her alone. To this extent he would cheerfully pledge the Government. He would commit it, mind and soul, to sustain the Constitution as it was; to protect the institutions and the interests of every part of the Union, as far as its constitutional powers would authorize it to go for that purpose. The resolution, amended as he proposed, was strong enough. It pledged the Government not to interfere with the stability and security of the domestic institutions of the South: it made it the solemn duty of the Government to resist all attempts, whether by petition or otherwise, to use it as an instrument of attack upon any of those domestic institutions. If the South could ask more, she would ask that which would hereafter be used as a pretext and a precedent for an interference, on the part of this Government, to weaken and destroy her domestic institutions. He, therefore, hoped that his amendment would prevail.

Mr. CALHOUN entertained every sentiment of respect for the feelings of the Senator from Michigan (Mr. Norvell.) He believed his feelings were sound throughout, and were based upon a sound policy. He begged leave to state his reasons for inserting the words "the several States, etc." It was his belief that in many things it was admitted by the General Government that the States had separate, distinct, and vested constitutional rights. In this belief and understanding, there had so long existed a general good feeling between the two Governments, their acts were in all things correlative, and were, so far as they acted together, promoting individual and confederative rights, by which course of action each ever strengthened the other, and tended to produce union and harmony throughout; and, what was more, it tended to uphold the domestic institutions of the States. To illustrate his argument, he would instance some few cases, which would, he was certain, convince the Senator from Michigan (Mr. Norvell) that the ground of his amendment was erroneous, and that he would in the end withdraw it

Every one must admit, continued Mr. C. that the quarantine laws were wholly under the State control, while the laws of commerce were controlled wholly by Congress; yet the two were inseparable, and each depended upon the other. Congress never claimed a right to interfere in the regulation of one branch, nor did the Government of the several States deny the jurisdiction of the United States over the other.

Congress had passed new laws, or modified old ones, regulating commerce, applicable in every particular to the quarantine laws. He would cite instances of a different nature in their operation and effect.

During the French Revolution, an insurrection broke out in the French colony of St. Domingo among the blacks. There was a danger of intercourse and interference of the blacks on the island and those of our States. To prevent this, State laws, prohibiting such intercourse, were passed. These laws were sanctioned by Congress.

There was a strong analogy in this case to the one now under discussion. Congress had here passed laws distinctly to meet the views of the States. In farther illustration he would cite the laws and regulation of the port of Charleston: his position was here still more strengthened. He alluded to the prohibition of black sailors on board vessels, trading with that port. Congress had yielded and fully assented to the provisions of the law, and even the British Government had assented and acknowledged the propriety of such enactments and and regulations. Having said this much, for the purpose of convincing his friend from Michigan, (Mr. Norvell,) he should look with the greatest confidence for his vote in support of the resolution, without his proposed amendment.

Mr. NORVELL responded, that yesterday the Senator from South Carolina had expressed a desire to transfer this whole Abolition war to the North and the Northwest; a belief that there was to be the great battle-ground of the conflict. Could that honorable Senator then wish to weaken the hands, to impair the moral vigor, of those who were to fight that great battle for the safety of the South, and the preservation of the Union? This he would do, if he were to persist in requiring us to lend our aid to "increase" and "strengthen" the institution of slavery. The Senator had alluded to the perfect beauty and harmony of our system as it was. For this very reason was it, that the amendment had been proposed. It was to preserve, not to mar the harmony and beauty of our system, that this Government should not be required to go beyond the maintenance of the domestic institutions of the States as they exist and are protected by the Federal Constitution. The Senator had illustrated his views, by adducing special cases in which the Government had by law interfered to sustain and strengthen the health laws of the States, and to protect the South against the effects of the agitations in St. Domingo, some years ago. That was all proper; it was constitutional; but the illustrations did not sustain the general proposition contained in the resolution. When the special emergency should again arise, he would be found as ready as any man to interpose the power of this Government, not to outlaw, but to protect, the domestic institutions of the South in all their constitutional sacredness of character.

Mr. PRESTON observed that the amendment proposed was a very general one in its application, and he hoped it would be adopted. The resolution, in its present shape, asserts that the General Government is bound to protect the domestic institutions of the several States. This ground he never wished to assume. He was opposed to any interference with the domestic institutions, either from one quarter or another. The States should be suffered to maintain and protect their own rights and their own institutions. The General Government was rather, in his opinion, bound, from its very nature, NOT TO INTERMEDDLE WITH THESE RIGHTS, but strictly, and in every instance, TO KEEP HANDS OFF. Government had no right to interfere, either to protect or to invade any institution. To illustrate his argument he would revert to some few of these institutions in various quarters. One of the greatest and most important domestic institutions of Maryland was the State Colonization Society. It was a State corporation. Would his colleague wish to see the direct action of Congress to support this institution? Would there not be as many conflicting sentiments on the subject as upon that of domestic slavery? The great manufactories of the North are incorporated, and have vast amounts of funds invested; should these be either directly protected or invaded by Congress?

It was doubtful whether it was a duty of Congress, either expressed or implied, to interfere in any similar cases.

He would admit that Government might by its action contribute to establish proper security to State institutions, so far as is consistent with the Constitution, and with State rights and enactments, and the constitutions of the States, but no further. To maintain the principle advocated by the resolutions, would be to assert that the domestic institutions of a State, based on the principles of the Vermont resolutions, as well as those of an adverse order; and if this ground be admitted, the case cited of the Maryland institution, must be a strong point of opposition to the general spirit of the resolutions.

Mr. CALHOUN was willing to assent to the amendment, if it was the wish of the Senate to do so. He would make any concession to meet the views of those opposed to the doctrine of Abolition, in order to get a strong vote in favor of the general doctrines set forth in the resolutions.

Mr. PRESTON followed in continuation of his previous argument, and in support of the opinions he had expressed in favor of the amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD requested the Secretary of the Senate to read the second resolution as it had been adopted. The resclution was read as follows:

Resolved, That in delegating a portion of their powers to be exercised by the Federal Government, the States retained severally the exclusive and sole right over their own domestic institutions and police, to the full extent to which those powers were not granted, and are alone responsible for them; and that any intermeddling of any one or more States, or a combination of their citizens with the domestic institutions and police of the others, on any ground, political, moral, or religious, or under any pretext whatever, with the view to their alteration or subversion, is not warranted by the Constitution; tending to endanger the domestic peace and tranquillity of the States interfered with; subversive of the objects for which the Constitution was formed, and, by necessary consequence, tending to weaken and destroy the Union itself.

Mr. H. would call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the phraseology of the third resolution, and he thought that it would at once occur to him that the third resolution conveyed the sentiment that this Government was bound to exercise its powers so as to give "increased stability and security" to the institution of slavery as it existed in the southern section of the Union—a sentiment directly conflicting with the spirit and import of the resolution which has just been read. The avowed purpose of the Senator from South Carolina was, that the Senate should express, by resolution, as their deliberate opinion, that any interference on the part of any section of the Union, or any intermeddling of any portion of the community, under any pretext whatever, with domestic slavery as it exists in the Southern States, with a view to its alteration or subversion, would not only be grossly unjust, but a course of proceeding not warranted by the Constitution. This was the declared object of the Senator, and to all this he most readily yielded his assent.

He need not assure the Senator from South Carolina, that no man was more willing than himself to carry out such a purpose—and most cheerfully would he support any resolution drawn out in the strongest terms, and in the most forcible language, fully to express such a sentiment. He did not agree with Senators who thought nothing was to be gained by the adoption of these resolutions. Much, very much, in his judgment, would be accomplished by agreeing to the resolutions (with some amendments) which had been offered by the Senator from South Carolina. If this did not go far enough, as the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Preston) expressed—if they would not inspire confidence and give security in the South, he firmly believed that their adoption would be productive of much good in the non-slave holding States He represented on this floor, with his respected colleague, one of those States; and he could not doubt that the adoption of these resolutions substantially, would tend to allay in that quarter, the spirit of Abolitionism—would be a direct appeal to the intelligence and to the patriotism of the free citizens of the North; and he could not for a moment doubt that they would have a controlling influence upon the course and conduct of the Abolitionists themselves. If the adoption of that resolution would not directly influence the action of the Abolitionists, they could not fail to produce a powerful effect on public opinion; and through the influence of popular sentiment would this fell spirit of fanaticism be stayed. He was therefore prepared to go with the Senator from South Carolina in carrying out the purpose avowed. But, while he was thus prepared to give his support to the resolutions of the honorable Senator—believing, as he conscientiously did, that their adoption would do good at home—he could not agree to the adoption of the third resolution, as the Senator had drawn it. It went further than he was willing to go. His doctrine had been, ever since he had been a member of Congress, that it was the bounden duty of the North "to let the whole matter alone." That the institution of domestic slavery, as it existed in the Southern section of the Union, was no concern of theirs. And that they were unfaithful in the performance of their duty as good citizens, to give publicity to any opinions calculated to excite the morbid sensibilities of the North, or to inflame the violent feelings of the slave population of the South. He would now undertake to show that the amendment proposed by his friend from Michigan to the third resolution ought to be adopted, and he could not but hope that the Senator from South Carolina would assent so to modify this resolution. He would suggest an alteration in the first paragraph of the resolution, not that it was objectionable to himself as it was; but the alteration, he was satisfied, would make it more acceptable to some of its friends. He would have that part of the resolution read—"that this Government was instituted to carry into effect the powers delegated by the Constitution for the mutual benefit and prosperity of the States."

He would not press this alteration, but he was assured that it would be more acceptable to some friends in that form. It would receive his support, whether altered or whether it remained unchanged in this particular; but he felt a great solicitude to have the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan adopted. Such would be the import of the resolution, without the amendment, that he could not (friendly as he was to the object) vote for it. The resolution declares, in substance, "that this Government is bound so to exercise its powers as to give, as far as may be practicable, increased stability and security to the institution of domestic slavery; and that it is the solemn duty of the Government to resist all attempts to weaken or destroy, but is bound to strengthen and to uphold, the institution of domestic slavery." He was sure that the Senator from South Carolina could not ask this at his hands. He would resolutely oppose any and every attempt, come from whom it would, tending o subvert or destroy this institution, against the will of those whose interest is affected by its existence. Thus far he was ready to go: thus far the State which he in part represented had gone. In no way would he intermeddle with the sacred and constitutional rights of others. But, while he was prepared to go thus far, he could not go farther, consistent with his sense of duty; and he would earnestly appeal to the Senator from South Carolina to assent to the proposed modification of this resolution.

Mr. PRESTON inquired how the resolution would read were the amendment adopted?

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked, "Exactly right."

The Secretary then read the resolution as amended.

Mr. CALHOUN announced his full assent to the amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that he rejoiced that the Senator from South Carolina had agreed so to modify his resolution as to embrace the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan. He appreciated the motives which had induced the honorable Senator to assent to this alteration. Whatever might be the effect of the adoption of these resolutions by the Senate on the Southern section of the confederacy, where slavery exists, there can be no doubt that the battle is to be fought in the non-slaveholding States. It was there that this spirit of anti-slavery was to be met. He deeply regretted to add that it was there mingling itself with party politics. It was in the free States of this confederacy that the unhallowed spirit of Abolitionism was, in his judgment, to be met, and it should be met boldly and independently. He had no fears for the result of the contest. He had the fullest confidence in the intelligence and patriotism of the yeomanry of the North; and when passion and prejudice subsided, when men will reason together on this interesting subject, be assured that public opinion will become correct and controlling in its influence. He had uniformly, since he had been in Congress, opposed every interference with the institution of domestic slavery as it existed under our Constitution—a course approved by his own State, and by the dictates of his own conscience.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana then moved the following as a proviso to the third resolution, on which he asked the yeas and nays:

"Provided, That nothing contained in these resolutions shall be construed or understood as expressing an opinion of this Senate adverse to these fundamental principles of this Government, 'That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That the freedom of speech and of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble to petition the Government for redress of grievances, shall never be abridged. That error of opinion may be tolerated while reason is left free to combat it. That the Union must be preserved.' But, on the contrary, all those constitutional, fundamental, and political truths, are expressly recognised by this Senate."

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his regret that the Senator from Indiana, (Mr. Smith,) for whom he entertained great respect, should attempt to embarrass the passage of the resolutions, by the introduction of an abstract proposition, not relevant, and in his opinion not calculated to have any salutary effect. If the resolutions were incorrect in principle, vote them down; but on the contrary, if they were based on proper constitutional ground, why not sustain them in a crisis like the present, which all must admit to be dangerous to the best interests of the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana denied that he had ever on any occasion, in that or any other body, sought to do by indirect means what he could do directly; and addressed the Senate for some time in favor of the proviso offered by him. Mr. S. said, if the proviso was but an abstraction, as it had been named, the resolution itself was no more; one abstraction was surely as good as another; and if the Senate is to be engaged in building up abstractions, those which he now offered were too important to be overlooked; they were the abstractions of Washington and Jefferson, and might be safely deemed as worthy of attention as the more modern ones of present Senators.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that he had said nothing of the truth or error of the principles contained in the proviso, but had simply entered his protest against its being attached to his resolutions. Was there any thing in his resolutions that infringed the right of speech or the freedom of the press? When that was aimed at, it would then be time to make the objection. He had said before, and would repeat it, that the only object was to have a common ground on which all might stand, North as well as South, to repel aggression. Mr. C. looked to the true conservative (and to his mind the only conservative) principle, State rights, to put down the dangerous spirit of fanaticism in relation to the sinful and immoral practice of Southern slavery, and which he verily believed had been raised into action in a great measure by the idea that the institutions of the South were their institutions.

Mr. YOUNG of Illinois said: Mr. President, I did not intend, after my remarks of yesterday, again to have participated in this debate. The Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston) in speaking of the domestic institutions of the South, and especially in regard to slavery, says "hands off" as to the slaveholding States, and they will take care of themselves. He not only denies the power of the General Government to secure and protect the State institutions in every case, and under every variety of circumstances, but solemnly protests against its exercise, as an unwarrantable and uncalled for interference. Now, sir, I will ask the Senator what construction he gives to the third clause of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which provides that "no person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due?" Suppose the act of 1793, passed in pursuance of this provision in the Constitution to enable owners to reclaim their fugitive slaves, should be repealed; that the General Government should, in accordance with the opinion of the Senator, act upon the principle of "hands off" in future; and one of the slaves of South Carolina, owing service under the laws of that State, should escape into Pennsylvania or Ohio, and should be protected there, in what way would the honorable Senator reclaim him? Would he march an army against the offending State, and make recaption vi et armis—with force of arms? Surely not, sir. But, Mr. President, I believe, upon reflection, that the Senator did say something about his remedy; and that remedy, if I mistake not, was to hang the offender if caught within their borders. I deny, sir, that any power exists in any of the States to punish even Abolitionists for supposed offences committed in any other State. The same Constitution which secures to the slaveholder the right of going into a non-slaveholding State to recover his fugitive slave, equally protects the Abolitionist in the privilege of going into a slaveholding State, if he chooses to do so, provided he commits no offence against the laws of such State during his stay within its limits. And shall we be told, that if such a punishment should be attempted, that there is no remedy, no sanctuary to flee to, under that sacred instrument, the Constitution? Yes, sir, there is a remedy; and that remedy is to be found in the Federal tribunals of the country, acting under the Constitution, whose bounden duty it would be, in such an emergency, (which I will not allow myself to anticipate) to interpose the authority of this Government, and save the suffering citizen from so palpable an infraction of his constitutional rights. Why, Mr. President, any thing short of this would immediately bring about a non-intercourse between the States, and effectually destroy that provision in the Constitution which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

But, Mr. President, I will now speak of a very different matter. It has been denied here, again and again, that the Abolitionists have any designs upon the institution of domestic slavery in the States. I am astonished that the Senators from these States should not have detected, and exposed in a proper manner, one design at least, of a highly important character, which, if not checked and rebuked in time, is calculated to inflict a fatal blow upon the peace and prosperity of this Union. I understand, sir, that under that clause in the Constitution to which I referred as providing a remedy in cases of fugitive slaves, the Abolitionists contend that it is the rightful province of the State Legislatures, and not of Congress, to provide that remedy; and that, acting under this supposed influence, one at least of the State Legislatures (that of Massachusetts) had already interfered so far as to provide for a trial by jury in such cases. I would inquire of the honorable Senators from that State (Messrs. Webster and Davis) whether such is the fact or not?

[Both the Senators having denied all knowledge of any such law or proceeding, Mr. Young proceeded:]

Then, Mr. President, I have been misinformed in relation to this matter; and many of the Abolitionists who would not intentionally mistake the truth, have also been misinformed and imposed on; for such has been the belief. But, sir, this much I know of my own knowledge, that Abolitionists are required to circulate memorials addressed to their State Legislatures, respectfully requesting the passage of laws to secure the trial by jury, under State authority, in all such cases. I handed to the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) a few days since a paper containing the form of one of these memorials, which was given to me by a professed Abolitionist, (and who is, in my opinion, in all other respects, a christian and a worthy man,) as containing an exhibition of their principles, motives, and actions, by which it will be seen, that a direct attack is in this way intended against that leading principle in the Constitution, which alone secures the possession and enjoyment of this great interest of the South. And yet the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston,) says "hands off"—that they want none of our interference from the free States. Then, Mr. President, why are these resolutions here? Why are we of the free States solicited to participate in their consideration, and finally to vote upon them, if the South requires no aid at our hands? Sir, we too are interested in settling great constitutional questions; and being interested, will exercise our privilege of debating these propositions, if we choose to do so, and of voting afterwards in such manner as our judgment may direct, for the good of the whole. Sir, I desire, under existing circumstances, that this provision in the Constitution, and the construction now put upon it by the Abolitionists and their advocates, may not be overlooked. The Senator from Ohio (Mr. Morris) has taken exception to my remarks on this subject. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a single question? [Mr. Morris having replied in the affirmative.] Then I will ask the Senator, whether under that provision in the Constitution, which declares, that "no person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due," it is for Congress, or the State Legislatures, to provide the remedy? If it is the rightful province of the State Legislatures to direct the mode of proceeding in such cases, then the act of Congress of 1793 is unconstitutional, and ought to be repealed. But if, on the contrary, it was not only the right of Congress, (about which I supposed there could be no diversity of opinion,) but was moreover its peculiar duty to pass the act in question, then should the Abolitionists know by our action here, if practicable, that in urging this matter upon their State Legislatures, they were not only encouraging, but actually insisting upon a violation of the Constitution of their country.

Mr. PRESTON expressed some doubt in regard to such help as the Senator just up had proposed. If the Government should not protect the interests of the South in accordance with the Constitution, they would take care of themselves. The gentleman had admitted that a slave could not be recovered by an abolition jury in Pennsylvania, or other non-slaveholding State; and yet he demanded that the General Government should extend its protection to incendiaries within the slaveholding States. Mr. P. had heard it said that the institution of slavery could not exist without the aid of this Government. This Mr. P. disavowed and denied; and asked that the Government would let them alone, except so far as they could in good faith carry out all the provisions of the Constitution. Farther than this, he demanded that the Government should let them alone.

Mr. ALLEN said it appeared to him there was a general disposition on the part of the Senate to have this discussion as limited as possible, and it was therefore a source of regret to him to observe the attempts made to embarrass these resolutions in their progress. He was aware how easy it was to throw obstacles in the way of any proceedings when persons are so disposed. He (Mr. A.) had determined to offer, after the resolutions had been passed, the following amendment, to be appended:

"That nothing in the foregoing resolutions is intended to recognise the right of Congress to impair in any manner the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of petition, as secured by the Constitution to the citizens of the several States, within their States respectively." But the course taken by the Senator from Indiana would induce him to move it as an amendment to the proviso, to strike out all after the word "provided," and insert what he had just read.

Mr. PRESTON thought the resolutions sufficiently abstract in themselves, without being embarrassed by any further abstractions. He (Mr. P.) heartily concurred in the resolutions and the sentiments contained in the provisos.

Mr. CALHOUN was willing to yield every inch of ground that he could, to fortify those who saw the danger that was pending, and wished to meet it in a proper manner. He could have wished his resolutions to have passed as he originally drafted them; but that spirit of concession which he felt under the responsibility he had assumed, would induce him to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Allen,) because not adverse to the spirit of his resolutions, and because it might have a tendency to reconcile others not otherwise disposed to sustain them.

Mr. MORRIS, adverting to remarks which had been made relating to the punishment of Abolitionists by State laws, said he regarded this and other similar doctrines which had been advanced in this debate, as subversive of all freedom and of the institutions of the country. He insisted that all classes of men had an imprescriptible right, above all government, to the freedom of speech and the right of petition. He repelled the imputation that those who were unfriendly to these resolutions were in any way unfriendly to the Union.

Mr. M. proceeded to defend the right of all men to trial by jury, which right, he insisted, was expressly guarantied by the Constitution. And if the right to trial by jury belongs to every citizen, on what pretext could a free State deny this right to any man within such State? Could the State deny it on pretext of color? Or could it be denied or refused on account of the oath of another man who might swear that any other man was his property? He felt bound to declare his unqualified opposition, and he would defend the rights of freedom of opinion, freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press, to the latest breath he might draw. No threats, no intimidation, should deter him from doing his duty in this respect.

Mr. WALL followed, and questioned the right of the Senate to sit making creeds and drawing up abstract constitutional codes for the people. He thought the members of Congress were not sent here to invent creeds and weave abstractions, but to make laws; to legislate, not to make opinions. He would vote for the amendment, but against the resolutions.

The Senate adjourned.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

In Senate, Wednesday, January 3, 1838—The second resolution being under consideration, and Mr. MORRIS having moved to strike out the words "moral or religious;" on which he asked the yeas and nays—

Mr. YOUNG said that he had risen to request the honorable Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) to insist upon the form of the resolution under consideration as it then was. Why, sir, strike out the words political, moral, or religious, when it is known, or ought to be known, that this is the identical language employed by the abolitionists as the pretext for interfering with the domestic relations of the South? Shall we not use terms as forcible, and as expressive of the object we have in view, as have been used by them to propagate their mischievous doctrines, which have well nigh already arrayed one section of the Union against another? If I mistake not, Mr. President, this is also the language of the Vermont resolutions, of which we have had notice, and which are intended to be introduced here by one of the Senators from that State, (Mr. Swift,) but of which I would not now have spoken, had they not already found their way into the newspapers, and gone the rounds of the day. This, sir, is the very ground upon which the Abolitionists place the argument—that domestic slavery, in every form, is "unbecoming a moral and religious people"—and upon this ground I desire to meet them. Yes, sir, the question, if we expect to effect any good purpose by these resolutions, should be met promptly and directly. Gentlemen tell us that the object, aim, and end of these memorials is abolition in the District of Columbia—nothing more. Is this the fact, Mr. President? On the contrary, do we not know, does not every Senator know, that this movement in the District, if successful, is intended to reach slavery in every part of the country, under whatever form it may exist? Yes, sir, rest assured that the abolition of slavery here is but as a drop to the ocean in comparison to the great matter they have in hand, and which, sooner or later, they expect to see accomplished, regardless of the consequences. It is but the entering wedge to their grand scheme of universal emancipation and elevation throughout the country. Mr. President, how can we mistake the object, if we look into the numerous abolition papers which are continually laid upon our tables, (from what quarter, or at whose expense, I know not,) and which are as constantly filled with the grossest misrepresentations and perversions of the Southern character, as connected with the domestic institution of slavery, as it exists under the Constitution in that portion of the Confederacy? I read these papers, sir; I have considered their purport, and cannot be mistaken in the opinion, that a general war (a moral and religious one if you choose) upon domestic slavery, as it exists in the South and Southwestern States, is intended. I wish the gentlemen from the South, instead of throwing them into the fire, would read them also, and they will soon discover, if they are not already informed, the nature of this war, and the weapons to be employed by one of the parties to the contest, the better to insure the victory. Yes, sir, the garb of religion is to be assumed, and under that specious pretext, the Constitution itself is to be first rent, and then torn to pieces. Mr. President, I reside in a non-slaveholding State; the people of that State are essentially in favor of emancipation, and I am proud of its free institutions. But, sir, as much as we prefer freedom to slavery, the great mass of our inhabitants are as decidedly opposed to all interference with the domestic relations of the other States which differ with us in sentiment on this all-important subject. They regard slavery as it exists under the Constitution of the United States, as not now a debatable question. That it is a right secured by that sacred instrument, which none can assail without doing violence to its provisions, and to one of the cardinal principles which induced a very large proportion of our citizens to enter into the political compact. But, sir, the State of Illinois has not left her sister States of the South to doubt and conjecture as to her position on this great question. That State, by its Legislature, has, in the solemn form of resolutions, as far as she could consistently go without infringing the constitutional rights of her citizens, stamped its seal of disapprobation upon the doctrine of modern Abolitionism in all its forms.

In assuming this position, therefore, upon this floor, I but assert, as is my duty here, the sentiments of the great mass of my constituents, who, I assure you, are sound upon this subject. But, Mr. President, we are not without Abolitionists in Illinois. We have a few, sir; some of them I could mention (laying Abolitionism aside) are excellent, amiable men. Some are my personal friends, sir; and I must do them the justice to say that I believe they are conscientious on this subject. But, sir, they are deluded; their philanthropy has taken a false direction, and I tremble for the consequences. Mr. President, I once thought, and so expressed myself to some of my friends, that an able, well written report on the petitions presented here, showing the reasons, the whys and wherefores, against such an interference, (as in the case of the Sunday Mail question,) would quiet this disturbing topic. But recent events have changed that opinion. Do we not see whole States swept away by the torrent, and others yielding to its influence? That man must be credulous indeed, who, with all the evidences before him at the present juncture, can be induced to believe that Abolitionism is to be thus easily quieted and put to rest. No, sir: the question of Union itself, with the most solemn appeals to patriotism and love of country, will not, nay, have already failed, utterly and entirely failed, to accomplish this most desirable object. Sir, the question has been propounded more than once, whether they (the Abolitionists) would continue to persevere in their views, if satisfied that their certain tendency would lead to a dismemberment of the Union? And what has been the answer? It is this, sir: "We have a religious duty to perform, and it is not for us to consider of consequences, or to calculate results. We leave these matters in the hands of Him who requires of us the performance of this duty." They, sir, regard slavery as a national evil—as a crying sin, affecting the whole land—as a moral and religious vil, in which they themselves are participators to a more or less extent, unless they make the proper efforts to expel it from the country. Yes, sir, not only from this little District, but from the whole country. This, Mr. President, is the ground upon which the cause of Abolition rests; and how can it be said, with all these facts before us, that their object is confined simply to the abolition of slavery in this District? But, sir, it has been said that the right of petition is involved in this matter, and that many have signed these memorials, to assert this right, who are not Abolitionists, merely to assert the right of petition. It may be so in other States, not so in the State from whence I come. No, sir: we set down every one, without exception, as an Abolitionist, who signs an abolition memorial. This is the touchstone by which they are designated from others holding a different creed; and if there is one who has signed for the reason mentioned, who is, in other respects, opposed to their doctrines, it has not come to my knowledge. No, sir: I fear that this is but one of the many pretexts that will be resorted to for the purpose of exciting sympathy to swell their ranks in future. I trust, sir, that the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) will insist upon the resolution as it is, and that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Morris,) to strike out the words "moral or religious," may not prevail. Strike out the words in the resolution, as proposed sir, and it is mutilated. It would not meet the case fully as it is presented; and I repeat again, in conclusion, if you wish to accomplish any thing by these resolutions, it is not by useless and vain concessions, but by meeting the various questions necessarily involved in the discussion, promptly and directly.

Mr. LUMPKIN rose and said—

Mr. President: It is with extreme reluctance that I approach the subject now under consideration. That reluctance does not arise from a disposition to shrink from the discharge of the duties which devolve on me. But the delicacy and difficulty which is attached to this subject, arises from the fact, that it is not a legitimate subject for discussion in this Senate. By the constitutional compact of the Union, this subject, if discussed at all, must be left to the people and the States where slavery exists.

In regard to the resolutions offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) I consider it my duty to remark, that I have carefully and considerately examined them, and am prepared to record my vote in their favor as originally submitted. Indeed, sir, I can but regret that we could not have a direct vote upon the resolutions in their original form, as I consider all the amendments which have been suggested, tending to mutilate and disfigure, and lessen whatever of utility the proposed resolutions embraced.

From the remarks which has fallen from the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD,) in which he considers the doctrines of nullification, in some obscure form, embraced in these resolutions, I feel myself called upon, at this stage of the discussion, to state, that my friend (if I may so call him) from South Carolina, and myself, stood as antipodes in the days of excitement upon this doctrine in the South. I was no nullifier, sir, but opposed it with all my might and strength. I am still disposed to cling to the Union with that emphatic sentiment in my heart, and on my lips: "The Federal Union must be preserved." But, sir, I am greatly deceived if there will be any division amongst my constituents in regard to the resolutions now before the Senate. I believe that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the people of the South will approve of the principles laid down in these resolutions. Upon this subject, sir, the South is united, as the voice of one man. We have to contend with a common enemy. And, whatever may be our party names, we are all State rights men. We go for a strict construction of the Constitution of the United States. We concede nothing to the Federal Government by implication. We respect the powers of the Federal Government in its whole constitutional range; but that range is restricted and limited to its specified powers, of war, peace, treaties, levying and collecting taxes, regulating commerce, and the corresponding legislative, executive, and judicial powers. This, sir, is the great outline, in brief, of the Federal Constitution; and, sir, this Constitution was brought into existence by a spirit of amity, and that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our situation as a people at that time demanded If each State had then contended for, and rigidly adhered to, its own peculiar habits and local prejudices and prepossessions, as the basis of a Government for all the rest, this Federal Union of States would never have been brought into existence. But no such surrender of opinion or power was required of the States. The reserved rights of the States secured to each the free and sovereign right to manage its own domestic affairs in its own way, rightfully liable to no molestation or interruption from the rest. The resolutions of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) having been brought to the consideration of the Senate, I should be highly gratified at seeing them receive the sanction of this honorable body; not that I believe they would put an effectual check to these deluded people, called fanatics, but it might serve as a rallying point for the sane. If the wisdom of our friends, and the friends of the Union, in the non-slaveholding States, cannot devise the ways and means to stay the fury of these infuriated Abolitionists, we of the slaveholding States can only rely upon our own power within our own bounds. Whenever we find any of these disturbers of the peace within our jurisdiction, we must execute our laws—punish them—and punish them in the most exemplary manner. They are our inveterate enemies; we ought to treat them as such. With them we have no union; with them we have no fellowship. As far as their numbers go, they have already severed the Union. We can no longer dwell together, or worship at the same temple. What these people have to say, write or publish, let them take care to keep outside of the great gate; that is, out of the limits of the slaveholding States. But to our friends of the non-slaveholding States who understand our rights, and respect them, here and elsewhere, permit me to say, my confidence remains firm and unshaken in them. Our bonds of union shall not be broken so long as they adhere, as they now do, to a strict construction of our constitutional compact.

Mr. President, I have already said more than I had intended upon this occasion, and sincerely hope that the further discussion of this subject may not again make it my duty to trespass further upon he time of the Senate.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 5, 1838.

The question being on Mr. ALLEN'S substitute for Mr. SMITH'S proviso to the third resolution, which substitute required that the resolution should not so be construed as in any way to impair the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of petition—

The question was put on this substitute, and it was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Ala. Clay of Ky. Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Conn. Southard, Strange, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, Young—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clayton, Davis, Knight, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Wall—14.

Mr. MORRIS offered as an amendment an addition to this resolution, declaring that the right of the people to speak, write, print and publish any thing whatever, whether or not it concerned the institutions, &c. of another State, was indisputable; and that they were amenable only to the State in which they might be at the time.

Mr. CALHOUN was understood to remark that this amendment was irrelevant, and offered by way of embarrassment.

Mr. MORRIS. Sir, I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIR was understood to decide that Mr. CALHOUN was in order.

Mr. CALHOUN proceeded. Mr. ALLEN'S amendment, he said, covered the whole constitutional ground on this subject; and Mr. C. had made up his mind to accept it on this ground, that it would tend to fortify the Senators of the North, in relation to their votes in favor of these resolutions. Mr. C. was willing so to fortify them; and he would agree to any amendment which would not impair the principles of the resolutions.

Mr. MORRIS said he was not to be intimidated or driven from the course which he thought it his duty to pursue, by any allusion of an intention to embarrass this body or any other. Mr. M. as well as the Senator from South Carolina knew what he was about, and understood his own course; and he would be here free and unshackled, and exempt from all party restraints, as an American citizen ought to be, and would express freely and fully his opinion on every subject before this body. Sir, said Mr. M. am I at liberty to say what was intended by the resolutions of the Senator?

The CHAIR said, to do so was out of order.

Mr. M. said he would not then suppose that the resolutions themselves were intended for greater and more remote objects than those expressed; but it was legitimate to speak of the objects to which they must and would lead. In the arguments here on the liberty of speech, changes were continually rung on the Union. Now it was a question whether the resolutions themselves had not a strong squinting to a dissolution of the Union. It was not for Mr. M. to say that they were intended to produce that effect, but they would be judged of; and whether or not they went to establish the doctrine that the States were independent of each other, Mr. M. would not now fully discuss; but he believed they would operate to confirm that doctrine. He hoped more fully to discuss this point before they should pass this body.

If the resolutions themselves did not show that they were intended to operate against the liberty of speech and of the press, they would do so. Were not gentlemen already alarmed on this point, and had they not, therefore, adopted the proviso of his colleague? (Mr. Allen.)

The question now was, whether the doctrines of Mr. M's amendment were true. Was the right of a citizen indisputable to speak, write, print, publish, on the laws and institutions of other States? I say it is so; it is the right of every citizen. If that right is put down by the laws of the country, I must submit to those laws, and I ask now that I may know what liberty they will leave me. I desire to know this by the vote on my amendment, and I hope that the question will not be evaded, that I may know how much I am to be abridged of these privileges. If I do not represent the sentiments of the people, the correction is at hand; the Legislature of my State is now in session, and I even court the expression of their judgment upon me.

Mr. M. said he was responsible alone to the State in which he lived for the abuse of this privilege, and not to this Government. They would not attempt to pass another gag law, though the gag law, Mr. M. repeated, was a sheet of white paper compared with these resolutions. Why attempt thus to silence speech and the press without the passage of a law? Let the same thing be done by law, and then see whether the people had become so base as to permit these privileges to be taken from them. All the world could give was less than chaff compared with the liberty of speech.

In this contest, Mr. M. knew well with whom he had to engage; he knew the prejudices that were against him, and that his best friends would differ from him. He had fully counted the cost, and had made up his mind to meet these difficulties, which ever urged him to express his opinions.

He desired the Senate to meet his amendment boldly and manfully; and if it was wrong, reject it, but, if it was right, sustain it. No objection had been made to the doctrines of the amendment, but it was to be put down by the imputation that it was intended to embarrass. The truth often embarrassed those who were in error; but this was their misfortune; Mr. M. had no such design; but it was his endeavor always faithfully to perform his duty here and everywhere.

Mr. M. called for the yeas and nays on his amendment, which were ordered.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that he was not prepared to say that the adoption of these resolutions would have such a direct effect in tranquilizing the public mind as was anticipated. He would not say that any thing which could be done here, or which could be done at the other end of this Capitol, would change the course and conduct of an association whose avowed object was "the entire abolition of slavery in the United States," and whose avowed doctrine was "that slaveholding is a heinous sin in the sight of God, and that the duty, safety, and best interests of all concerned, require its immediate abandonment, without expatriation;" whose leading paper declares that the Abolitionists "are for union, but not with slavery." He would not presume to urge the passage of these resolutions on the ground that an immediate favorable effect will thereby be produced upon the master-spirits of the Abolition party. He could not even hope for such a consequence. He too well knew the pecuniary influence and the moral power already embarked in the cause, to anticipate any immediate beneficial effect upon the Abolitionists themselves; but he most anxiously desired the passage of the resolutions, because, in his judgment, good would inevitably result from their adoption; and to his mind it was matter of no objection that the resolutions merely asserted great and abstract truths, without proposing any practical and remedial measures. He looked upon the resolutions with peculiar favor from that very consideration. It was the general principles, the important abstractions, embodied in the resolutions, which recommended them to his favor. The resolutions themselves, and the vote of this Senate upon them, could not fail to produce a powerful influence in eventually correcting, and in maintaining correct, popular opinion upon this agitating subject. The public mind will be directed to, and will attentively examine, the fundamental truths contained in these resolutions, and if these political texts are founded on the Constitution—if they can be sustained by that solemn compact, the Magna Charta of American liberty, then will public opinion be guided and controlled by their benign influence; then will error yield to the force of truth, and passion be subdued by the power of reason. Believing, as he most conscientiously did, that these resolutions were strictly compatible with the doctrines of the Constitution, and believing that now was the fit, the accepted time, to put forth these abstract truths, to enlighten the public mind, and to correct, and maintain correct, the public sentiment, he anxiously wished their adoption. He was well aware, as he had before observed, that this battle was to be fought in the non-slaveholding States. He therefore desired to keep the resolutions clear of all objectionable matter; to have them assert plainly and distinctly the truths which the mover of the resolutions has so repeatedly declared it was his object to promulgate. And he, with the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) deeply regretted that the Senator from Indiana had presented any proposition tending to embarrass the progress of the original resolutions. The proposition of the Senator from Indiana had no necessary connection with the resolutions; and yet he was not disposed, here or elsewhere, to controvert the positions which he had asserted. No man here, friendly to the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, would deny the truth of those maxims selected from the Declaration of American Independence, and embodied in the amendment which had been proposed. They were familiar to all, assented to by all, and if the Senator from Indiana desired a vote of the Senate upon his resolution, let him bring it forward as an independent proposition, and he should have his vote for it.

He was as much in favor of the freedom of opinion and of speech, and of the liberty of the press and of the right of petition, as any man on this floor; and he would go as far as the Senator from Indiana, or as any other Senator, to maintain inviolate those rights. He was ready now, and at all times, by his vote, to declare in the fullest manner his faith in the abstractions contained in the resolution of the Senator from Indiana. He could not but regret, also, that the Senator from Ohio had considered it necessary to bring forward his proposition: they all seemed to him to be out of place. He was aware that the proposition of his friend from Ohio (Mr. Allen) had been offered as an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, and would not have been presented to the Senate but as an independent proposition, had not the Senator from Indiana urged upon the Senate his proposition for amendment. He regretted the course. He was ready to meet the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, and to give a direct vote on each. They had been brought forward as independent and as important propositions, and they ought to be met freely and fearlessly, and the vote of the Senate given unembarrassed by any extraneous matter. But the course proposed by the Senator from Indiana, and by the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Morris,) was not new. They were both, he presumed, decidedly hostile to the measure, and this was a legitimate mode to defeat it. When the resolutions which he had a few days since read to the Senate were pending before the New Hampshire Legislature, a similar mode was then resorted to for the purpose of defeating the passage of those resolutions. The propositions for amendment, if they did not come directly from Abolitionists, came from men openly and avowedly opposed to the administration of our State and General Governments. When the New Hampshire resolutions to which I have referred were under consideration,

"Mr. EASTMAN, of Conway, offered the following, as an amendment:

"Resolved, That error of opinion may be safely tolerated, so long as reason is left free to combat it.

"Resolved, That the demand made by the slaveholding States upon the non-slaveholding States of this Union, for the latter 'to adopt penal enactments for the purpose of suppressing any associations within their limits purporting to be, or having the character of, Abolition societies,' is an unwarrantable interference with the constitutional rights of the citizens of said non-slaveholding States, and cannot, therefore, be complied with.

"Resolved, That any attempt to prevent free discussion on the subject of slavery, by making use of legal process, or by means of violence, is not only an abuse and contempt of law, but tyrannical and unjust; and ought, therefore, to be discountenanced and rebuked by every friend of our free institutions."

"Mr. EDWARDS offered the following resolutions, to be added as an amendment:

"Resolved, That the liberty of speech and the freedom of the press, rights secured by the Constitution to citizens of this State, cannot be abridged or restrained by penal enactments, on the request or demand of any other State.

"Resolved, That the claim of the Executive of a slaveholding State on the Executive of a non-slaveholding State, for the surrender of a free citizen to be removed to such slaveholding State for punishment under laws to which he is not amenable, for acts sanctioned by the laws of the State of which he is a citizen, is an unwarrantable interference with the rights of the free citizens of the non-slaveholding States."

Such were the amendments offered to the resolutions which he had read in his place a few days since, as having been adopted by the Legislature of his State. They were offered to embarrass and to defeat the original resolutions.

The fate of the proposed amendments is matter of history. The Legislature, by a very decided majority, passed the original resolutions; and yet every member was ready to declare his belief in most of the positions embraced in the amendments. Such was the course of proceeding there. The propositions submitted by the Senator from Indiana, and by the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Morris,) had not then, to his mind, even the merit of novelty to recommend them. But, as he had before said, it was a legitimate mode of attack; but still he regretted that it had been resorted to. He was, for one, ready and desirous to give a direct vote on the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina; and he would assure the Senator from Indiana that he would willingly give a vote in favor of his resolution, if introduced as an independent measure.

The Senator from Ohio expresses a deep solicitude for the preservation of this liberty of opinion and of speech; for the freedom of the press, the freedom of publishing our opinions to the world, unrestrained by any influence. He agreed to all this; and he had yet to learn that any individual member of the Senate was disposed, in any way or in any manner, to infringe the liberty of speech, or the freedom of the press. Certain he was, that the Abolitionists themselves had no cause of complaint. They had enjoyed, to their hearts' content, the liberty of publishing to the world their opinions and their doctrines. He had that very morning seen a paper, two or three columns of which were occupied in giving the mere titles of the books and pamphlets on the subject of slavery and Abolitionism, for sale at the office of the Anti-Slavery Society in New York. He had looked over the list; and to satisfy the honorable Senator from Ohio that there was no cause for his apprehension, that the liberty of the press was in no danger, he would, on this occasion, give the titles of some of the numerous publications: "Bound Volumes," "Anti-Slavery Manual," "Anti-Slavery Record," "Appeal," "Archy Moore, the Slave, a spirited delineation of the state of society in the slave States," "Biographical Sketches," "Baurnes's Picture of Slavery in the United States," "Cabinet of Freedom," "Channing on Slavery," "Charles Ball, a story told by himself of a man who lived forty years in Maryland, South Carolina and Georgia, as a slave under various masters," "Dissertation on Servitude," "Enemies of the Constitution Discovered," "George Thompson in America," "Godwin on Slavery," "Granville Sharpe," "Gustavus Vasa, written by himself," "The Life of a Native African, who was stolen out of his own land," "James Jackson," "Letters on American Slavery," "Memoir of Lemuel Haynes," "Memoir of Phillis Wheatley," "Negro Pew," "An inquiry concerning the propriety of distinctions in the House of God, on account of color," "Practical Treatise on the Law of Slavery," "Slave's Friend," "Testimony of God against Slavery," "Pamphlets," "Appeal to the Christian women of the South," "Appeal to the women of the nominally free States, by the Anti-Slavery Convention of American women," "Bible against Slavery."

He would go no farther. He would, however, assure the Senate that he had read the titles of but a very small portion of the publications now for sale at the office of the American Anti-slavery Society in New York. He would venture to state that, within the great republic of letters, there could not be found so many publications upon any other one subject as upon this agitating subject of slavery. He had merely adverted to the fact to show to the honorable Senator from Ohio (Mr. Morris) that there was no ground for his apprehensions: that the liberty of speech, and of the press, were in no jeopardy.

He regretted to see any movement in the free States calculated to produce any agitation here upon this subject. If the men and women who send their memorials to Congress asking for the abolition of slavery, could be persuaded to let this subject alone; if they could realize that every movement of theirs was productive of evil, rather than of good, he could not but hope that this torrent of Abolitionism would soon be checked, and all this may possibly be accomplished by the adoption of the very resolutions now before the Senate. If the Abolitionists see, as they must see, that the Senate of the United States regard their efforts as unwarrantable and as unjust, they will at least turn their thoughts homeward: they will at least ponder well the great abstract truths declared by the Senate, and upon which rests the foundation of this Confederacy; and he could not doubt that, from the adoption of these resolutions, there was much to hope, and nothing to fear.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said when he offered the amendment he did not intend to take part in the debate; he intended merely to record his vote in silence, leaving other Senators to discuss the matter, if they thought proper. Nor should he now be driven from the course he had originally marked out for himself, was it not for the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun.) If that Senator had directed his arguments exclusively against the amendment, he (Mr. S.) would have left its defence in other hands; but it had pleased that Senater to make his remarks so personal as to place him (Mr. S.) in a situation as the mover of the amendment, which required him to say something in its favor, and in reply to the remarks of the Senator. That Senator had thought proper to intimate that that he (Mr. S.) had moved the amendment for the purpose of defeating the resolutions by indirection. He would say to the Senator that he had wholly mistaken the character of the mover of the amendment. He could assure the Senator that he would never resort to indirection to defeat any measure. The Senator would always find him ready and willing to meet any propostion that might be presented directly. He feared no other responsibility than that which he was to meet in his State, in the discharge of his public duties; and even there he had no hesitation in believing that in this instance he was representing the wishes of an overwhelming majority of the People. The Senator had objected to the amendment on the ground that it was a collection of mere abstractions. Sir, can the Senator be serious? What are his whole resolutions but abstractions? Have there been any petitions or memorials referred on the subjects embraced in the resolutions? Were the resolutions reported by a committee? Was it intendeded by the mover to engraft any legislative enactment upon them? No, sir; they are the mere abstract effusions of the mind of the gentleman himself; and yet the Senator objects to the amendment because it expresses abstract opinions. Sir, if the Senator gives us one-sided abstractions, can he object to be met by abstractions on the other side? If abstractions are to be resolved here, let us have the whole of them; let us not affirm a part of a creed, and not the whole.

Mr. S. said he was opposed to the whole matter; he could see no good that could possibly grow out of these resolutions, and they may do much harm. He was willing to leave the Constitution and its exposition with the people; it was plain enough for him, and he would say to the mover of these resolutions, that if that instrument did not give the necessary security to the domestic institutions of the States, no resolves of this body as to the extent of the powers conferred by it could do it. The comments of the Senate on the powers conferred could neither enlarge nor abridge those powers. He had felt opposed from the outset of these resolutions, on the ground, in the first place, that they were mere abstractions; and, in the second place, that they denied, as he believed, the fundamental principles, and acknowledged political truths, of this Government. The Senator from South Carolina, in answer to some remarks of the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Morris,) had stated that he did not intend to abridge the freedom of speech or of the press by the resolutions, and that Senator, a few minutes ago, stated that he admitted the truth of the principles contained in the amendment he (Mr. S.) had offered; if he was mistaken in the admissions of the Senator, he would correct him.

[Mr. CALHOUN said he had neither denied nor admitted their truth.]

Then, said Mr. S. it is important that the Senate should either deny or admit them. The Senator says that the amendment is intended to overthrow his resolutions by indirection. Does not the Senator see that he admits away his whole case, that his argument proves too much? For, if the amendment be true, and if the principles contained in it are orthodox, and if, as the Senator admits, they are antagonistical to his resolutions, it follows of course that the resolutions cannot be correct in principle. If the two, the amendment and the resolutions, cannot stand together, which must fall? The Senator justly claims for himself the honor of being the author of the resolutions; he (Mr. S.) laid no claim to so distinguished an honor in relation to the amendment. It was true he had thrown it together, and presented it to the Senate, but it emanated from greater and wiser heads than his. The first part of the amendment was copied from the Declaration of Independence. Is it possible, at this day, that the memorable and glorious declaration of those departed statesmen and heroes, which stimulated the people of the infant colonies to deeds of glory and renown, and which has been thought worthy to form a part of the Constitution of the Several States, is to be set aside by the Senate of the United States, to give place to the new-fangled doctrines of the Senator from South Carolina? The next provision of the amendment was copied from the first section of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The principles contained in it were considered so important that it was thought necessary to incorporate it in the Constitution by an amendment, as it was omitted in the original. Are these principles also to be set aside, denied, repudiated, abrogated, and contemned by this Senate, because, forsooth, they are antagonistical to the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina? These, with the next provision in the amendment which was copied from Mr. Jefferson's inaugural address, are altogether worthy of the high source from which they emanated; they are just such principles as freemen must cherish. They recognise the doctrines for which the patriots and sages of the Revolution contended in that glorious struggle. The equality of man, the freedom of the press and of speech, the right to assemble together in a peaceable manner to consult on their common good, and to petition the Government for redress of grievances, tolerating error of opinion, but leaving reason free to combat it—"error of opinion may be tolerated, while reason is left free to combat it." Yes, sir, error of opinion is not, in this country, to be met or put down by the resolutions and opinions of this body alone, unless our acts are seconded by public opinion. These very resolutions may be, and he honestly believed they were, founded in error of opinion; but even they may be tolerated, while reason is left free to combat them. Sir, these declarations of the sage of Monticello should have a resting place, and should be nourished in the hearts of his countrymen. Yes, sir, combat error of opinion by reason, not by gag laws, not by mobs, not by inquisitions, not by establishing censorships over the press, not by abridging the freedom of speech, but by reason, holding the parties responsible for the abuse of all these privileges, or rather rights, to the party aggrieved; and then the question, what are and what are not errors of opinion, must be left to the final arbiters—the people, where they must be left in every country where liberty dwells. The last clause of his amendment was the celebrated saying, he believed it was a toast on a public occasion, of ex-President Jackson, "the Union, it must be preserved." He (Mr. S.) had called this a political truth in the amendment. Was he mistaken in the character he had given it? He believed not. He was satisfied that it was not only a political truth, but it was a truth that met the hearty approbation of every sane mind in the nation; and, while the Senator from South Carolina is pressing his resolutions—in almost every one of which a reference is made, in some shape or other, to the possibility of weakening or destroying the Union—is it not proper, nay, more, is it not demanded, of this body to reaffirm that most vital political truth, "the Union must be preserved?" Yes, sir, if we resolve any abstractions, how can we do less than to point our countrymen to these truths, and to say to them, in the name of our country, Liberty and Union are one and inseparable, now and for ever. Why do Senators object to its adoption? Why not let the whole go to the people together? Are gentlemen afraid to trust them? If our opinions on these abstract questions are worth any thing to the people, let us give them the whole of this matter. He, for one, was not afraid to trust them. If they decide erroneously, either for or against us, let it be remembered that "error of opinion may be tolerated, whilst reason is left free to combat it." If it shall be contended by the Senator that he has been misunderstood, that he does not admit that the principles of the amendment are opposed to the doctrines of the resolutions, and contends that they can both stand together, then the amendment is perfectly harmless, and should form a part of the resolutions. He was, however, grossly mistaken, or these resolutions were not exactly what they seemed to be.

The Senator from Delaware (Mr. Bayard) had in part torn the mask from the first one; he had clearly shown that it embodied the principles of nullification as they are understood in the State from which the mover came. He (Mr. S.) entirely concurred in that opinion. But that was not the only principle involved in the resolutions to which he objected. In his mind it was clear that they strike at the freedom of speech and of the press, and the right of the people to assemble peaceably to consult their common good, and to petition their Government for redress of grievances. It will be seen by Senators that they deny the right of the States to "intermeddle" with the domestic institutions of the other States. Now, sir, what does the word "intermeddle," as it is here used, mean? Does it merely mean that the people of the free States have no right to go into the slave-holding States and excite an insurrection, or otherwise interfere with that domestic institution? If so, it had his most hearty approbation. But if the meaning was, as he believed it to be, that to speak, write, print, or petition, in the free or non-slaveholding States, on any subject connected with slavery, is "intermeddling" with that institution, then he put it to gentlemen to saw whether the constitutional, fundamental, and political truths contained in his amendment were not directly controverted by the resolutions.

Sir, these resolutions contain all the principles of the alien and sedition laws, known as the gag laws of the elder Adams, in a much more odious form. The pretext for the enactment of those laws, history tells use, for his age prevented him knowing any thing personally of the matter, was, that the Government and its officers had been maliciously and wantonly assailed in meetings, in speeches, through the press, by caricatures and otherwise; that the people were instigated and moved by foreign emissaries hostile to our Government; that it was calculated to bring the Government and its officers into disrepute with the people, and weaken, if not eventually destroy, the Union. The facts seemed to have been admitted by all. Well, sir, what was the panacea of that day which the party in power administered as a remedy for this alarming disease of the people? The alien and sedition laws. And what was the effect of these laws on the public mind? Why, sir, although they only punished the offence where it was false and malicious, and allowed the defendant on trial to give in evidence the truth of the charge, yet the people became alarmed for their liberty. The great fundamental and constitutional principles of our Government were invaded. The freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and the right of petition, were all involved in the principle; and so odious did these laws become, that they were greatly instrumental in putting down the Administration of the elder Adams, and in elevating Mr. Jefferson to the Presidential chair.

What was the ground, Mr. President, occupied by the Jeffersonian party of that day? It was the very same which has been so frequently quoted, and which Mr. Jefferson perpetuated by incorporating in his inaugural address, " error of opinion may be tolerated while reason is left free to combat it." What is the pretext for these resolutions? The same, the very same that produced the gag laws. If the freedom of speech is tolerated, if the freedom of the press is not abridged, if the right of petition is not silenced in the non-slaveholding States, if the people in these States speak, write, print, assemble or petition on any subject connected with slavery, they are "intermeddling" with the domestic institutions of the South, and fall within the denunciations of these resolutions, on the assumption that the Union is endangered, by arraying one people against another. Sir, would not the same pretext not only abridge but actually silence the press of this nation? Look at your leading party presses every where: do they not publish daily inflammatory, and, not unfrequently false matter, calculated to array the people against each other, and, in the language of these resolutions, to weaken the Union? And yet who is prepared to establish a censorship over the press? He would not say who, but he would say, that, in his opinion, the resolutions under consideration assert the principle in terms not to be misunderstood. He (Mr. S.) was asked why he had offered the amendment? He would, with great pleasure, respond to the inquiry. He had many reasons for introducing it. He would give a few of them; first, because he wished the antidote to go with the poison; if either was to be sent forth as the doctrines of the Republic. Secondly, because the principles contained in the amendment were such as he loved to recur to and cherish. Because he had some anxiety to ascertain whether the ancient landmarks were still left standing amidst the revolution of parties, or whether they had been erased by the political tornado that has swept over the land; whether he had read the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the history of his country in vain; whether those doctrines and fundamental principles have become too old fashioned for the times, and whether he had to study a new political creed before he could discharge his duty to his State and the nation here. These were some of the reasons; he hoped they would be considered a sufficient answer to the inquiry. Senators favorable to the resolutions have been pleased to express their regret that the amendment has been offered. To those gentlemen he had only to say that he regretted the introduction of the resolutions as honestly as they regretted the introduction of the amendment; he would, therefore, with the consent of the Senators, set off his regret against theirs. He had heard with surprise the Senator from Michigan (Mr. (Norvell) the moment his amendment had been offered, inquire of the Chair whether a motion to postpone it indefinitely would be in order. The zeal of that Senator is rather unaccountable. He had, to be sure, been walking in the footsteps of the mover of the resolutions on this subject; but he (Mr. S) supposed that the courtesy that had been extended to him on the introduction of his miniature resolutions would have advised him of what was due to others, even if he was opposed to their measures.

Mr. S. said that he had no other feelings than those of personal kindness for that Senator, but that it struck him as unkind and uncourteous in the Senator to take the course he did. He (Mr. S.) did not object to any want of order in the inquiry, but of that courtesy which is due on such occasions. He had voted for the printing of the resolutions of that Senator, and yet a motion to indefinitely postpone them would also have been in order. The Senator does not know whether his resolutions come up to the enlarged views of him, (Mr. S.) To this he would only say, that he really could not say whether they did or did not, as he had never read them. He had heard them at the Clerk's table until he had become satisfied that they were a mere miniature reflection of the great light emanating from the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina. The Senator from Ohio (Mr. Allen) expresses himself opposed to the amendment, and says he greatly prefers the amendment that he offered. This is very natural; it is to be expected. Nature herself prompts all animals to nourish, protect, and love their own offspring in preference to the progeny of others, and he certainly had no disposition to find fault with this manifestation of that Senator's regard for the laws of Nature; but really the objections of that Senator were rather unexpected. He says the amendment to which the amendment of that Senator is offered, is, as a lawyer would say, de hors the record, or, in other words, not connected with the subject-matter of the resolutions. Why, sir, does not the Senator himself know that his amendment was drawn after the amendment offered by him? (Mr. S.) If one is out of the record, is not the other? The Senator has not even the merit of originality in his amendment. The Senator says we might as well resolve that the Koran is not the evidence of the Christian's faith as to adopt the amendment offered by him, (Mr. S.) To this, he would merely say, that if the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence, the doctrines of the Constitution of the United States, of the Jeffersonian party of that day, of those great political, fundamental, and constitutional truths contained in the amendment, bear the same relation to the doctrines held by that Senator, that the Koran does to the Christian religion, then the Senator was correct in the conclusion to which he had come, but not otherwise. He would leave the Senator to decide the matter for himself.

The Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. Hubbard) has been pleased to say that the amendment had not the merit of novelty in it, and that it was intended to embarrass the passage of these resolutions. The latter charge, in its offensive sense, he had so fully answered before, that he would merely say to that Senator now, that he could scarcely claim for the charge the merit of originality, as it had been made by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) and, after having been met by him, (Mr. S.) and refuted, it was honorably abandoned by that Senator. If, however, the Senator from New Hampshire wishes to be understood in a sense not offensive, he (Mr. S.) would say, that truth will always embarrass its opposers, and in that sense the amenddment was introduced to embarrass the passage of the resolutions. The Senator says that the amendment has not the merit of novelty; and he has read from a paper from the granite State to show that during the progress of the resolutions of that State similar amendments were offered. Well, sir, admit the fact, and what does it prove? Why, sir, merely that those great fundamental principles are cherished yet, even in New Hampshire, by a portion of the people. But, sir, does the Senator claim for himself any credit for discovering that which he (Mr. S.) had avowed from the outset, that his amendment did not contain novelties, that the doctrines were primary, fundamental, constitutional, and vital political truths? Sir, has novelty any special merit in the eyes of that Senator? If so, the Senator from South Carolina has prepared a feast for him, and he is welcome to enjoy it.

But, sir, there is another avowed principle in these resolutions that most not be passed in silence. It assumes that it may become necessary for this nation to attach territory (Texas) to the Union, for the purpose of protecting and extending the domestic institutions (slavery) of the South. This is a solemn question, and one which he hoped would be promptly met and as promptly decided. He would not now anticipate the arguments upon it, but he begged to be excused for saying that it was a most odious principle to him, and sufficient, in his mind, to alarm the friends of freedom every where. He would take this occasion, however, to say, that he had no connection whatever with the Abolitionists, nor did he even know any of them; he believed them, so far as he could learn, to be a highly respectable portion of our fellow-citizens, yet entertaining, as he honestly believed, mistaken views of this great question. They certainly could not be apprized of the fact, that the very course they had marked out for themselves, and which they were pursuing, if reports speak truth, on that subject, was the worst possible course to attain the object they have in view, if it be merely, as he supposed it was, to induce the master to liberate his slave. Sir, does not this people see that the consequences which have already grown out of their course have been so far from producing the happy results which they had promised themselves to witness from their exertions, that excitement, mobs, and death have followed in their train? Do they not see that the master, instead of loosing his hold on the slave, has taken a firmer grasp? Do they not see that this question may rock the Republic to the centre? Do they not know that should they be instrumental in exciting the slave to deeds of desperation, they would be morally accountable for the act? Do they not know that the Constitution itself was founded upon a compromise; that the slaveholding States were a party to that compromise; and that neither this Government, nor any of the non-slaveholding States, has any thing to do with the institution of slavery in these States, but that it is a matter exclusively for their own regulation, and any interference with it by non-slaveholding States can produce no good, and may do great harm, and is, therefore, unwise and impolitic, to say the least of it? He could only give his opinion; he could not control this matter. He would say to the citizens of the non-slaveholding States, hands off; leave this matter as the Constitution left it; preserve the harmony of this people; and stand by the Union as it is. If our institutions are more to our liking than are those of these States, let us rest contented with our situation, and not, by any act of ours, aggravate the difficulties of our brethren of the South, where we can do no good, and may do much harm. Sir, (said Mr. S.) while he openly avowed the convictions of his mind on this important subject, he felt it due to the occasion and the South to say, that while he would extend to them the full force of their constitutional guaranties, in the protection of their domestic institutions as they now are, he wished the Senators specially representing that interest to understand, distinctly, that he would cavil on the ninth part of a hair, on any question going to extend the principles or boundary of slavery one inch; and he would submit it to the calm and solemn consideration of those Senators, whether the South was not greatly instrumental in exciting and aggravating this matter. Why not rest contented with their constitutional security? Why come into this body asking to extend the territory and principles of slavery, when they well know that of all the subjects under the heavens there is none so well calculated to excite and arouse the feelings of the non-slaveholding States? Whether it be fanaticism or not, the facts are the same. Why resort to unusual, summary, and unconstitutional trials, convictions, and executions of those who may be even guilty of opposing the institution of slavery? Do they not see that while the course of the Abolitionists inflames the South, their course is calculated to inflame the North, and to even make Abolitionists of those who would not otherwise take any part in the matter? Do they not see that this fire can never be extinguished while fuel is continually added to it? Would it not be well—nay, more, as they regard the Union, as they regard the peace and harmony of this people, are the parties, as much as lies within their power, not required—to withdraw the fuel and extinguish the flame? He was well apprized that neither the Abolitionists nor slaveholders may thank him for his advice in this matter. He knew his inability to reach the feelings or instruct the judgment of either. He stood here not the advocate of a particular sect or section of this great Republic, on this question, but as the advocate of the perpetuity of the Union, of the freedom of speech and of the press, of the equality of man, of the right of petition, of those constitutional, fundamental, and political truths, contained in his amendment, which were erected as the landmarks of this great Republic, by our ancestors, and consecrated with their blood, and he felt satisfied to point his countrymen to them as altogether worthy of their confidence and regard.

Mr. HUBBARD explained, and was understood to say, that he did not intend to charge the doctrines of Jefferson and Andrew Jackson (as contained in Mr. Smith's amendment) with wanting the merit of novelty.

Mr. BENTON thought the whole subject had better be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report at some future day; premising, at the same time, that the committee should be chosen chiefly of Senators from the North, where, to his view of the question, the brunt of the action would necessarily have to be fought.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he hoped the motion would not succeed. Much progress had already been made in the discussion. The first two and leading resolutions, which went to the character of our political system, had already been voted on, and, if he might judge from indications on all sides, the discussion on the third had nearly terminated. The three succeeding were in fact deductions from the others, on which he trusted there would not, after what has been said, be much diversity of opinion.

Should the motion prevail, he would consider it but a mode of getting clear of the resolutions. He had offered them as the antagonist of the Vermont resolutions, and to ascertain whether, in the opinion of the Senate, there was any constitutional ground adequate to resist the assaults on our rights and property, on which the slaveholding States could stand. The discussion had clearly shown that there was none other. On the right of rejecting abolition petitions, although, in his opinion, one of the clearest that can be imagined, we of the South were, unfortunately for the peace of the country, in a minority. So, also, on the question of the constitutional right of abolishing slavery in this District and the Territories, and also on every other particular question which has been attempted to be raised on constitutional grounds, as a barrier to our rights and security. What remains, then, short of taking our protection into our own hands, but to find some barrier in the general character and structure of our political system? and where can we find that but in the view of the Constitution, which considers it as a compact between sovereign and independent States, formed for their mutual prosperity and security? If we required proof that these resolutions assumed the only constitutional ground which could give peace and quiet to the country, and security to the South and West, it would be found in this debate. He had challenged, again and again, those who took a different view of our system, to point out where protection could be found in the Constitution according to their conception of that instrument. None had been, or even attempted to be, shown. It would, then, be in vain to refer the resolutions, to discover some new principle in the Constitution calculated to effect the object for which they were introduced. Nor would it be more useful to refer them, to modify the language or the details. They were abstract resolutions, involving little or no details, and he had again and again avowed his readiness to make the language acceptable to all, as far as it could be, without sacrificing the principles on which they rest; of which he had given already abundant proof, and was prepared to give additional. But the Senate must remember that the difficulty heretofore encountered did not originate so much in any objection to the principles of his resolutions, nor to the details, or any peculiar expresssion, as the desire to engraft additional matter entirely foreign to their nature or object, and the consequence of which would be to obstruct their passage, or to neutralize their effects if they should pass. This difficulty could not be avoided; and a reference, so far from diminishing, would but tend to increase it.

Thus thinking, he was constrained to conclude that a reference would be fatal to the resolutions, be the object of the mover what it might; and, with this impression, should the motion succeed, he would leave them to their fate; and, like the mover, he would decline acting on the committee should he be appointed a member.

In assuming State rights grounds as the basis of his resolutions, and calling a rally at this solemn and dangerous juncture of that great, though in a measure dormant, party, which has ever professed the State rights creed, he did not intend to imply that gentlemen opposite to him, or the party to which they belong, were Abolitionists, or disposed to countenance their creed. On the contrary, he believed that the great mass of the party was sound, and adverse to the dangerous projects of the fanatics; but candor compelled him to declare that he could not look to them in this hour of danger. We had their good wishes, it is true. They were even willing to vote it inexpedient and dangerous to agitate the subject; but when we touched the Constitution, and asked them what barrier, according to their conception, that instrument contains against their incendiary and mad projects, they are silent. Their political creed not only admits of none, but, in fact, rouses into action that dangerous spirit of fanaticism which threatens to subvert our institutions. He would repeat here, what he had so often said: This fell spirit originated in that blind fanatical zeal, which made one man believe that he was responsible for the sins of others, and which, two centuries ago, tied the victim that it could not convert, to the stake. After lying long dormant, it is now resuscitated in another form, with no abatement of its blind fury or thirst for blood. The same responsibility which the orthodox of former times felt for the sins of his heretic neighbor, which led him to the fagot and the stake, the Abolitionist now feels for the new species of heresy which their imagination has conjured up in the Southern and Western States, to extirpate which, he is ready to drench the whole South in blood. It is this responsibility for what they deem our sins, which has roused this fell spirit into action; and their conception of their responsibility originates in that mistaken conception of our system, which regards it, not as it really is—a union of States for the mutual good and security of each, but a great and consolidated community, in which the States bear the same relation to the whole as counties do to States; and, of course, in which the whole is responsible for all the parts. This is no new opinion with him. He long since foresaw, before this spirit was roused into action, that this false and dangerous view of the Constitution would, one day or another, lead to the state of things in which we now find ourselves, and so told the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) when he advocated his consolidation doctrines in the discussion on the force bill, in 1833, that such would be the consequence, as he must remember.

Thus thinking, the gentleman opposite must excuse him, if he could not, in the hour of danger, look to them. He thanked them for their good feelings, and he accepted their avowal of opposition to Abolition with all sincerity; but he wanted something more substantial; something that would not pass away with the present incumbents; some constitutional barrier and guaranty; and for these he was constrained to look to those who professed the opposite political creed. How little reliance we can place on those who take the view of the Constitution they do, this debate has furnished ample proof. The Senator from Indiana has been among the most forward to disavow Abolition sentiments, and to express his good wishes for us and our institutions, of the sincerity of which he (Mr. C.) had no reason to distrust; and yet, while he makes these avowals, he moves amendments to these resolutions, which are intended to exhibit the strength of our cause, in the very language of the perverted creed of the Abolitionists, and in which, if he had succeeded, he would, in fact, not only have neutralized all the intended effects of the resolutions, but would have given a triumph and a new impulse to those whose objects he denounces, and to whom he professes to be so much opposed. With this proof before him of the effects of his creed, that Senator, and those with whom he acts, must excuse him if he turns from them to those who profess opposite doctrines, as allies in this great conflict.

I fear (said Mr. C.) that the Senate has not elevated its view sufficiently to comprehend the extent and magnitude of the existing danger. It was perhaps his misfortune to look too much to the future, and to move against dangers at too great a distance, which had involved him in many difficulties, and exposed him often to the imputation of unworthy motives. Thus he had long foreseen the immense surplus revenue which a false system of legislation must pour into the Treasury, and the fatal consequences to the morals and institutions of the country which must follow. When nothing else could arrest it, he threw himself, with his State, into the breach, to arrest dangers which could not otherwise be arrested; whether wisely or not, he left posterity to judge. He now saw with equal clearness, as clear as the noonday sun, the fatal consequences which must follow, if the present disease be not timely arrested. He would repeat again what he had so often said on this floor. This was the only question of sufficient magnitude and potency to divide this Union, and divide it it would, or drench the country in blood, if not arrested. He knew now much the sentiment he had uttered would be misconstrued and misrepresented. There were those who saw no danger to the Union in the violation of all its fundamental principles, but who were full of apprehension when danger was foretold or resisted, and who held not the authors of the danger, but those who forewarned or opposed it, responsible for consequences. But the cry of disunion by the weak or designing has no terror for him. If his attachment to the Union was less, he might tamper with the deep disease which now afflicts the body politic, and keep silent till the patient was ready to sink under its mortal blows. It is a cheap, and, he must say, but too certain a mode of acquiring the character of devoted attachment to the Union. But seeing the danger, as he did, he would be a traitor to the Union, and those he represented, to keep silence. The assaults daily made on the institutions of nearly one-half of the States of this Union by the other—institutions interwoven from the beginning with their political and social existence, and which cannot be other than, without their inevitable destruction, will and must, if continued, make two people of one, by destroying every sympathy between the two great sections, obliterating from their hearts the recollection of their common danger and glory, and implanting in their place a mutual hatred, more deadly than ever existed between two neighboring people since the commencement of the human race. He feared not the circulation of the thousands of incendiary and slanderous publications which were daily issued from an organized and powerful press among those intended to be vilified. They cannot penetrate our section; that was not the danger; it lay in a different direction. Their circulation in the non-slaveholding States was what was to be dreaded. It was infusing a deadly poison into the minds of the rising generation, implanting in them feelings of hatred, the most deadly hatred, instead of affection and love, for one-half of this Union, to be returned on their part with equal detestation. The fatal, the immutable consequences, if not arrested, and that without delay, were such as he had presented.

The first and desirable object is to arrest it in the non-slaveholding States; to meet the disease where it originated, and where it exists; and the first step to this is to find some common constitutional ground on which a rally, with that object, can be made. These resolutions present the ground, and the only one, on which it can be made. The only remedy is in the State rights doctrines; and, if those who profess them in slaveholding States do not rally on them, as their political creed, and organize as a party against the fanatics, in order to put them down, the South and West will be compelled to take the remedy into their own hands. They will then stand justified in the sight of God and man; and what, in that event, will follow, no mortal can anticipate.

Mr. President, (said Mr. C.) we are reposing on a volcano. The Senate seems entirely ignorant of the state of feelings in the South. The mail has just brought us intelligence of a most important step taken by one of the southern States in connection with this subject, which will give some conception of the tone of felling which begins to prevail in that quarter.

A slave was kidnapped or stolen by some persons belonging to a trading vessel from the State of Maine. The Governor of Georgia demanded a surrender of the fugitive criminals, (for such they are, be their motive what it may,) under the Constitution, from the Governor of Maine. It was not complied with. The Governor of Georgia brought the subject before the Legislature. They have, as he understood, acted on it, and unanimously passed resolutions on the subject, and, among others, one, if the surrender of the fugitives be not made, after another and more solemn demand, providing for the convening of the People of Georgia, in their high sovereign capacity, as a member of the Union, to take the subject into their consideration. All who know that State, know that when she moves she intends no idle menace.

With these views and facts, I leave it now to the Senate to decide whether the time has not arrived when they ought to say what attitude they ought to assume in relation to this, the most momentous and dangerous question that has ever agitated this Union. As to himself, he has done his duty. He has raised his warning voice, regardless of the unworthy imputations to which he knows he exposes himself. He has presented the result of his most mature and deliberate reflection, in order, if possible, to prevent the conflict between the two great sections, which any one capable of reflection must see is approaching, and must take place, if not arrested. He has done his duty. Let what may come, he wishes to free himself from all responsibility in the eyes of the country and the world, and of the present and future generations. He was not sanguine, he must say, of the success of the measure, even if it should be adopted. He had presented it as the most likely to do good, and in the desire to do any thing that promised in the least to avert the approaching catastrophe, which he was most anxious to avoid. Should the motion prevail, he would take no further control or responsibility, which would then, of course, rest on those who may take the resolutions into their own hands.

Mr. NORVELL said, that it had not been his habit to introduce personalities into this Hall. It was not a body in which it was proper to indulge in such feelings. When, yesterday, he had propounded to the Chair the question, whether it would be in order to move the indefinite postponement of the amendment, submitted by the Senator from Indiana, (Mr. Smith,) he considered himself to be pursuing a perfectly parliamentary course. The Senator was undoubtedly in order when he offered the amendment; and he was equally in order in propounding the inquiry, which he had put to the Chair: there was no discourtesy in it. He had considered the amendment as a trap, in which to catch the friends of the resolution of the honorable Senator from South Carolina. He had, therefore, desired to get rid of it, as an irrelevant proposition. He did not view the vote of the Senator from Indiana to print what he had been pleased to call his minature resolutions, as any act of courtesy on his part. It was a matter of right that the Senate should order them to be printed. If his resolutions had not come up to the calibre of that Senator's great mind, he must seek consolation, under such a misfortune, in the approbation which they had received from much abler and much better men.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, said he did not rise to continue the debate at large, but merely to answer the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) on a single point, and to say a word to the Senator from Michigan, (Mr. Norvell.) As he understood the Senator from South Carolina, that Senator had said that he (Mr. S.) had done him injustice, in saying that the resolutions of the Senator contemplated the extension of the principles and boundary of slavery. Mr. Smith said, if he was in error in that respect, which he did not admit, he had been led into the error by the last resolution of that Senator.

[Mr. SMITH was about to read the resolution, when Mr. CALHOUN arose and said that he had made no charge against the Senator from Indiana; he disclaimed any thing of the kind, and he hoped his character would be sufficient to satisfy the Senator on that point.]

Mr. SMITH said that the remarks of the Senator were entirely satisfactory to him, and he had no remarks further to make to him. Mr. S. then made some remarks in reply to the remarks previously made by Mr. Norvell.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he was not disposed to complain that the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) had introduced to the notice of the Senate an existing case of controversy, in relation to the supposed abduction of a negro slave, the property of a citizen of Georgia, by a citizen of Maine; but from the manner in which the case had been presented, he felt it his duty to give to the Senate a relation of the facts, so far as they had come to his knowledge. If there had been any final legislative action upon the subject by the Legislature of Georgia, as seemed to be the impression of the Senator from South Carolina, he (Mr. L.) and his colleague, who sat near him, had received no official information of the same. Mr. L. had no information on the subject, except what he had derived from the publication of the official correspondence and documents relating to the subject; from which it appeared, that a citizen or citizens of Maine were accused of the secret abduction of a negro slave from a citizen of Savannah, in Georgia. Under the provisions of the act of Congress providing for such cases, the owner of the slave applied to the Executive of Georgia, and presented the evidence required by the act of Congress; whereupon the Governor of Georgia made the usual demand upon the Executive of Maine for the delivery of the offending fugitives to the agent appointed by the Governor of Georgia, in order that they might be made amenable to the laws of Georgia. The Governor of Maine declined yielding to this demand, and a correspondence ensued between the Executives of the two States, in which the points at issue were discussed, without yielding on either side. The Governor of Georgia, therefore, adverted to the subject in his annual message to the Legislature in November last, in what was considered by the people of Georgia a becoming spirit and tone. This part of the message of the Governor was referred to the Committee on the state of the Republic. That committee made a strong and able report, winding up with resolutions recommending determined action upon the subject; but if the report was acted upon by the Legislature, he (Mr. L.) was not apprized of the fact. He had received no information of such action, and consequently was not apprized of any duty devolving on him in connection with the subject, or that duty would have been performed. He deemed it his duty to make this statement to the Senate, to prevent the impression here or elsewhere, that himself or colleague would be less sensitive in matters connected directly with the interest of their own State, than the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun.)

Mr. RUGGLES of Maine, rose to explain a transaction to which an allusion had been made by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) and the Senator from Georgia, (Mr. Lumpkin,) but he had understood that his statement was, that the slave in question was retained in Maine, and that the Governor of that State had refused to deliver him up on the requisition of the Governor of Georgia.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he now recollected that it was the kidnapper, and not the slave, that had been reclaimed.

Mr. R. remarked that he was somewhat familiar with the circumstances of the case, the slave having been brought to the town in which he (Mr. R.) resides. He said he was here at the time, and the facts of the case, as he understood them at the time, and as they were, he had no doubt, generally understood and believed, were, that a merchant vessel belonging to Maine was lying in the port of Savannah, in Georgia, on board of which, as she was about to sail, the slave referred to, who had been employed in or about the vessel, secreted himself on board the vessel, and was not discovered until two or three days at sea. The vessel stood on and arrived at Thomaston. Soon after, the supposed owners of the slave arrived in pursuit. The slave had secreted himself, or was secreted, in a barn. A number of persons volunteered to aid the alleged owners in finding the runaway, in which they were successful, and they took him without resort to any legal process, and sailed with him back to Savannah.

Mr. LUMPKIN explained that he was not well informed as to the particulars. He had only read them in the newspapers. It was the kidnappers or thieves who had been refused on the requisition of the Governor.

Mr. RUGGLES said he had no doubt the error was unintentional. But however great the error was, it was a very slight one compared with the error which the honorable Senator and one or two others near him had committed in speaking of the master of the vessel referred to, and all on board as kidnappers or thieves. He said they were wholly undeserving of such epithets, if the facts of the case were as he believed them to be; and as one of their representatives here, he felt himself called upon to repel, in their behalf, the imputation implied by such epithets.

Mr. R. said, as to the requisition and refusal, he had no information, except by report. It was doubtless correct that a requisition had been made to deliver up the master of the vessel to be tried by the laws of Georgia, and before a jury of Savannah; and that the requisition has not been complied with.

Now I am up, (said Mr. R.) I will add, that there is no non-slaveholding State in the Union more sound, on the subject of Abolition, than that he had the honor, in part, to represent. He believed he could say what no other Senator representing a Northern State could say—that he had never been called upon to present a single abolition petition since he had had the honor of holding a seat on this floor.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he had not named an individual, nor would he now do so; neither would he enter into the merits of the case; and he had not made a solitary remark implicating Maine or any other State.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Pennsylvania said he rose, with extreme reluctance, to make some remarks upon the question now before the Senate. I myself, said Mr. BUCHANAN, had determined this morning to move a reference of these resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) to a select committee, but was dissuaded from my purpose after I reached the Senate. This motion has now been made by another gentleman, (Mr. BENTON,) and I am called upon to vote either for or against it. As I am still clearly of opinion that an immediate reference of these resolutions to a select committee would, under existing circumstances, be the wisest course, whether we regard the interest of the North or the South, I am prepared to give this motion my hearty support.

On this exciting question I desire to do nothing as a member of this body which can, in the slightest degree, interfere with the constitutional rights of the slaveholding States. My fate as a public man is as deeply staked upon the preservation of these rights as that of any other individual in the country. I have long since taken my stand, and from it I shall not be driven. I do not desire to maintain myself at home, unless I can do it with a due regard to the rights and the safety of the people of the South. I am prepared, therefore, to adopt any just measure, within the pale of the Constitution, to settle this dangerous question, and to afford the greatest security to the slaveholding States. Notwithstanding these are my sentiments, I cannot believe that the Senator from South Carolina has chosen the course best calculated to attain these results. This is the great centre of agitation. From this Capitol, it spreads over the whole Union. I therefore deprecate a protracted discussion of the question here. It can do no good, but may do much harm, both in the North and in the South. It was for this reason that, after the right of petition had been recognised by a solemn vote of this body, I was content to act as we have done for the last two years, and leave the questions to be discussed by the people of the country themselves. We have now abandoned this safe, this prudent course, and what has been the result? For the last three days we have been engaged in a discussion eminently calculated to irritate and inflame the public mind; and as yet we have not adopted the third of the series of resolutions. If we proceed, I shall be agreeably disappointed if another week should close this debate. And what shall we gain by the adoption of these resolutions? Nothing; worse than nothing. Those who look to the votes upon them, as the standard by which to ascertain how many are in favor of, and how many opposed to, their main object, will be greatly mistaken. Some thirteen or fifteen votes have been recorded against these resolutions, when, from my knowledge of Senators, I am firmly convinced that there are but very few, if any, who are not prepared to vote for resolutions prepared in such a conciliatory spirit, as not to encounter the opinions or the prejudices of any, and which ought to give, and I believe would give, entire satisfaction to the South. The moral effect of such a unanimous, or almost ananimous, vote of the Senate, would be great upon the country. It is, therefore, for the purpose of arresting this unprofitable debate, and of having such resolutions reported by a select committee, that I shall vote in favor of the proposition.

What have we witnessed upon the present occasion? The Senators from Delaware, although representing a slaveholding State upon this floor, have voted against these resolutions, because, in their opinion, they can detect in them the poison of nullification. Now, I can see no such thing in them, and am ready to avow that in the main they contain nothing but correct political principles to which I am devoted. But what then? These Senators are placed in a false position, and are compelled to vote against resolutions the object of which they heartily approve. Again: my friend, the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. Wall,) votes against them, because they are political abstractions, of which he thinks the Senate ought not to take cognizance; although he is as much opposed to abolition, and as willing to maintain the constitutional rights of the South as any Senator upon this floor. Other Senators believe the right of petition has been endangered; and until that has been established, they will not vote for any resolutions upon the subject. Thus we stand; and thus those of us in the North, who must sustain the brunt of the battle, are forced into false positions. Abolition thus acquires force by bringing to its aid the right of petition and the hostility which exists in the North against the doctrines of nullification. It is vain to say that these principles are not really involved in the question. This may be, and in my opinion is, true; but why, by our conduct here, should we afford the Abolitionists such plausible pretexts? The fact is, and it cannot be disguised, that those of us in the Northern States who have determined to sustain the rights of the slaveholding States at every hazard, are placed in a most embarrassing situation. We are almost literally between two fires: whilst in front we are assailed by the abolitionists, our own friends in the South are constantly driving us into positions where their enemies and our enemies may gain important advantages. Let us then sacrifice forms if we can obtain the substance.

Now, sir, if a select committee should be raised, they might, I think, report three resolutions, which would receive the almost unanimous vote of the Senate.

What is the evil of which the Southern States complain? Numerous abolition societies have been formed throughout the Middle and Northern States; and for what purpose? It cannot be for the purpose of effecting any change of opinion in the free States on the subject of slavery. We have no slaves there; we never shall have any slaves there. The object cannot be to operate upon the slaveholders; because the Abolitionists must know, every person within the sound of my voice knows, that their interference with this question has bound the slaveholding interest together as one man against abolishing slavery in their respective States. Before this unfortunate agitation commenced, a very large and growing party existed in several of the slave States in favor of the gradual abolition of slavery; and now not a voice is heard there in support of such a measure. The Abolitionists have postponed the emancipation of the slaves in three or four States of this Union for at least half a century. They have, by their interference, produced such a state of public opinion that no man within these States would now be bold enough to raise such a question before any of their Legislatures. What, then, is the purpose of these societies—I will not say the purpose, for I cannot, and do not, attribute to them such unholy intentions—but what is the direct tendency of their measures? To irritate and exasperate the feelings of the slaves; to hold out to them vague notions and delusive hopes of liberty; to render them discontented and unhappy, and, finally, to foment servile insurrection, with all its attendant horrors, and to cover the land with blood. However devoted to the Union the South may be, the cup of forbearance may yet be exhausted. If the father of a family be placed in such a deplorable condition that he cannot retire to rest at night without apprehension that before the morning his house may be developed in flames, and those who are nearest and dearest to him may be butchered, or worse than butchered, the great law of self-preservation will compel him to seek security by whatever means it may be obtained. Now, sir, I have long watched the progress of this agitation with intense anxiety, and I can say in solemn truth that never before have I witnessed such a deep pervading and determined feeling as exists at present upon this subject among the sober and reflecting men of the South. They love the Union, but if its blessings cannot be enjoyed but in constant fear of their own destruction, necessity will compel them to abandon it. Such is now the southern feeling. The Union is now in danger, and I wish to proclaim the fact. The brave man looks danger in the face, and vanquishes it; whilst the coward closes his eyes at its approach, and is overwhelmed. The Union is dear to me as my heart's blood. I would peril life, character, and every earthly hope, to maintain it; but the best mode of preserving it is to warn its friends of approaching danger. This I verily believe now exists, and that, too, solely from the efforts of these abolition societies. I can fancy no other cause which could by possibility endanger its existence.

And, if the Union should be dissolved upon the question of slavery, what will be the consequences? An entire non-intercourse between its different parts, mutual jealousies, and implacable wars. The hopes of the friends of liberty, in every clime, would be blasted; and despotism might regain her empire over the world. I might present in detail the evils which would flow from disunion, but I forbear. I shall not further lift the curtain. The scene would be too painful. The good sense and sound patriotism of the people of the North, when once aroused to the danger, will apply the appropriate remedy. The peaceful influence of public opinion will save the Union.

The select committee might report a resolution which would obtain the unanimous vote of the Senate, declaring that neither the Congress of the United States, nor any State, nor any combination of individuals in any State, has any right to interfere with the existence or regulation of slavery in any other State, where it is recognised by law. Even the Abolitionists themselves, so far as my knowledge extends, have never denied this principle. It was solemnly announced by the first Congress; and it is most clearly the doctrine of the Constitution. That instrument expressly recognises the right to hold slaves as property in States where slavery exists. This, then, is not a question of general morality, affecting the consciences of men, but it is a question of constitutional law. When the States became parties to the Federal compact, they entered into a solemn agreement that property in slaves should be as inviolable as any other property. Whilst the Constitution endures, no human power, except that of the State within which slavery exists, has any right to interfere with the question. An attempt on the part of any other State, or of Congress, to violate this right, would be a palpable violation of the Constitution. Congress might as well undertake to interfere with slavery under a foreign Government, as in any of the States where it now exists. I feel confident that there would not be a single dissenting voice raised in the Senate against the adoption of such a resolution as I have suggested.

A second resolution might assert the principle that Congress have no right under the Constitution to prohibit the transfer of slaves by a citizen of one State to a citizen of another State, when slavery is recognised by the laws of both. The power "to regulate commerce among the several States" can never be construed into a power to abolish this commerce. Regulation is one thing, destruction another. As long as slaves continue to be property under the Constitution, Congress might as well undertake to prohibit the people of Massachusetts from selling their domestic manufactures in South Carolina, as to prohibit the master of a slave in Virginia from disposing of him to his neighbor in North Carolina. Both cases rest upon the same principle of constitutional law. The power to regulate does not imply the power to destroy. I believe that such a resolution would encounter no serious opposition in the Senate.

Again, a third resolution might be adopted in regard to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, which would unite nearly every suffrage in the Senate. This District was ceded to the United States by Virginia and Maryland. At the date of the cession, they were both slaveholding States, and they continue to be so at this day. Does any man suppose, for a single moment, that they would have ever made this cession, if they had supposed that Congress would abolish slavery in this District of ten miles square whilst it existed in their surrounding territories? So long as it continues in these two States, it would be a violation of the implied faith which we pledged to them by the acceptance of the cession, to convert this very cession into the means of injuring and destroying their peace and security.

If this District were free, it would become a city of refuge for the Abolitionists. It would be a secure asylum from whence they could scatter arrows, firebrands, and death, throughout the slaveholding Sates. It would become the very centre of agitation.

The people of this District have viewed with amazement and indignation the reiterated and persevering attempts which have been made by the citizens of distant States to interfere in their domestic concerns, and deprive them of their property. They have protested against this foreign interference with their rights; but they have protested in vain. Petitions still continue to flow in, although the petitioners ought to know that slavery exists here in its mildest form, and that, if they should be successful, there would not be a single slave left in the District upon which the law could operate. Before any bill for this purpose could pass Congress, all the slaves here would be sold and sent away into the slave States, far from the place of their birth and their affections. Success in this attempt would thus place the slaves themselves in a worse condition than they are at present.

A resolution might, therefore, be adopted, in accordance with the spirit and tone of President Van Buren's remarks upon this subject, in his admirable inaugural address. It might declare that whilst slavery exists in Maryland and Virginia, it ought not, in the opinion of the Senate, to be abolished in the District of Columbia.

This committee ought to be most carefully selected by the Senate. It should be composed of men whose opinions would command the greatest weight throughout the country. Every thing like party politics should be banished from our deliberations on this subject. I should deem myself guilty of moral treason, if, on a question which may endanger the existence of the Union, I could permit my conduct to be influenced by the petty desire of obtaining a party triumph. Let the resolutions be framed in a most conciliatory spirit, and let them be clothed in language which shall shock the opinions of no Senator. Provided the substance be retained, I care not for the form. Such resolutions, adopted by an almost unanimous vote, might exert the happiest influence. They would mark a clear and a broad line of separation between the friends of the Union on the one side, and the Abolitionists on the other. They would free the question from the party politics of the day, and would rally all the friends of the Constitution, every where in their support.

The Middle and Northern States are the field upon which this great battle must be fought. I fear not, I doubt not, the result, if Senators from the South, where the people are already united, would but consent to adopt the counsels of those who must bear the brunt of the contest.

Mr. PRESTON was much averse to the proposed reference, because it would occasion much loss of time in going over the same ground again,

Such had been the result in the other House. He wished the Senate itself to proceed with the resolutions. God grant they might have the effect desired; but Mr. P. wished his constituents to know that he distrusted their efficacy. The protection of the South must depend on themselves. He hoped the resolutions would not be referred; it could do no good, and would protract the discussion, of which he was already heartily wearied.

Mr. BENTON then withdrew the motion to commit the subject to a select committee.

Mr. WALL said that he had hoped the subject would have been referred to a committee, as it was clearly incompetent to the Senate to sit day after day, making abstract creeds, and establishing particular interpretations of the Constitution; all which was foreign to the purposes of legislation. He would ask, on whom were these codes, creeds, and abstractions, to operate? They could have no force whatever as law; whom, then, would they bind? No one person whatsoever! Did, then, the Senate expect to settle a thousand disputed constitutional questions by propounding theories and abstract propositions? To legislate was the duty of legislators, not to broach or to promulgate abstract opinions and theories. If a law were introduced on the subject, he (Mr. W.) would be able to act; or, if the report of a committee had come up, it might be received or rejected. As it was, however, the course pursued appeared to him irregular, anomalous, and fraught with bad consequences, converting the Senate into a mere arena of theoretical disputations.

Mr. MORRIS then obtained the floor, when, an adjournment being moved unsuccessfully, after two divisions, on a suggestion from Mr. Webster that, in courtesy to Mr. Morris, who was too indisposed to proceed with his remarks at this late hour, he was entitled to an adjournment,

The Senate adjourned.

REMARKS OF MR. WRIGHT,
OF NEW YORK,

In Senate, Tuesday, December 26, 1837—On the bill restraining the issue of small notes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WRIGHT rose and inquired of the Vice President if the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois (Mr. Young) had been adopted? The answer was, that it had been adopted by the unanimous consent of the Senate. He then said he had hoped not to be compelled again to trouble the Senate with any remarks upon this bill; but the charges against the committee which had reported it to the Senate were such, and so various, that it seemed to be his duty again to notice them. On the last day of the session of the Senate, they had proceeded from various quarters, and then partially from the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay.) He was himself a member of that committee, (the Committee on Finance,) and had been honored by the Senate with a conspicuous place upon it. He had, upon that day, repelled some of the e charges; but they now came, with additions and aggravations, from the honorable Senator, (Mr. Clay,) and he must, therefore, again repel them.

He would do this by recounting, as briefly as possible, the charges which had been made, and the facts and history of the bill, and its progress. The Senate, upon an early day of the present session, he thought the 11th December, by an express resolution, instructed the Committee on Finance to consider the subject of the currency in this District, and to report such bills as in their judgment should be required for the improvement thereof. The resolution reached the committee on the day after its passage. There were then but three members of the committee in town, the member from Missouri (Mr. Benton) from New Hampshire (Mr. Hubbard) and himself. The members from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) and from Louisiana (Mr. Nicholas) had not then reached the city. In the judgment of the members of the committee present, the suppression of the small, individual, and worthless notes, which were circulating as money in the District, and especially in this city, was one indispensable pre-requisite to the improvement of the currency. In this, they supposed they were supported by the already expressed judgment of the Senate, as a bill to accomplish this object had passed, at the session of the Senate of September and October last, without a dissenting vote. The three members of the Committee, therefore, acted upon the order of the Senate, and promptly reported that bill, in the words, letters, and figures, in which it had passed the Senate at its last session.

They were not a little surprised, upon the very appearance of the bill in the chamber, to find themselves sharply reproved by the honorable Senator, (Mr. Clay,) and the propriety strongly questioned of so few members of a committee of the body, in the absence of their colleagues, assuming to report bills of so high importance; bills touching the great and interesting subject of the currency of the country. An explanation was then made, and the Senator requested to raise the question he had suggested, that the sense of the Senate might be taken upon it. This was not done, and the matter rested until the bill came up for consideration in the Committee of the Whole of the body, on Friday last.

Then, new charges were preferred against the committee. They had gone out of their way to introduce this bill. They had encroached upon the province of another important committee of the body, that on the District of Columbia. These charges were met; the order of the Senate instructing the Committee on Finance to take up the subject was produced, and the fact that the bill was an exact copy of one which had passed the Senate at its last session, in October, was again stated.

The Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay,) however, then overstepped these trifling charges, and announced to the Senate, and the audience, that the bill was a "picayune" bill, a trifling affair, and that the committee ought to be ashamed to have introduced such a measure before the Senate. Mr. W. said he felt mortified and humiliated at a declaration of this strong character coming from so distinguished a source; from a Senator whose legislative experience was superior to that of almost any individual in the country; whose standing has long been such as to give weight to his declarations here or elsewhere; and whose sense of justice ought to moderate those declarations upon all occasions, and most especially when made upon this floor. He could not fail to see the wide discrepancy in the complaints against the committee, coming from the same source, upon the two occasions. In the first instance, it was an important bill, touching the great and delicate question of the currency of the country, and ought not to have been reported without a full committee; and in the second, it was a six-penny business, of which a committee of the Senate ought to be ashamed. Yet, so direct were the censures, and such the weight of their authority, that silence was imposed upon him and his colleagues, and he felt bound to wait until the sense of the Senate should be expressed upon the measure, before he entirely surrendered himself to self-condemnation. At the same time it was his duty to confess that, censured as the committee were, and from such authority, and trifling, and six-penny in character, as the measure was pronounced in so high a quarter, it was some consolation to his feelings to see the interest and the spirit it elicited from the opposition; to see that, humble and shameful as was the bill, it opened the strongest batteries from the opposing benches, and drew forth their hottest and heaviest fire.

The decisive vote, at length, came, and what were the feelings of relief on the part of those humble members of the Committee on Finance, who had thus ventured to give back to the Senate a measure of its own, when they found not one solitary vote against it? Would it be doubted that the apprehension of shame was at an end, and they were compelled to conclude that, all the high complaints notwithstanding, they had presented to the body a salutary and acceptable bill?

Here he supposed all debate as to this much-abused measure would have terminated; but the experience of the morning had shown his mistake. The honorable Senator (Mr. Clay) had again come to the assault, not upon the bill, but upon the committee, and had accused them of a culpable neglect of the more important business before them, that they might hasten on measures of oppression upon this poor and helpless District. He had demanded why the important bills of the session were not brought forward, instead of this trifling measure?

The honorable Senator had, in this instance also, ran himself into an inconsistency of complaint which demanded correction. His first charge was, that the committee were arrogating powers unsafe to legislation, by reporting important bills while their number was not full. In addition to the public explanation, made in answer to that charge, a private one was made to the Senator himself, and he was assured that the great public measures of the session would not be pressed upon the attention of the committee, until its members should have arrived in town, and have an opportunity to attend its meetings. He called upon the Senator to do him the justice to recollect that this assurance was given to him in person, and in his seat in the Senete.

What, then, was the condition of the committee, in this respect, at this moment? The member from Louisiana had arrived since the last regular meeting of the committee, but the member from Massachusetts, the great leader of that party, whose interests the honorable Senator (Mr. Clay) upon all occasions so ably and eloquently espoused, had not yet reached the city. Were the members of the committee, then, who were present, and especially those who had been present from the hour of the appointment of the committee, to expect this censure for not having proceeded further in the absence of this distinguished colleague? Were they to have entertained this expectation, after the complaints which had been heaped upon them for having simply reported a "picayune" bill during the absence of that member of the committee? Was he to have expected complaints of this character from the very individual to whom he had given assurances that the important measures of the session should not be hastened in the committee until the arrival of its absent members? All these were questions which necessarily suggested themselves in consequence of the course which the honorable Senator had felt it to be his duty to pursue upon the passage of the bill under discussion. They were propounded to himself, to the Senate, and to the country; and he, as a member of that committee against which this singular course of complaint had been pursued, was willing to leave the answers to that sense of justice which governs the decisions of every upright man. He would ask, however, and he would even make the appeal to the Senator himself, whether it was just, whether it was fair, to put the committee in the hopeless dilemma in which his complaints had placed them? If they did act, to complain of them for transacting important business in the absence of some of their number? If they did not act, to complain of them for neglecting the important business of the session? To characterize the same bill, at one moment, as an important measure touching the currency of the country, and the next moment, as a six-penny affair, "a picayune bill," of which the committee should be ashamed? In short, whether the committee advanced, stood still, or receded, to make their course equally the subject of such high censures?

[Mr. CLAY, in reply, intimated that Mr. Wright had rested for days upon remarks from him which he had chosen to consider personal, although they were not so intended, and had now come forward to reply to them. He also urged objections to the bill, and to the course of the committee in reporting it, because he said it was evident that, while the terms of the bill limited its action to the District of Columbia, it was intended that it should have a much broader influence, and should discourage the circulation of the description of currency upon which it acted in the surrounding country.]

Mr. WRIGHT rejoined. He said the Senator had entirely misconceived him, if he had supposed he viewed any of his remarks of Friday as personal to himself, or intended, at this time, to reply to them as such. He had made the reference to those remarks now simply as a part of the history of the measure before the Senate, and of its treatment by the honorable Senator. In that sense, and in that sense alone, had he referred to those remarks.

The Senator now proceeds with a new objection to the bill, and a new complaint against the committee. It is that the bill is intended to exert an influence and power not apparent upon its face; that while it purports to act upon the circulation of small notes in this District only, the intention is palpable that it should act upon, and discourage, the circulation of that same description of notes in the adjacent States. To these complaints he had merely to say that the provisions of the bill were plain and simple; that they were limited, in explicit terms, to this District, and that, if it became a law, its whole legal and binding force would be in this District, and no where else. If, then, there existed any intention on the part of the committee, or any members of it, that it should have the broad operation ascribed by the Senator, that intention can only be made effective through the example of the legislation and the moral influence of the measure. So far as influences of this sort were to be exerted by the passage of the bill, however objectionable they might be to the honorable Senator, they were in no sense objectionable to himself. He would rejoice if the example of the legislation should be followed by every State Legislature in the whole Union. He should increase vastly his estimate of the importance of the measure, and of its public utility, if he could persuade himself that its moral influence would banish, from circulation, throughout the United States, every note such as it proposed to suppress in the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

DEFERRED DEBATE.

In the House of Representatives, Tuesday, January 2, 1838—On the introduction of the following proposition submitted by Mr. WISE of Virginia:

"Resolved, That a committee to consist of —— members be appointed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the Constitution of the United States as to prohibit the appointment of members of Congress to Executive offices during the time for which they are elected Senators or Representatives, and the time of two years thereafter."

Mr. WISE said it was not his intention to discuss the resolution at this time, and he hoped its introduction would lead to no debate. He had paid some attention to the abuses of this Government—abuses which, if not corrected, would at some time subvert the public liberty. And his solemn conviction was, that the true root of all the corruption which existed in the administration of our Government was to be found in the power possessed by the President of the United States to make the legislative branch his subservient slave, by an adroit exercise of the gift of office.

Mr. W. said he had offered the present amendment at a former session of Congress, and he would here say that it had been the business, the great effort of his public life, to get this amendment of the Constitution carried into effect. He had not yet succeeded; but he should still continue at least to try.

Mr. HAYNES of Georgia said he was sorry that the gentleman from Virginia had not submitted his resolution in silence; because Mr. H. was unable to support it on the grounds and for the reasons stated by that gentleman, and yet it was his determination to vote for it, because he had always been in favor of such an alteration of the Constitution. He should support it, not because he believed corruption did actually exist, but because the purity of that House ought always to be kept free from all imputation or suspicion of that kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina said he was much obliged to the honorable gentlemen from Virginia for having introduced a resolution of this kind. He considered it one of very great importance. A similar proposition had been introduced by the same gentleman once before. Mr. W. had given it his hearty support then, and he should still do the same. But he thought the resolution had better be extended as to embrace another point, viz: a limitation of the Presidential term of service to four years, and make the same individual ineligible thereafter. He hoped the gentleman would consent to modify his resolution to this effect.

Mr. WISE said he must apologise to the gentleman from North Carolina for not accepting the proposed modification. He was unable to do so; because he desired that this one measure should be kept entirely separate and distinct from all others. It was, in his view, of paramount importance to all other amendments of the Constitution. As to the proposal of the honorable gentleman, if it was possible to make Congress independent of the Executive, he doubted whether a period of eight years was too long for the term of the President's service. Mr. W. would tempt the incumbent to use his great power for the good of his country, by setting before him the hope of a second term of office. That, at all events, was debateable ground; there was room for a difference of opinion in regard to it; but that the President ought not to have it in his power to influence the votes of members of Congress by the power of appointing them to office, was a matter in which no reflecting man could honestly entertain a doubt. Mr. W. regretted that the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (now generally understood to be the Premier of this House,) could not agree with him in the grounds on which the resolution should be adopted.

Mr. HAYNES here briefly explained, and stated again the grounds on which he should vote for the resolution.

Mr. WISE resumed. In offering this resolution he was merely "treading in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor," to wit, General Jackson, for the doctrine of this amendment was the very doctrine held and avowed by that great Moloch of modern Democracy.

Mr. HAYNES said he only objected to the application which Mr. W. seemed disposed to make of the doctrine.

Mr. WISE said he had made none. But of this he was fully persuaded, that without such an amendment to our Constitution, an elective monarchy was fast growing up in the midst of us. He saw, indeed, a day of reformation dawning—the good work had commenced. But he was for beginning at once with a reform of that House. Whoever might be his favorite candidate for the Presidency, his first or his second favorite, never should he wish to see him enter upon office possessed of the tremendous power of appointing to offices of honor and profit the members of the legislative branches of the Government. As long as the power remained, it always would be exercised; in the language of General Jackson, so long as the Executive held this dangerous power, "corruption would be the order of the day;" and no man could more fully have demonstrated the truth of the proposition than the man himself who had advanced it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was glad to hear gentlemen express themselves in such decided language: but the honorable gentleman from Virginia was certainly mistaken when he said that in the propriety of the principle of the resolution he had offered all men concurred. All men did not assent to its propriety. The last Congress, on the contrary, had expressly denied and rejected it.

Mr. WISE explained. He meant that all men must and did, in their conscience, assent to it, although many, he knew, rejected it in their practice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that two years ago he had the honor of introducing the same proposition; the resolution was referred to a committee, and that committee had reported against it. Mr. U. had never been able to get a hearing in support of it, though he had been struggling for it for two years. He would inform the honorable gentleman from North Carolin (Mr. Williams) that, in a resolution offered by Mr. U. this morning, he would find his idea about restricting the term of Executive service embodied, and he trusted the proposition would receive that gentleman's able support. Mr. U. said he had risen to express his gratification that the honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Premier HAYNES) agreed so far with him as to hold that the proposition introduced by the gentleman from Virginia ought to pass. He was delighted to witness the manifestation of feeling in its favor which had been elicited by this discussion. He hoped that the resolution would be sent to a select committee. He was willing, if the mover preferred it, that the proposition should be kept separate from the other, introduced by himself, though he did not perceive any strong reason why they should not be taken together.

Mr. JENIFER, of Maryland, though very imperfectly heard, was understood to say that he hoped no obstacle would be thrown in the way of the passage of this resolution. The proposition it contained was a very important one, and ought to stand on its own merits: he hoped, therefore, the gentleman from North Carolina would not insist on his amendment, (if he had moved it as such:) the two questions ought to be kept entirely distinct; this plan of prohibiting the appointment of members of Congress had been before the nation now for eight years. Although the celebrated letter of General Jackson charged corruption as being the natural and necessary result of such a power, Mr. J. had not then believed it; but experience had taught him the truth of that opinion. He hoped the question would be put upon this propesition separately from all others.

Mr. YELL addressed the Chair, and said that he was rejoiced to find the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) returning again to his first love, and to the doctrines he advocated whilst an ardent supporter of General Jackson's administration. He was gratified to find him advocating the principles of that illustrious statesman, General Andrew Jackson. The principles embraced in the honorable gentleman's resolution have been urged before this nation for the last eight years and upwards, and have received the support and co-operation of the great body of the Republican party. Sir, (continued Mr. Y.) I am gratified that the gentleman from Virginia has again revived those principles in this House, and brought them once more before the nation; and I cannot but hope that the party with which that gentleman is now acting, will be found giving them a generous and a hearty support. As to the letter alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia, written by General Jackson, in which that eminent man remarked, "that so long as the Executive held this power, corruption would be the order of the day," he believed the letter and the remark would be found as true as Holy Writ whenever that power was exercised by those who were corrupt enough to abuse it.

Mr. Y. concluded by alluding to the charges of bargain, intrigue, and corruption, so often preferred against the Administration of the predecessor of General Jackson, (Mr. Adams,) and said that they were then the order of the day; and, in support of the position he assumed, referred to the appointment of his Premier, (Mr. Clay,) and the station that that gentleman had held immediately prior to his being translated to the office of Secretary of State. He also alluded directly to the important appointments from members of Congress that were made under the administration of Mr. Adams, and pledged himself to produce more evidences of corruption during the four years of Mr. Adams's administration than could be alleged to have existed under the eight years of the administration of General Jackson. These facts were susceptible of the clearest proof; and as the resolution which had been offered by the gentleman from Virginia would enable the House to go into an investigation, he rejoiced at its introduction, and was glad that the gentleman had "come to the rescue." Why (inquired Mr. Y.) has not the gentleman and his friends made this proposition before? It has been urged by General Jackson for the last eight years; and how has it been treated by the party to which the gentleman from Virginia is attached? It is an investigation which they did not desire, and the object of introducing it now was to produce political agitation and effect. Mr. Y. continued, that he was in principle opposed to the appointment of members of Congress to office, because of the dangerous tendency that resulted from it, and because it led to a flagrant abuse of power; but the practice had prevailed, and had been kept up, under the sanction of the Constitution. He concluded by expressing a hope that the resolution would be duly considered and adopted; and when the inquiry it embraced was made, all would be enabled to ascertain to which party the charge of corruption would apply. All that he desired was full and impartial investigation.

Mr. WISE asked why the gentleman had expressed so much gratification that he had "come back" to the ground taken in this resolution? When had he ever departed from the support of a principle which was but the dictate of common honesty? It had been the principle embodied in this resolution which had recommended General Jackson to his favor, and had induced him to join his efforts with those of others, to bring him into power, that he might reform this very matter of bargain and sale. Who (cried Mr. W.) departed from the principle? Did I? Was it I that swerved from it? No, never; let me tell the gentleman it was General Jackson himself; it was he who departed from every principle that had brought him into power, and had won for him the support of so large a mass of the ability and integrity of this country. For never had there been a party in this Government which embodied more able and influential men. An amendment had then been proposed by him to prevent this power of appointing members of Congress to office, on the express ground that if it continued "corruption must become the order of the day." What had been Mr. W's surprise on beholding hundreds of thousand of dollars lavished on members of Congress as the emoluments of office? On seeing them rewarded with foreign missions for party services? Mr. W. here referred especially to the appointment of a minister to England, on which occasion hundreds of votes had been given with a view to that appointment. (On this subject Mr. W. spoke with so much earnestness that much of what he said was not intelligible to the reporter.) Did the member from Arkansas expect that Mr. W. would support a man for his principles, and then stick to the man when he openly violated all his principles? Was that modern democracy! If to advocate the pure and strict principles of Democratic Government as laid down in the Constitution was to be a Democrat, then he was one. But he must express his regret that all the members of the last Congress had not been like this gentleman from Arkansas, who was so ready for a free and open and honest investigation. That, (exclaimed Mr. W.) that's the game! On that offer I give the gentleman my hand. But when I sought for just such an investigation, how was I met? Not by "the Greatest and Best." Was not every mouth hermetically sealed against me? Was there a man who dare testify?

I do not stand here, said Mr. W. for the successor to that Greatest and Best. His friends have given him up. The papers, indeed, may still affect to support him—they may "keep a stiff upper lip," as the phrase is; but the game is up. They know the game is up. And now, perhaps, we may hear something in favor of a free inquiry. I did not believe that bargain and sale were to be the order of the day, though I opposed the Administration of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams.) But the corruptions under Gen. Jackson's Administration were, in comparison, as mountains to mole-hills. Justice and truth require this acknowledgment at my hands. I have no objection that the gentleman from Arkansas should vindicate Gen. Jackson from charges which have now grown stale. But if an investigation is instituted, I hope none will follow the example of the Heads of Departments at the last Congress. An investigating committee was raised to search out the corruptions of the Administration before that of Gen. Jackson: they had free access to all the Departments, and an able report was drawn up by Mr. Hamilton, of South Carolina; and what was the result? What did the committee find after all their labor? Why, that Mr. Pleasants had received pay for a constructive journey. Inquiry on that occasion, instead of being staved off, was invited. Had the same course been pursued then as has been under Gen. Jackson's reign, it is very doubtful whether that Administration could have been broken down. As to the gentleman who was the Secretary of State, and whose name was so connected with the cry of bargain and sale, I pledge myself to investigate his course in that matter. Will you do the same. Will you throw open the Indian bureau? the several Departments? the Post Office? And will you interpose no Executive technicalities, as an obstacle, at every step? Will you agree to inquire how many appointments were made by Executive authority, without the concurrence of the Senate? How much of that secret service money, about which such a cry was made against a former Administration, was expended on your political agents? What interference there has been with the freedom of elections? How many postmasters' contracts have been given to fostered land companies. If the gentleman is sincerely for an honest inquiry, I go with him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I believe that the honorable gentleman from Virginia has pretty well atoned for what I deem to have been his political sin in ever supporting Gen. Jackson and his administration. But I have a little to say to him as well as to the gentleman from Arkansas, on that matter. For myself, I have stood aloof: I have, at least, not that sin to answer for. I believe that in what General Jackson said on the effects of this appointing power over members of Congress, there was much shrewd penetration into the springs which operate on frail human nature; and I am anxious to build up a wall, such as these corrupt tendencies of our nature shall not be able to surmount, and I am glad to see the former supporters of General Jackson coming over to the same ground. But I must tell the gentleman from Arkansas that he is mistaken: his friends were not in favor of abolishing this power. They reported against the proposition. I have a right to say this, for I was myself on the committee which made the report, though in the minority, and opposed to the report. But I will not go into the subject now. I am older than either of those gentlemen, and I feel myself on that ground entitled to give them a little advice. They are opening a course of discussion which I deprecate. They both have been talking of the appointments made under General Jackson's administration, and that which preceded it. Now I beg them to leave all that matter out of this discussion entirely.

Mr. WISE here rose to explain. The gentleman from Arkansas thought that the Administration which preceded the last were all rogues. Mr. W. thought the last were: and when rogues fell out, honest men were apt to come by their own.

Mr. YELL, in reply to Mr. WISE, disclaimed having made any such charge. He had not said that they were morally dishonest, and he did not believe any thing of the kind. His charge against them was an offset for their political sins. He would say, however, that some of the parties were Yankees, and had some small reputation for making good bargains.

Mr. UNDERWOOD resumed. He hoped no allusion whatever would be made to the past, but that the House would take up the question on its own merits, and on the known principles of human nature. He believed the House would all concur in the propriety of this restriction on the Executive power. To indulge in these retrospects would only prevent the unanimity which might otherwise be attained.

Mr. YELL replied that he should not on this occasion be driven into an investigation of charges against either Administration. He spoke for himself only, and not for any party. He would say to the gentleman, that he had ever been ready to search out, and investigate frauds and corruption at all times, and in all places; and he would tender the gentleman his aid, by beginning at the State Department, and proceeding regularly down to the Post Office, if he desired inquiry. The gentleman (added Mr. Y.) admits that General Hamilton's committe had ferreted out one case of corruption—I allude to the case of Mr. Pleasants; and that one alone, nay one more than that could be found justly charged against General Jackson's Administration. In alluding to this fact, I do but repeat, from the report of the Committee on Investigation.

Mr. WISE. Has the gentleman read that report?

Mr. YELL inquired if Mr. WISE referred to the minority, which he had himself drawn up? If he does, (said Mr. Y.) I can inform him that I have not. He concluded by saying, that as it seemed to give some gentlemen in a certain quarter of the House some trouble, he would withdraw his proposition to go into an investigation of the corruption under the Administration of General Jackson's predecessor; but solicited, and invited, the strictest scrutiny into the acts of General Jackson.

Mr. WISE. Oh no; if one is to be investigated, let both be: both or neither.

The House then, on motion, adjourned.

REMARKS OF MR. BROWN, OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In Senate, Thursday, December 21, 1837.—On the bill to suppress the issue of small notes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BROWN said he could not see, in the provisions of the bill which had been reported by the Committee on Finance, the slightest justification for the strong and unqualified denunciations which it had called forth from gentlemen who had spoken in opposition to it. On the contrary, he returned the members of that committee his thanks for the prompt and efficient remedy which they had proposed, to effect the suppression of an evil that he considered a nuisance in the money circulation of the District of Columbia.

It was not his intention to enter into a defence of that committee against the imputations which had been cast on their motives, for having taken that course which they believed called for by public duty. They were abundantly able to answer for themselves, and to justify their own course. When, however, it had been intimated by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston) that the issuing of small notes by individuals and corporations in this District was viewed as a political offence against the party now in power, and that the object of the committee was to punish that offence by the proposed measure, he must be allowed to say that there was nothing, in his opinion, which in the slightest degree warranted such a conclusion.

If it was meant by this expression that the putting them in circulation was an offence against the principles of sound political economy, then he would entirely coincide with the Senator, and believed the offence, in that point of view, deserved the correction so appropriately recommended by the committee. It had been charged against the party in power that the issuing of small notes was a necessary consequence of their policy for some years past in relation to the currency. Mr. B. denied that any such consequence was properly deducible from the acts and course of the late Administration. Who had been chiefly instrumental in banishing specie change from this District, and from many of the States, by issuing this spurious small note circulation? If he had not been much misinformed, it had been done almost exclusively by corporations controlled by, and private individuals belonging to, what is denominated the Whig party. This had been done in many States, in open contempt and flagrant violation of their laws which denounced it as an offence, and, to his astonishment, had been justified and applauded! Yes, said Mr. B. that law-loving party, who are ever sounding the alarm of violated Constitution and violated laws against the present Administration, have openly approved, nay more, applauded, this utter contempt and prostration of law!

In some of the States in which statutes existed as explicit and as comprehensive against offences of that kind as the human mind could frame, legal opinions, he learnt, had been given in justification of the issuing of small notes, which, in his humble judgment, partook more of the character of professional astuteness than sound rational construction. In this was afforded another exemplification of the power of the paper system to pervert and bend opinion to an acquiescence in its most dangerous assumptions of authority. It overrides the law, tramples on its authority, and always has, and always will find, apologists and advocates for its most extravagant abuses.

Mr. B. said that the Administration had been censured for the present condition of the currency freely in the debate on the measure then before them. It was not just nor fair thus to charge it. If there had been a harmonious co-operation among all parties in this country in carrying into effect the important and salutary measures recommended by the late Administration on this subject; if, added to this, the great moneyed power of this country had supported instead of opposed this policy, he believed that the difficulties in its moneyed affairs which had happened would not have occurred. But instead of harmonious action among all parties for an object of so much public interest, the country had witnessed an opposition to the measures of the Administration in relation to the currency, and that opposition powerfully aided and sustained, too, by much the greater portion of the moneyed power, almost unequalled in the history of political warfare for its violence and the extraordinary means taken to break down the Administration. Was it at all strange, then, under such adverse influences, that consequences such as had followed should have happened?

Mr. B. saw, in the almost simultaneous issue of small notes, with the suspension of specie payments by the banks, but a continuation of that series of measures by which it was calculated to effect a conquest over public opinion, in favor of a national bank. Whatever may have been the pretended necessity for it, those who were instrumental in issuing small notes, knew that it would instantly drive from circulation the almost entire specie change. A parallel case with that in which the late Bank of the United States originated, would then be furnished by a universally depreciated paper currency, from the highest to the smallest denomination, for the advocates of such an institution to appeal to the public for a favorable decision. In the language of a newspaper, known as one of the organs of the National Bank party, the judgments and understandings of the people were no longer to be addressed, to bring them to their senses, but their sufferings were to be relied on to produce that result. In other words, the country was to be scourged into submission, to compel its obedience to the mandates of the moneyed power.

Mr. B. said, that while many other States were at this time suffering great evils, from having permitted the issue of small bills, the present condition of the State of North Carolina, in reference to this subject, was a practical proof of the wisdom of her legislation in having suppressed them. Some years since great evils had been experienced among her citizens, from the issue of small notes by individuals and corporations; in consequence of which, her Legislature had passed a law prohibiting it, and imposing severe penalties on those who violated it. The effect of this has been to introduce among her citizens a large portion of specie change, which was, he believed, still retained in circulation, notwithstanding the suspension of specie payments by the banks. It was true, that some inconvenience had been experienced for the want of change after that event occurred, but he was gratified that the moral sense of the people of the State was strongly opposed to the illegal issue of small notes, and was in favor of sustaining the law prohibiting a practice so injurious as well to public interests as to public morals.

The bill to suppress the circulation of small notes in this District had been denounced as one of pains and penalties against its citizens, and as particularly oppressive to the poorer class of them. Mr. B. called on gentlemen to reconcile the inconsistent charges they made against those friendly to the Administration. At one moment they were represented by them as Loco Focos and Agrarians, and now as attempting to pass a law to benefit the rich at the expense of the poor. So far from injuring the poor, he believed it would prove protective of their interests. It would relieve them from those innumerable frauds which were daily practised on the more ignorant portion of the community, by imposing on them notes issued by insolvent persons, and every kind of spurious paper.

He could not but regret the great antipathy which some gentlemen seemed to entertain towards every kind of specie currency. It had often been remarked that some peculiar constitutions had antipathies to certain objects; and he must be permitted to say, that from the sensibility exhibited in a certain quarter when gold or silver is alluded to, that they must be the objects of a kind of constitutional antipathy with some gentlemen.

Mr. B. said that he considered it not only the duty of Congress, in reference to the best interests of the citizens of this District, to legislate on this subject, but it was a high duty which it owed to the country at large, to exert all its authority to aid in redeeming it from a species of paper circulation which was an acknowledged public nuisance. I would be an example worthy the imitation of those States now suffering under a similar evil, and an example which, he trusted, would be universally followed throughout our country.

REMARKS OF MR. CILLEY,
OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, Jan. 5, 1838—On the resolutions calling for information relative to our relations with Mexico, and Great Britain.

Mr. CILLEY said he should not have troubled the House with any remarks on this occasion, but for one sentiment which had been advanced by the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, (Mr. Howard.) That gentleman had remarked, that whatever faith might be due to out-door rumors, what passed in this House went for something. And after saying much relative to the duty incumbent on our Government to maintain its neutrality, in which I entirely concurred, he gave it, as his opinion, that we ought to be peculiarly mild in pressing the settlement of our Northeastern boundary, while the present difficulties existed between the British Government and the people of Canada. Sir, in this sentiment of the honorable chairman I cannot acquiesce, nor will the feeling on the subject in my State permit the settlement of that question to be delayed on any such grounds. What, sir, is the claim of the Government of Great Britain? It is to one-third of the State of Maine. I will not now go into a history of it; suffice it to say, that during the late war, British troops were marched in the dead of winter from the lower province, on the seaboard, across the upper part of Maine to Quebec, and thus were enabled to open the campaign in the Canadas, and on our rear, long before the St. Lawrence broke up, and much to the surprise and detriment of our northern army. The discovery of this route across Maine, which, if they could not use, would, for a great part of the year, while the river St. Lawrence was locked up with ice, disconnect the upper and lower provinces, induced the British Government, while negotiating the treaty of peace at Ghent, to ask a cession of so much of the territory of Maine, then Massachusetts, as thus intervened between New Brunswick and Lower Canada. They did not ask the cession with a view to acquire territory as such, but merely for the purpose of connecting the two provinces, and left the proposition open to our commissioners to ask an equivalent. For the correctness of what I now say, I appeal to the honorable gentleman now in my eye, (Mr. Adams, of Massachusetts,) who was then one of the commissioners. The British were answered promptly by our commissioners, that they had no power to treat for the cession of a portion of the territory of one of the States of this Union. No arrangement of this kind was effected, and the boundary line, according to the treaty of '83, remained unaltered. But finding they could not obtain by cession, they had boldly and shamelessly set up a claim to it in the very face of that treaty. They claimed it because it was so convenient for them to have it; because they wanted it; and from no just cause or pretext whatever: for, sir, I will maintain, and challenge contradiction, that the treaty of 1783 was as plain and clear as language could speak, and the true boundary as obvious, nay, conspicuous, as the everlasting hills and highlands which are described as forming it, and which divided the streams which ran into the river St. Lawrence from those which descended towards the ocean. What is it, sir, that, for hundreds of miles, walls up, on the south, the great basin through which the river St. Lawrence flows? Highlands, sir; and from these, streams flow northerly into that mighty river, and southerly and easterly into the Atlantic ocean. Now these highlands, so conspicuous on the face of the earth, are our ancient and well-defined landmarks. Yet, sir, in mockery of these, in spite of a solemn treaty, the British seize possession of our soil; drive, by armed force and the terror of prisons, our citizens from it, though claiming title by deeds directly to them from two States of this Union, Maine and Massachusetts; thus keeping back our settlements, impeding the growth and prosperity of our State, and destroying our invaluable and never to be replaced forests of timber, simply and solely because they want the territory to connect their provinces.

Under this state of things, was it incumbent on this House or this nation to be so peculiarly mild in pressing the immediate settlement of this line? I admit that ours is a Government of peace; but have we not manifested a most pacific spirit? The people of Maine have been long forbearing in this matter; they have an immense interest at stake in preserving peace; one of their greatest means of prosperity, and even of livelihood, was derived from the peaceful prosecution of their commerce and their fisheries. Their interests, as well as their feelings, will not permit them thoughtlessly or wrongfully to provoke war; but they cannot submit to indignity and gross usurpation; they will not sit quiet and see their State dismembered. They had already seen the whole question of the extent of their territory submitted, against their most solemn protestations, to a foreign arbitration; and yet, though the arbitrator was held at the time by the Government of Great Britain as in the palm of its hand, shame prevented him from so manifest a violation of common honesty, as to decide against us. So he gave no award on this question, but contented himself with suggesting what he would consider a convenient boundary for the British. Both Governments have concurred that it was no decision, and have not adopted the new line that was recommended.

The Senate advised the opening a new negotiation. Our Government have tried it: how have they been met? By no corresponding spirit of conciliation on their side. Indeed, the British do the same as refuse to treat. But forbearing as my constituents are, any man would greatly mistake their character who should suppose they would ever consent to give up one-third of the territory of their State to the grasping usurpations of a foreign Government. They would never yield so much as an inch of it on such grounds. Sir, it is my opinion that it is time for this Government to be peculiarly alive on this subject; and in expressing this, I am sure I speak the sense of the people of Maine: there is no division on this question. The true course was to see and be sure we were in the right; then to be firm and resolute. Did any man believe that a British Parliament could be induced to go to war to establish a claim like that which had been set up to a part of our clearly defined territory? Where was its justice? There was none in the case. They know it, and feel it. Hence they will not treat, but hold on, on the principle that might makes right. Let our Government be firm, and the question would be settled. Maine cannot, and ought not, suffer it any longer to be postponed, on any pretext whatever. In saying this, I well know and speak the feelings of the people of Maine. I cannot, therefore, respond to the sentiments expressed by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that this was a juncture which called upon us for language of peculiar mildness and forbearance. On the contrary, when we were called to give more power to the President, to restrain our private citizens from encroachments on the rights of another Government, it was a time for us to be peculiarly firm and resolute in insisting that our territory should be kept inviolate from the most unjust encroachments of that very Government. If the territory now forcibly and exclusively occupied by British power on our northeastern frontier was a constituent part of one of the States of this Union, let an end be put to that assumption, and let the laws of Maine and this Union be made to extend over the entire territory, and to its utmost limits.

One gentleman on this floor, I regret to hear, apologized for the British in their recent violation of our sovereignty, in cutting out in the night time, with an armed force, from the American shore, the steamer Caroline, throwing her over the falls, and slaughtering our defenceless citizens. He seems to think the British commander may not be to blame.

Mr. HAMER. Does the gentleman refer to me?

Mr. CILLEY. I do.

Mr. HAMER disclaimed having made the statement on his own authority, or as having expressed his own belief. He had merely refered to what had been read by the gentleman from Buffalo, (Mr. Filmore) and what he had advanced was based on the statements then made.

Mr. CILLEY resumed. I did not understand the gentleman as expressing fully his own belief; but the tenor of his remarks were calculated to carry the conviction to my mind, that it was reasonable to conclude that this outrage was wholly unauthorized by the commander of the British forces at Chippewa, and that the British soldiery had committed the wrong of their own motion. Now, sir, I have no doubt that the outrage will be disavowed by the commander and Government. State policy may dictate this, especially when they learn the feeling it justly excites; but I must be permitted to express my own belief that the outrage was committed by the orders, and with the countenance, of the British authorities then in command. The circumstances of the case all look that way It was in keeping with the domineering spirit of British authority. They had seen the boat ply between the American side and Navy Island, where are banded together what they please to term pirates, traitors, and rebels, and robbers. They determined to take her and destroy her, utterly regardless of our rights and sovereignty in so doing. What, sir, has been the conduct of the British authorities on another, though more distant portion of our frontier? Had they not seized American citizens on our own territory, carried them off, and cast them into prison, where even one so seized is held in durance to this hour? It is easy here for gentlemen to blame the hasty zeal of those of our citizens who live upon the borders; but do they know what those men have to suffer from the violence of British authority? I admit that citizens there, as well as elsewhere, under the influence of excitement, sometimes act in a hasty and ungnarded manner, and that it becomes us, as good citizens, to maintain the neutrality of our Government. If the existing laws are insufficient for the purpose, let stronger be enacted. But it is evident, from all we have heard for years past, that a great contest is going on in the British provinces to the north of us, and that the crisis is near at hand. The people of the Canadas are unfavorable to the longer continuance of British dominion over them. They are about decreeing, if they have not already done it, as our fathers did more than half a century ago, that British oppression and usurpation shall cease among them, and that they will hereafter choose their own men to make and administer their own laws, and to control their own money. These were feelings in which American patriots were ever ready to sympathize; and no power on earth should ever compel him to suppress the feelings of his heart in favor of those who, capable of self-government, and risking all minor things, were manfully contending for the liberty to establish it. Nor do I believe that, by our citizens expressing such sentiments, we shall provoke a war with Great Britain, or any other foreign power; and least of all can we avoid war by submitting to encroachments, which, if once tolerated, will be repeated and extended with more and more audacity, and until nothing but a war can end them. No, sir: let us be firm and resolute in maintaining our just rights, and follow up the assertion of them with proper courage and conduct. In difficulties between nations, this was the true policy; and then, if war blazes up at the two extremes of our Union, or if the candle be lighted at both ends, as the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) said, we will extinguish the flame, or perish in the attempt. Sir, I hope the resolutions of inquiry will be passed, and that, when the desired information is obtained, we shall act as becomes a nation loving peace, and desiring to maintain it, which can only be done by scrupulously guarding all our just rights, and resisting all encroachments promptly and firmly.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

JANUARY 6, 1838.

The question being on Mr. MORRIS's amendment to the third resolution, declaring the freedom of speech and the press on all subjects indisputable, and under the supervision only of the State in which such freedom is exercised—

Mr. DAVIS said that he had several times briefly addressed the Senate upon this subject, which for two years or more had been greatly agitated, more so, probably, than was useful. As long ago as that, an effort was made to suppress petitions upon the subject of abolition in this body, and from thence till now the matter had received much attention at times, though both here and in the other House much regret had been expressed that it was agitated at all.

At the first session of the last Congress, after a long, animated, denunciatory debate, carried on chiefly by the members from the South, the Senate arrived at certain results in regard to abolition petitions, in which he (Mr. D.) did not concur, but a very great majority did. It was proper to recur to the state of things then, and to call to mind the sentiments of that day. The leading argument in that debate was, that the agitation of the question was a source of great danger, pregnant with ruinous consequences to the country, causing serious obstruction to the action of Congress, and great uneasiness out of doors. And it was most urgently insisted that it was one of those delicate topics which it was not safe to discuss, which, in truth, we had no right to discuss, either as regarded the States interested, or the District of Columbia or the Territories.

Such, sir, being the avowed sentiments of a majority of the Senate, they proceeded to give to them sanction and practical effect; and they did suppress debate, and close the doors against petitions; for, though they resolved to receive them, yet they immediately afterwards adopted the practice which has ever since been in force, as the journal will prove. A Senator, for example, offers a petition; another objects to the reception; the one holding the petition then moves for its reception; the other immediately moves to lay this motion on the table, which motion is not debateable, but is carried by a large majority. The consequence is, that the one presenting the petition is denied the right to lay it before the Senate, as the Senate refused to receive it. The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) was in the lead of these measures, and is it not true that he was sustained by an overwhelming majority?

Mr. CALHOUN said the course which he marked out was not followed at all.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not mean to say that the detail of the Senator's proposals was adopted, but that the Senate sustained the chief purpose he aimed at.

Mr. CALHOUN. I was in the minority in every vote on this subject. I wished to meet the petitions, and to refuse the admission of them. I wished to take higher and stronger ground. I was not averse to agitation.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not allege that the Senator was averse to agitation, but that it was generally deprecated; and that his proposed measures looked to that end, as the journal most fully proves. If the Senator had not interrupted me, he would have had no occasion to complain, or to correct me, for I was about to notice what I am aware of, that the proposed course of the member was to meet the petitioners at the door, shut it in their faces, turn them down stairs, and bid them begone; and that he urged the Senate to sustain that view of the matter. In that I know there was a failure; but in his general object, though attained by different means, he did fully succeed. He and his friends did erect a barrier as high as he could desire—a barrier insurmountable to the petitioners, and as effectual to stop agitation and debate in this chamber, and the presentation of petitions, as it could be, short of penal liabilities. Discussion died with this arbitrary rule, because the Senate yielded obedience to it. If any thing of much importance had since been said, it had escaped my observotion. I therefore repeat that the object of the Senator had been attained; the petitioners have been driven away without a hearing; no answer to their prayer has been made; no, not so much as to say they were in error. What, I would ask, could the Senator do beyond this, if the Senate yielded itself to his will?

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) said yesterday, that the States could take care of themseles, if the channel through this Government was closed up; for he feared nothing from the Abolitionists in their own territory. Did not the Senate close up this channel most effectually? Is it not choked to the top, so that nothing can reach the Senate? What higher or stronger barrier can be made? There is but one that can be more effectual, and that is, to make a law of Congress, consisting of pains and penalties. Make it felony, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for any one to petition for the abolition of slavery in this District. If there be no right to petition, and the petitioners are violators of the Constitution, disturbers of the public peace, criminal agitators, threatening the safety of the Union, then such a law will be both constitutional and expedient. Let it be brought forward, for it will test the principles advocated, and put members to vote upon a responsibility beyond a mere expression of opinion. Send such offenders against the public peace and public justice to the judicial tribunals, if such is the sense of Congress, to receive the reward of their merits. This would bear the stamp of consistency. If the doctrines which tend to such results are sound, then let them go forth in a form that shall be understood and felt. Let those who demand relief take the remedy fearlessly into their hands, and they will soon learn the views of the public on this right of petition. This would be more manly than to agitate the public with threats. It would fence the people out from the Capitol, and separate them from their own Government. It would consign offenders to infamy for presumptuously daring to approach these halls to make an humble request. The Senator has not proposed to go this length; and although he was quite right in saying he was in a minority, yet it is obvious that he effected his main object. Petitions continue to come here, but to what end? Neither to be read, heard, nor received. Not one has since come to the possession of the Senate, so as to be in order for its action; nor, under existing practice, could one come to its possession.

In this state of things, why are we appealed to for new measures, which can do no more than accomplish the same thing, if they do as much? Why does the Senator from Carolina, when so solicitous to exclude from these halls the petitions—when he has steadfastly maintained that Congress has no right to debate or act on the subject—why does he voluntarily introduce it here? A subject too delicate to agitate: one which it is said we ought not to discuss, and have no right to consider! Why, then, is discussion invited? Why is examination provoked? Why is controversy challenged?

For myself, said Mr. D. I have been disposed to respect the avowed feelings of southern Senators; and as they seemed to deprecate discussion as a calamity, I have avoided it, leaving it in the hands of the mover and those interested. I had no purpose of changing my course till that Senator, yesterday, threw down the glove, and challenged discussion, in terms which almost made it dishonorable to forbear. This challenge, and this alone, has induced me to rise, for I had resolved that the Senator should be left free to act upon the majority, which goes with him, with whatever power he might, while he adhered to abolition, although my own constituents have written to me inviting my attention to these resolutions; not because of their effect upon the Abolitionists, but because they embrace other matters of high moment and of objectionable character. I would have taken the hazard of disregarding these calls upon me, but I could not be silent under the challenge of the Senator.

The Senator says we can bring no objection against his resolutions while we vote against them, inferring from our silence that we vote in a blind and senseless manner. I deem his inference, from his premises, wholly unwarranted, for the larger portion of the votes we give are recorded without offering the reasons to the Senate upon which they rest. But I have many objections to these resolutions, more than I shall find physical ability to express, and the strongest of those objections are to their political character.

They are not called for, are not more efficient than the measures now in force, and can do no good. They are, as has been well said, (a part of them at least,) mere abstractions or avowals of abstract doctrines no way demanded by the occasion. They embrace matters having no connection with abolition, and call upon us to commit ourselves to an interpretation of the Constitution when there is no emergency arising in the course of our public duty requiring us to give interpretation to that instrument. It is an unnecessary attempt to influence the public judgment, and such works of supererogation are best let alone. Any and all these reasons are a most ample justification for voting against even that which may seem to be right in the abstract; for I would give no countenance to making a creed of avowals for politicians, and to the publication by the Senate of abstract opinions, merely because they may contain apparent truisms. They ought also to be useful, and put forth for some useful public purpose. The Senate would be foolishly employed to resolve that two added to two make four.

But, sir, the leading reason urged for disposing of the whole abolition matter is, that the agitation of the topic disturbs the public harmony and endangers the Union. I am quite disposed to respect all such fears and apprehensions, when urged with seriousness; to listen to public sentiment, and to yield much to public judgment; and, sir, I am happy to perceive that the thought now and then flashes across the minds of gentlemen that there are two ends to this Union, both of which should fall under the protection and paternal regard of this Government. We are the representatives of the whole, and our affections and watchfulness should be commensurate with the whole. It is our duty to see that the whole Republic is safe. All interests must be regarded, all rights must be protected. We must look to public sentiment throughout. No interest, because it is great and powerful, should be permitted to absorb all public attention, or to cause a disregard of those of less importance. All must be nourished, all respected, the rights of all so adjusted and harmonized by a spirit of compromise and conciliation as to remove all just cause of discontent. This is the way to preserve the Union. And yet, from the course of argument here, one is sometimes doubtful whether more than one end of the Union is thought of, when all our vigilance, anxiety, and affection, is demanded for that end alone. The resolutions before us propose no measures for the general harmony, but to give certain interpolations to the Constitution favorable to the slave interest. This is to avoid the dissolution of the Union. I cannot see how the end is to be reached by the means, and therefore am constrained to come to the conclusion that matters other than abolition are wrapped up in these resolutions.

Who is most likely to be discontented and to disturb public harmony—those that hold the direction of political power, or those who have no power except the force of argument?

I wish to ask you, sir, what your recollections are in regard to the history of public policy. You have probably for the last thirty years been a witness and participator in what has occurred here, and your memory can go much beyond that. You know what has been the public feeling on the subject of the integrity of the Union, and what kind of a reputation those have acquired who have been suspected only of agitating this alarming topic. How stands the Hartford Convention in public estimation? How other conventions and assemblies of men of more recent date, who were supposed to meditate unfriendly feelings to the Union? All hostility to the Union has at at all times been viewed by the great body of the people with the most profound sorrow and regret. Those, therefore, who engage in such treasonable purposes, do it at the imminent hazard of character at least, for they acquire a very unenviable reputation.

The Abolitionists can have no motive to dissolve the Union. They have never been charged with such an object, to my knowledge. Their acts may create alarm and discontent, which may tend to that. There may be selfish men among them, for the ambitious always mould the moving elements, when they can, to aid their own selfish purposes. It would not be singular if such were found among them, but their number cannot be great. But how is the Abolitionist to be profited, if his wishes are all realized? If all the slaves on the globe were made free, how will it mend his condition? In no way whatever. He can gain nothing by the change. But they repudiate, and very properly, all right to interfere with the States, and confine themselves to the Territories and the District of Columbia. Their views are thus limited in extent, and to the attainment of an object in which they neither have nor can have any interest which excites a selfish feeling, and which does not, in fact, touch the Union, or threaten it.

The worst, then, which can be said if them, by their bitterest enemies, is what is actually said: they are deluded, misguided philanthropists, fanatics—heated with an unbecoming zeal. These, and such opprobrious epithets, have been applied to them; but no one affirms that they aim at disunion, nor do I think any one can impute to them any corrupt purpose. I do not mean to touch the question of the expediency of their course in asking for immediate abolition in this District. That I will meet whenever the Senate will open it by receiving their petitions, but not until then; for the right of petition is the higher right, and must first be vindicated. I shall, however, at all times go for the Union, and the whole Union; and against the Abolitionists if they propose to interfere with constitutional rights or guaranties.

But I again return to the inquiry, who is to dissolve the Union? There cannot, I trust, be such purpose here, for every day we hear the thought deprecated, and the deprecation mingled with the most ardent patriotic professions of love and attachment to the Constitution.

Is the great slave interest to do it? I appeal again to your recollections, and to those of the Senator from South Carolina, and ask you whether an interest, so powerful as to have majorities in both Houses, and to maintain its ascendancy in the Government, is likely to have occasion to secede from the Union through fear or oppression? Sir, this interest has ruled the destinies of the Republic. For forty years out of forty-eight years it has given as a President from its own territory, and of its own selection. I do not advert to this in the tone of complaint, for it has been done at the ballot-box; but as a proof of its great strength, tact, and skill, and of the extraordinary predominance it holds over all other interests, bending and shaping them to its purposes. During all this time it has not only had a President sustaining its own peculiar views of public policy, but through him has held and used, in its own way, the whole organization of all the Departments, and all the vast and controlling patronage incident to that office, to aid it, and carry out it its views and policy, as well as to protect it and secure to it every advantage.

Let us explore a little further, sir, and see how the Houses of Congress have been organized. I am sorry that I rely on memory alone, for I may possibly fall into error; but I shall be, I think, right as far as I go; if not, the records can easily be had to correct me. For thirty years out of thirty-six years, that interest has placed its own Speaker in the Chair of the other House, thus securing the organization of committees, and the great influence of that station. And, sir, while all other interests have, during part of that time, had the Chair in which you preside assigned to them, as an equivalent for these great concessions, yet in each year, when a president pro tem. is elected, who, upon the contingencies mentioned in the Constitution, will be the President of the United States, ha! interest has invariably given us this officer. Look, I beseech you, through all the places of honor, of profit, and of privilege, and there you will find the representatives of this interest in numbers that indicate its influence. Does not, then, this interest hold the destinies of this Republic in its own hands? Does it not rule, guide, and adapt, public policy to its own views, and fit it to suit the action and products of its own labor? Sir, I know that the politicians of the slave country sometimes disagree about men and measures of minor consideration; but, on the great interest of slave labor and the protection of slave property, they stand firmly together, and, like a Macedonian phalanx, shoulder to shoulder, gather round it, and, by mighty and concerted efforts, give it the lead in public affairs against all opposition. Sir, how can I better explain its all-pervading influence, than to declare again that it moves this Government over fifteen millions of souls, great and energetic as it is, and disproportionate as is the slaveholding population to that of the free States.

With this mighty power in your hands, with proof at every vote taken in this Capitol of your ability to continue it, can you of this interest entertain apprehensions for your safety? What more do you claim? What more can you have? How can those who hold power be oppressed by those who have none? How can those who hold the power of this Government fear it? I cannot believe there is occasion in the mind of any one belonging to this interest for a dissolution of the Union, unless he be ambitious, unprincipled, and without hope of advancement. It will be reasonable enough to meet danger from other quarters when it threatens mischief. But, Mr. President, I must not omit some other proofs of the towering magnitude of the slave interest here. It claims to itself and its exertion whatever of merit there is in the overthrow of the policy of internal improvements, and of having broken down and rendered unpopular the policy of so assessing and collecting the public revenue as to protect and encourage free labor. Over this last great interest it claims a signal triumph for having defeated it.

I need not multiply proofs of the zeal, activity, and singular success of those who manage this interest. The integrity of the Union is probably quite as important to the slave territory as to the free. I cannot, therefore, credit the suggestion that the people of the South are so blinded to their interests as to court so calamitous a result. What then is it that shakes this great republic so that it reels upon its foundations: so that we are brought to a solemn pause here in the public business, and are gravely and solemnly devising remedies to redeem us from threatened ruin? Sir, we have a set of resolutions, nearly concocted, that are to go forth with healing power to calm the public mind, to allay the outbreakings of fanaticism, and to tranquilize the raging elements. The opinion of the majority of the Senate is to work out this extraordinary result. But I again ask, what is it that we are contending with? What that threatens calamity, and is thus easily to be subdued. It is the Abolitionists who come here in no very alarming numbers, though the course pursued here has increased the aggregate, not to threaten the Government or to menace the Union; no, sir, not at all; but humbly to entreat and pray you to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, where, I believe, there are about forty thousand people of all colors. Sir, they have claimed nothing but the right to beg and pray of the Senate to use its power for this purpose? What more humble and less objectionable right can be claimed by man than the right of respectfully entreating? Yet, sir, the exercise of this poor privilege, by persons mostly females too, has brought us into grave deliberation, to rescue the Union from impending dissolution. Sir, I cannot participate in these fears, nor persuade myself that such causes will produce such results, or that the Union will be attacked unless the provocation is given here.

These Abolitionists are in the free States. It has often been said, and was a day or two past reiterated by the Senator from Missouri (Mr. Benton) that their books, papers, prints, etc. cannot enter the slave country, and therefore would do no harm there, even if the slaves could read, as they never can reach them. It seemed also to be admitted by the Senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) that there is no objection to the discussion of the subject in a State that permits it to be agitated. Where, then, is the alarming mischief? What creates the great excitement spoken of as existing in the slave territory, and which I doubt not does exist? The exciting matter is the debates published from this Capitol; the exaggerated and highly colored pictures of danger dawn here. The evil is chargeable home here, and the responsibility rests here. The effect was clearly foreseen, and the result foretold. It is but the natural progress of events that the excitement of the people should react upon Congress; and I agree to the sentiment often expressed here, that this topic, agitated in this place in the manner it is, disturbs the public tranquillity, and the practice ought to subside unless the matter can be treated more temperately. There would probably be no excitement among the slaveholders if it was not roused here; and there would be less here, if the flame kindled elsewhere by the breath of these halls did not impart its warmth to this body.

But, sir, I return to the inquiry, what is to be hoped from these resolutions? Where are their healing properties, their power to assuage resentments, and to allay irritated passions? Are we now agitating the matter to any useful purpose? I read them, and while a part of them seemed to me to contain certain doctrines on slavery according with the sentiments of the mover, the residue seemed to be a mere avowal of a political creed. Not being quite certain that I was right in the matter, I was confirmed when my friend from Delaware (Mr. Bayard) rose and expressed the same sentiment. They professed to treat of abolition, but the worthy Senator declared that, on lifting the veil, he had discovered nullification concealed under the first of the series. He pointed the little fellow out to us hidden snugly under a thin covering of State right gauze.

Now, sir, I ask the Senate to look at that resolution. It is in these words:

"Resolved, That in the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the States adopting the same acted, severally, as free, independent, and sovereign States; and that each, for itself, by its own voluntary assent, entered the Union with the view to its increased security against all dangers, domestic as well as foreign, and the more perfect and secure enjoyment of its advantages, natural, political, and social."

And to inquire whether it has any apparent connection with the abolition of slavery. The mover has already been asked what he meant by this resolution? How it is pertinent or applicable to the matter in hand. What was his answer? Did he say it was to allay excitement, to suppress debate, or to check petitions? No, nothing of this—but he did, in substance, affirm that it was introduced as a sort of constitutional platform, upon which, as a newly discovered footing, the Senate were to gather together and stand at this momentous crisis. The Constitution itself, without Senatorial amendments, is broad enough and good enough for me to stand upon. Sir, there have been many platforms, creeds, and confessions of faith, all of which are designed to die down freedom of thought and action, and which in general I do not believe have subserved any valuable purposes. They are designed to carry out particular doctrines, and so the Senator from Carolina avers in regard to his. He says it embraces the doctrine of '98, and it is expedient occasionally to reiterate fundamental principles. Magna Charta was reaffirmed, and hence the propriety, even upon this occasion, to reiterate and reaffirm the fundamentals of the doctrine of '98.

What, sir, is the doctrine of '98. The Senator has had some bitter experience in this matter. He knows where it led him; he knows what results he has contended for under its authority, and he knows that many others, now on this floor, who claim to respect with equal deference the doctrines of '98, travelled paths widely divergent from his; paths so opposed that they led to sharp, bitter, and alarming conflict. This ought to teach the Senator not only the folly, but the danger, of putting forth abstract theories upon the Constitution.

But the Senator advances this theory because it contains the only conservative principle—the only remedy for the slave States. And what is that conservative principle, and what the remedy? The Senator from Delaware, in giving definition of the meaning of the resolution, solved, perhaps without designing it, this principle and remedy. The mover's view of States rights is, as I understood them, that the United States are confederated corporations; each a party to the Constitution in the nature of a treaty or confederation; and when this Government, or perhaps one of the States, in the judgment of a State, shall violate this compact, it may declare the whole contract void, because it has been broken, and cease to observe it with the same freedom and upon the same principles that one nation declares a treaty null because the other party, in its opinion, has violated it. This must be the remedy—the right to recede from the Union when a State sees cause; and what is this but nullification? The resolution is capable of two constructions: one to bear out the Senator's view; the other the view of those who hold to a different construction of the Constitution, and still call themselves State rights politicians. But what advantage can there be in avowing an opinion that can only excite controversy about its meaning. It is futile to attempt to make the Constitution broader or narrower, for we have no power to add or diminish. We may sanction puzzling theories about the probable intention of the United States, but the Constitution must and will speak for itself, be the opinions of this Senate what they may. The public will look upon such acts as they are—unnecessary, and obligatory upon nobody, as mere attempts to give direction to the public judgment.

Sir, I ask the Senator and the Senate to read the preamble to the Constitution, which I now bring to their attention:

"We, the People of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America,"

And compare it with this first resolution; observe its unequivocal language, "we, the people," etc. instead of the States, as corporations, and see how they will stand together. But, sir, I will not dwell on this matter, which has been again and again argued by the best talent in the country. I care not whether the Constitution was made by the States, as corporations, or otherwise; it makes no provision for nullification; gives no countenance to it, but leaves it to stand on such theories as human invention has brought to its aid. I am in no respect disposed to revive it, since it has met with signal public condemnation, and therefore shall vote against all abstractions where its seed is sown. It is no part of my duty to sit here forming creeds and confessions of faith for the purpose of experimenting upon public opinion. The people, I hope, will think and act for themselves, and will be too wise to entangle their understandings in the meshes of politicians.

What is the second resolution? It seems designed to point out the duties of the States towards one another in regard to their domestic institutions, and the duty of this Government to protect each State in the enjoyment of all such domestic institutions, and to restrain such States as assail those of other States. This country stretches through a wide space of the earth—embraces twenty-six States—some almost under a vertical sun, while others are in the region of frost. These domestic institutions, we all know, must be various, and different under different circumstances. Those, for example, suited to Louisiana, will be ill fitted for Vermont. The views of different States upon the necessity, character, and expediency of domestic institutions will always conflict, and our organization was designed for that very purpose. The right of speech, the freedom of the press, the liberty of discussion, are domestic institutions; and are we to be restrained in the exercise of any of these precious rights, because others differ from us in opinion, and may hold our reasoning against their institutions injurious? These matters all belong to the States: and it lies with them to regulate them at pleasure, and without reference to the views or opinions of other States. If the design is to clothe this Government with power to abridge the privileges of the States, then the Senate can exercise no such authority, and had better pause before it acts.

But, sir, I must bring my remarks to a close, as the state of my health will not permit me to proceed. I intended to have examined the character of these resolutions more in detail, and to state more fully my objections; but I must forbear. I cannot, however, sit down, without asking the Senator from South Carolina again—why he incorporates political doctrines with this matter—why he mingles with slavery the annexation of Texas to the United States? He says we must go back to elementary principles, to fundamentals. Go back from where, and what are we to go to? Sir, both you and the Senator participated, but with quite different sentiments, in that act of this Government sometimes called the Force bill; and each of you had your opinions upon that celebrated paper called the Proclamation. You were then arrayed against each other. The Senator is about to go back, and asks the Senate to go with him; and they do go with him, but where from, and where to? He cannot be going to the Force bill, or the Proclamation; and doubtless he considers the Senate as going from them, back to what? I have endeavored to show the character of the first resolution, and the construction which may be put upon it. It may possibly be considered an attempt to renew a creed which the Force bill and the Proclamation had rendered of doubtful authority. For myself, I had little sympathy with those who so much lauded the Proclamation, or so much condemned the bill. The quarrel was between parts of the same States rights party. Having drawn the attention of the Senate to the use which I fear may be made in the country of this resolution, I shall not at this time proceed further.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed a hope that, as Mr. Davis was now (from indisposition) too much exhausted to continue his remarks, the Senate would adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS replied that he should be glad to submit some further remarks, but could not proceed now, and would not request the Senate to stop the progress of business on that account.

Two divisions were then had on the adjournment, when the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS then resumed his seat.

Mr. CALHOUN rose and said, that before he should notice such observations of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Davis) as he deemed pertinent to the question before the Senate, he felt it a duty which he owed to himself, to state distinctly the position which he had heretofore held in relation to the subject of these resolutions. It is not true, as the Senator supposes, that my views in relation to the proper course to be taken have prevailed. It is just the reverse. Mr. C. said he had, he believed, been in a standing minority from the time the subject of abolition was first agitated in this body till the introduction of these resolutions; and, although he had steadily objected to the reception of any abolition petitions, so far from taking a lead in laying them on the table, as the Senator stated, he had not, in a single instance, made such a motion. He was, on the contrary, wholly opposed to the course. He had never doubted the folly of the position, that we were bound to receive petitions, but might lay them immediately on the table, without consideration or discussion. In the original debate, he told the Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Buchanan,) who took a lead in favor of that course, that it was utterly indefensible, and that the reasons he (Mr. B.) assigned to prove that we were bound to receive, would be equally cogent to show that we were bound to refer, report on, discuss, and decide on them. He also told him what would be the consequences of his false position, all of which have already been realized. The Senator from Kentucky has already taken the precise ground which he foretold would be taken. Nor is the Senator less mistaken in supposing that he has been opposed to the discussion of the subject. He has, it is true, been utterly and unalterably opposed to any discussion with the Abolitionists. They have no right to come here, and he was and is for shutting the door in their face; but he never shunned discussion when the subject came fairly up, nor would he, so long as the Senator's constituents and others continue to agitate the subject; in proof of which, he referred the Senator to the course he adopted in relation to the President's Message, some years since, on the circulation of incendiary publications through the mail. So far from avoiding discussion, he raised a special committee on that portion of the Message, made a full report adverse to the President's views, accompanied by a bill, which gave rise to much discussion. So now, acting on the same principle, he had presented these resolutions as the antagonist of the Vermont resolutions. He touched on these misapprehensions of the Senator as to his course, the more fully, as there appeared to be a fixed determination of late, both in and out of this Chamber, to mistake his course on this as well as other occasions.

But this is not the only instance of the misstatement of his course by the Senator. He has misapprehended it as much in relation to the subject immediately under discussion. Assuming, erroneously, as he had shown, that his position had been that Congress has no right to agitate or discuss this subject, however presented, he accuses him (Mr. C.) of challenging debate on the present occasion, and says that he (Mr. D.) would have remained silent had it not been for his challenge. The Senator greatly mistakes in supposing he had made any such challenge, and he thought it would puzzle him to state when and in what terms it was given. It is true, he stated, that the political creed of the Senator, and those who thought with him, in reference to the origin and structure of our Government, so far from affording any constitutional protection against the assaults of the Abolitionists, had roused their fanatical spirit into action; and he had, at the same time, called on the party generally who entertained it, to show, if he was in a mistake as to the effect of their creed, what protection it afforded. If the Senator has construed this into a challenge to discuss these resolutions, he must say he has most signally failed to meet it. He has wholly shunned the point on which it was given. He has not even attempted to show that the view which he and his party take of the Constitution can afford the least protection against the dangers which now so seriously menace the country and its institutions. His silence he had a right to consider as conclusive proof of the truth of his assertion, and the Senator ought not to be surprised if, after this tacit confession, he should turn to those who entertained the opposite constitutional views, and call on them exclusively to rally to the rescue at this hour of danger. The Senator was so conscious of his weakness on this point, that instead of attempting to point out a remedy, when his political theory afforded none, he took the opposite course, to deny that there was any danger to be repelled. He told us, gravely, that the Abolitionists were no Disunionists; that they had no ambitious objects; no corrupt purpose; that they repudiated all interference with the States; that they only aimed to abolish slavery in the Territories and in this District, where there were not more than 2,000 slaves; and that they claimed no right, but to beg you to grant them the innocent and harmless boon they craved, (of cutting our throats and burning our houses,) and that these beggars were but a handful, of whom a large portion were females. Such is the picture which he gives of this small band of innocents, and the harmless motives that actuate them; and this, in the face of the constant, uniform, and open avowal, that their object is the total abolition of slavery in the States, as well as in this District and the Territories, and that they consider the abolition in the latter but as the first step to abolition in the former.

But he had received a letter that very morning from one of the fraternity, of high standing and authority, which gave a very different account of this small corps of humble beggars. He says that they count 1,500 societies, averaging 100 individuals each, and are growing at the rate of one society a day. Here, then, we have 150,000 persons regularly organized, with a copious revenue, and an extensive and powerful press, (a large portion of whom are the Senator's constituents) who are waging regular war on the institutions of the southern and western States; institutions that involve not less than $900,000,000 of property, and the prosperity and safety of an entire section of this Union, in violation of the most solemnly plighted faith, and subversion of the fundamental principles of the Constitution; and yet the Senator can see neither harm nor danger in all this. When we see one of his enlightened understanding, and usually correct sentiments, thus thinking and feeling, what must be the tone of those with whom he is daily associated, which could so blind his understanding and blunt his moral perception?

He next tells us that the Abolitionists can do no harm; that their publications cannot circulate in the slaveholding States, and can do no mischief in the non-slaveholding States; that the evil exists here, where too much excitement exists; and that if we would keep perfectly cool and patient, and hear ourselves and constituents called robbers and murderers, and our rights and property and lives attacked, without moving hand or tongue, all would be well. Accustomed, as he has been, to respect the Senator for his sober and correct judgment and feelings on most subjects, he could not but be surprised at the language which he has held on the present occasion. Is his judgment so perverted that he can see no danger to the Constitution and the Union, for which he professes, and, he doubted not, sincerely, to have so much regard, in the thousands of publications and lectures which are daily issued and delivered, holding up, in the blackest colors, the character and institutions of nearly one-half of the Union; exciting towards them the deepest feelings of abhorrence, to be returned, on their part, with a detestation not less deep? Is the universal spread of this deep, mutual abhorrence, compatible with the existence of the Union? If not, is it not time to arrest it, and, of course, to deliberate on the means of doing it? Are the Senator's reason and feelings so far warped, that he either cannot apprehend the plainest consequences, or, apprehending, is indifferent to them?

But we are next told, for the hundreth time, that these are mere abstract propositions, and not demanded by the occasion; on which account, with various other reasons that he assigns, he cannot vote for them.

It was, he would suppose, perfectly needless for the Senator to assign any reason for voting against these resolutions, or any other measure having the same object in view, after what he had told us of the Abolitionists, and the purity and harmlessness of their objects; nor is it at all surprising that he should think that there was no necessity for their introduction. But those who regard the subject in a different light, who see danger where the Senator sees nothing to apprehend, and crime where he beholds innocence, will come to a very different conclusion. They will think it high time that this body should define its position; should declare its opinion as to those unprovoked assaults of one portion of the Union on the other, and take the stand it intends to maintain in resistance to them; and that the opposite course—to remain silent, or tamper with the disease, is neither becoming its dignity nor its duty.

As to what the Senator has thought proper to say about the secret mischief lurking under these resolutions, about nullification and his (Mr. C's) bitter experience in relation to it, he understands his object to be to distract and draw off attention from the real point at issue, and he does not deem it deserving reply. He will pass it in silence, with a single remark. The experience of nullification is indeed bitter; not to those who applied the remedy, and freed themselves from a disease that was preying on the vitals of the Constitution and the South, but to those against whom it was applied, and who were fattening on the industry of the rest of the community. He would tell the Senator that the bitter terms with which he and others of his creed have denounced it, will only serve to endear it to those of an opposite political faith, and, instead of putting it down, give to it new vigor and growth.

The Senator asks, why mingle abolition with political matters? Why with the Texas question? He knew not how to reconcile such questions with the respect which he has entertained for the Senator's intelligence and fairness. Does not the Senator know that we have received hundreds of petitions, and that they continue daily to pour in on us in one incessant stream, praying that Texas may not be admitted, on the ground that it would extend the limits of the slaveholding portion of the Union? Does he not know that a sovereign State of the Union has come here with its resolutions objecting to the annexation on the same ground? Does he not know that the entire movement on abolition, with the object proposed to be effected, and the means by which it is to be done, involves political and constitutional questions and considerations of the highest possible magnitude, vital to the peace and safety of all? Knowing all this, with what propriety could he ask me the questions he did? Does he wish to shift the burden, by making those who repel, and not those who assail, responsible? Does he wish to transfer the odium from those who make war on our rights and property, to us, who defend them, and this, too, in the face of the most notorious facts?

As brief as has been his notice of the Senator's apology for the Abolitionists, (for such he must consider his speech,) it is much longer than he would have made it, had it not been for the respect which he has had for his talents and character. He cannot consider the course he has pursued in his speech as indicative of his actual feelings and fairness, and is compelled to regard it as indicative of the distempered state of the public sentiment of those he represented. Thus viewed, it affords an important lesson to those he represented. Throughout, not a censure of the Abolitionists is whispered. All is excuse, defence, apology. It is we, not they, who are the agitators; it is we, not they, who are the disturbers of the peace and quiet of the country; it is we, not they, who are the assailants; it is we, not they, who harbor ambitious and improper designs; and, finally, it is we, not they, who meditate disunion. It is no crime to attack us, but a heinous offence in us to defend ourselves.

Mr. NILES said he had taken no part in this debate, and from the first, had no desire to do so; and from the course it had taken, that purpose was by no means weakened, so far as respected any general discussion of the various questions which had been brought into consideration. It might, however, be proper for him to say a few words in explanation of his own course. He felt that the resolutions before the Senate had placed himself and some others in a delicate situation; he was, and ever had been, decidedly opposed to the agitation of this subject in Congress, in any form; he was opposed to its discussion here, believing that it would tend to increase the evil which it was designed to remove. But it has been brought before us, and we are compelled to act upon it; and however he might regret that the question had been brought up, unnecessarily as it appeared to him, he should vote on the several propositions according to his sense of duty to his constituents and the country.

The manner of treating this delicate question was, in his opinion, of some importance, as well as the proceedings or measures which may be adopted. In this respect he thought the course pursued had not been judicious, and, he feared, was not calculated to have a beneficial influence on public sentiment. What is the object of these resolutions, and what end is to be answered by them? This question he regarded as quite as important as that of the correctness and propriety of the resolutions themselves. The object, he considered, was to attempt to quiet the public mind, and stop the spread of the spirit of Abolitionism. He was aware it was said by some gentlemen, that these resolutions were mere abstractions, not connected with any subject before the Senate; that they could have no other purpose than to obtain the opinion of the Senate on certain abstract principles or truths, which were to have no practical application whatever. He did not view the matter in that light; he did not consider these resolutions as a mere attempt to settle abstract constitutional questions, or to establish political creeds, or what the Senator from Massachusetts calls a platform. He had as little faith in the efficacy of platforms, whether in politics or religion, as that gentleman; platforms were generally found either too narrow or too broad, too short or too long, or in some way defective, so as to want, from time to time, altering or repairing; and in stopping one defect, a worse one may be occasioned.

If he viewed these resolutions in this light, as several Senators over the way appeared to do, he would not be for entertaining them a single moment. He would not waste the time of the Senate in discussing mere abstract propositions, no way connected with any subject before it. But he regarded the resolutions as applicable to a subject which was before us: he considered them as an answer to the petitions, memorials, and resolutions which had been presented to the Senate, praying for the abolition of slavery in this District, in the Territories, and the prohibition of the trade in slaves between the States of this Union. These resolutions are intended to present the sense of this body on those subjects which have been brought before us. Considering them in this light, he did not think they had come before the Senate in the right way. If we are to respond to those memorials, it would, in his humble opinion, have been more respectful to the petitioners, and more proper in itself, to have had them referred to some committee, and to have had these resolutions, if they are the proper answer, reported by such committee. He had not been so fortunate as to agree with the majority as to the mode of disposing of those petitions. He was disposed to maintain the right of petition to its full extent. If these resolutions had come from a special committee raised for the purpose, he should have been better satisfied; and, with these feelings, he regretted that the motion made yesterday to refer the whole subject to a special committee, was withdrawn. He had another objection: they came from the South, and would be considered by some as containing the Southern view of this question, and that other Senators, from political or other considerations, were induced to vote for them.

These were his objections to the expediency and the form of these proceedings; but he had a few remarks to offer upon the resolutions themselves. They are here, whether properly or not, and we are called on to decide upon them; and when we arrive at that point, they ought to stand or fall upon their own merits. They are objected to on several grounds: first, as being mere abstractions, having no practical bearing; and if by this is meant that they are, if adopted, to have no operation on the rights of any one, this objection is correct. But he would not add to what he had said on that point. They are also objected to on the ground of their having a double aspect—one political, the other having reference to the abolition question. Some gentlemen think that they are altogether unsound and dangerous, as the affirmation of a political creed. They think they discover a lurking treason in them, or a squinting towards nullification. Remove the veil, says the Senator from Massachusetts, and you discover that little thing called nullification. It is also said that the political principles in the resolutions are in no way necessary, relevant, or proper, so far as respects the subject of Abolitionism, which is the professed object of the resolutions.

Mr. N. said these objections had no great force on his mind. So far as the resolutions embraced political principles he had no difficulty; he believed them to be sound and just. They contained a brief exposition of the true theory of our Government; there was nothing new in them; their doctrines were those of the old Republican school of '98, which he regarded as the true interpretation of the Constitution; the doctrines of State rights, which were the true principles of union and liberty. They had stood the test of public opinion and of public scrutiny, in every way and form, for nearly half a century, and he thought it rather too late to call them in question now. These doctrines, he verily believed, formed the only basis on which union and liberty could be maintained together. If, in the infancy of the Confederacy, these principles were deemed just, and the only bulwark against consolidation, the experience of the last forty years has added immeasurable weight to the conviction by which they were then sustained. This Government has exhibited a steady tendency towards consolidation; and this tendency, whilst is is constantly impairing the rights of the States, is the source of greatest danger to the Union. But it is said that the political features of these resolutions, whether right or wrong, are irrelevant, and have nothing to do with their avowed object. He thought very differently. Petitions are before the Senate, asking us to abolish slavery in this District, and to prohibit the slave trade between the States. We present these resolutions as an answer to these requests. We hold up the mirror of the Constitution, that the petitioners and all others may see the objections and difficulties existing in the very theory and nature of the Government—that they may see that some of the objects prayed for are directly in conflict with the Constitution, and that others have a direct and necessary tendency to disturb the Union. Sir, said Mr. N. is it not apparent that false views in regard to the true theory and nature of our Government lies at the foundation of all abolition proceedings. He referred to the prime agents and agitators of this matter, rather than to those who were petitioners for the abolition of slavery in this District. The designs of these agitators are not confined to this District; we have evidence before us that they are not; they are praying for the prohibition of the trade in slaves; they are already directly interfering with this matter within the States. These unfortunate men who, I fear, are to be the disturbers of their country's peace, view this subject in a religious rather than a political or civil aspect. They regard slavery as a moral evil; as a sin in the sight of God, which they are in conscience bound to set their faces against and to attempt to extirpate. They profess to regard this as a moral and religious duty, and that to neglect it would be to bring guilt upon their own souls. Does not this show that they consider themselves in some sense responsible for what they regard as a crime, which must proceed from the consideration that we are one people, one community, for local as well as general purposes? These men mostly belong to the clergy, who, with many honorable exceptions, are, of all men, the most liable to fall into error on this subject. Their course of reading, reflections, associations, and duties, all tend to lead them into error in regard to the nature of our Government and political and social rights. If they do not entertain erroneous views on this subject, why do they confine their efforts to slavery in the United States? Is there no slavery elsewhere? Why do they not give their attention to Cuba and the islands lying along upon our coast? Does not slavery exist there? and is it not known to be much more cruel, severe, and oppressive? Who has ever heard of the exertions of Abolitionists to abolish slavery in the Island of Cuba? Depend upon it, sir, these fanatics act under an impression that they are in some respect responsible for the existence of slavery in the United States, because they are citizens of the same country and belong to the same general community. These resolutions present this subject in its true light; they hold up the States as separate and independent communities, except for a few general purposes; as much separate and distinct in all their concerns and institutions purely local, as though the Union did not exist; as much separate and distinct as these States are from Canada, or Cuba or Mexico. A citizen of Vermont has no more right to interfere with the subject of slavery in South Carolina, than a citizen of Canada. Is there not reason to believe that there is much delusion on this subject? At any rate, if we are to act on this subject, what better can be done than to hold up to view the true relation in which the citizens of one State stand to those of another? which, it would seem, must convince every person who was under the slightest influence of reason, of the manifest impropriety of the citizens of one distinct independent community interfering in any way, directly or indirectly, in the civil and domestic concerns and interests of the people of another separate and independent community.

Mr. N. said he would briefly notice the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts touching the danger of the abolition excitement. He appears to think that no evil is to be apprehended from it, and, if let alone, it will subside. He (Mr. N.) had heretofore entertained the same sentiments; he had hoped and believed that this excitement would pass off; but, at the present time, he felt bound to say that he had doubts and fears. He should consider himself as faithless to his trust, were he to cry peace, peace, when he had reason to fear there would be no peace, so far as this question could interrupt it. With errors at both ends of the Union, and unwise counsels here, (for he could not approve of the course which had usually been pursued in relation to this matter,) he could not but fear this was a subject pregnant with momentous consequences. That the abolition spirit is spreading could not be denied; and, what is more alarming, it is connecting itself with the politics of the day. What is the source of danger from Abolitionism? The Senator from South Carolina has alluded to the true source of the danger, but he has not fully developed it. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Davis) seems to think that there is no danger, and asks what force can be brought against the Union? He says the South is always united; that it presents a solid phalanx; whilst the North is weakened by divisions; and that in consequence of this, the South has always had a controlling influence in this Government; that it has defeated the internal improvement and other systems of policy. Mr. N. was not disposed to go into this inquiry; he knew that each section of the Union always claimed that its influence was less than it should be, and that the controlling power of the Government resided in some other quarter. The South claimed to be the weaker section, and the gentleman must admit that some measures had been sustained, and long persisted in, against the feelings, and as they believed, against the interests of the South: he alluded to the high tariff system, of which the Senator had been so prominent a supporter. The South were at this time as much divided on other questions as other sections; but they were united on the subject of slavery; they could not be otherwise; they had a common interest and must have a common destiny; and this, whilst it may add to their security, increased the danger to the Union, if the citizens of the North persisted in interfering in their local and domestic concerns; if they persist in using or perverting that sort of connection which the Union creates, to purposes which it does not authorize, and never intended, to the intermeddling in matters and interests which belong exclusively to the people of each State to manage in their own way, as much as if the Union had never existed.

But, sir, what is the real source of danger? We are told that no force can be brought against the Union or the South. This is true, sir; the danger is not from force. What is the strength of this Government, and of this Union? Is it force? Is it backed and sustained by your army and navy; your militia, or other military establishments? Far from it: that is not the design of those national institutions The strength of this Union, of this Government, is public opinion. This is its only abiding foundation; the rock on which it rests, or upon which it must founder. As long as that remains sound, we have nothing to fear, and hence we discover the danger from the movements and apparent designs of the Abolitionists. Are not all their efforts directly calculated to poison public sentiment? Are they not calculated to alienate the opinions and feelings of the people of one section of the Union from those of another? If their schemes are persisted in, is there not reason to fear that feelings will be engendered in both ends of the Union, hostile to each other and the Union itself? Does any one suppose that this Confederacy of States can be preserved with public sentiment hostile to it; with feelings unfriendly and hostile between the people of the two extremities Does any one supppose it can be maintained when the time arrives (but he hoped it would never arrive) when the entire population of one section of the country, comprising nearly half the States, become fully and deeply impressed with the solemn conviction that the Union, instead of adding to their security, is the fruitful source of danger to their domestic institutions, their property, their peace, and their lives? He must know little of the nature of this Government, and little of human nature, who can entertain such an opinion. Sir, the strength of this Union is in the hearts and affections of the people; in a settled, abiding conviction, that it is a source of security, a benefit, a blessing, to all parties to it. When this sentiment is gone, the Union is, in fact, dissolved; and if it should exist in name, it would be feeble and powerless even for the general purposes for which it was more particularly established.

Mr. N. said he had hoped, and he still hoped, that this fanatical spirit of Abolitionism could be allayed, and had been opposed to all agitation of the subject here, believing that the better way to quiet it. He had been disposed to pour oil on the troubled waters; to soothe rather than to irritate the feelings of those who might be honest, but acting from a mistaken zeal. But he greatly feared the evil had spread so far, and was seated so deep, that it would not subside in this way; he feared it would go on extending and spreading until it reached a crisis. And this fear was increased when he witnessed the efforts that were making to give this question a political turn. Sir, this battle is first to be fought at the North; when the standard shall be raised—and he feared it had already been raised in some of the States, and he had heard that gentlemen of his own State had been denounced for votes given in another place—when the standard of Abolitionism shall be raised as a political standard, with the inscription upon it, "we vote for no man who is not in favor of abolition," the evil will have reached its second stage, and a fearful one indeed. The war will then have commenced in the non-slaveholding States, and must continue until the issue there is decided. This will be a contest for the Union, in which there can be no neutrals. The Senator from Massachusetts occupies a position somewhat different from that occupied by himself, although he would by no means insinuate that he was an Abolitionist, or disposed to favor their mistaken views. But he may yield to this spirit for a time; he may take the first step and the second step, but he would finally be brought to a pause. The Senator has alluded to the disaffection that once existed at the North, which, he says, passed off without any serious consequences, and the active agents in it became very unpopular, or odious. Mr. N. should not differ with the Senator on that point: he believed that the prominent actors in those scenes were justly rendered not only odious, but infamous; but the danger then was not so much in the designs, whatever they may have been of the prominent leaders, as in the state of public opinion, which was by no means favorable to the continuance of the Union; nor can any one tell what would have been the final issue of these troubles, had not peace come as it did. He was in the midst of those trying scenes, and knew the danger, but did not wish to dwell upon it here. But the cases are by no means parallel: the causes of disaffection then were the measures of the Government, which must, in their nature, be temporary. The abolition excitement springs from causes which are permanent, and cannot be removed; neither is it directed against this Government or its Administration, but against the domestic institutions of certain States in this Confederacy.

When this evil reaches its second stage, to which it appears to be fast approaching; when it is attempted to build up a political party based on Abolition principles, he should not hesitate to take his stand; he would fearlessly oppose its advance; would contest every inch of ground; he would resist so dangerous a spirit of disunion, as he had on a former occasion; and what little he possessed of character or influence, he staked upon the issue. Nay, more; he would stake upon that issue all that he held dear this side the grave—character, property, friends, and life itself. He was bold to declare that he would defend the rights of the South, so far as they had rights secured by the Constitution; he would defend them to the very verge of the Constitution; and in so doing, should consider that he was defending the rights of the North, and the whole Union. We must stand or fall together; and the only way we can hope to stand is, by holding sacred and inviolate the rights of each and all the States guarantied by the Constitution.

Sir, (said Mr. N.) I will not undertake to predict what will be the issue of this struggle at the North. For a time, very possibly, the side of error may prevail. It was a subject peculiarly calculated to take hold of the feelings and prejudices of large classes of the people; it was a subject calculated to delude and mislead. But if the Abolition party should prevail, and Abolition principles triumph, we shall have then reached the third stage of the evil; the contest will then be brought here, and between the different States of this Union. Then are to follow reproaches, criminations and recriminations, and real or supposed aggressions offered and repelled; agitation, alarm and confusion may prevail, and the noble fabric of the Government appear to be falling to pieces. This will be the final crisis, which may fill the country with calamities, but the Union will not be dissolved. When the waters of bitterness have spread over the land—when the people have drank deep from the cup of affliction—when they have seen and tasted enough of the bitter fruits of fanaticism, folly, rashness and passion—the good sense and reason of the people will return, the delusion will subside, and the dark clouds which have lowered over our horizon will gradually disappear, until the sun breaking through them shines once more on our favored land. Sir, the Union will not be dissolved, although it may be put to a severe trial. He felt a strong conviction, an abiding confidence in this; but if he could for a moment believe that Providence has ordered otherwise—that this Confederacy is to be broken down—it would make no difference as to his course. When driven from every other position, he would make his last stand on the ramparts of the Constitution, where he would make the last rally for the last struggle in its defence. If unsuccessful—if he fell—he would fall with the glorious standard of the Union in his hand, and the words of the venerable ex-President on his lips—"THE FEDERAL UNION MUST BE PRESERVED."

Mr. BAYARD move to strike out the words "the several States," and insert the words of the Constitution itself, viz: "the people of the United States." His only object was to avoid a committal to a political creed, to which he could not consent. If Mr. C. would admit this slight change, Mr. B. would go with him.

Mr. CALHOUN objected, that those words were ambiguous; they might be taken in a geographical sense, meaning the inhabitants of the northern continent of America; or they might mean the people, as a people; or they might mean the people only of the several separate States. The latter was the only sense he could admit.

Mr. BAYARD urged that the very words of the Constitution, to which every Senator had sworn, could not surely be objected to. It appeared to him that Mr. C. was contending rather to put his own peculiar interpretation upon that instrument, rather than following the instrument itself, leaving the interpretation open. This he (Mr. B.) contended ought to be done. Why, he asked, should Mr. Calhoun refuse to take the very words of the Constitution itself?

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said, if the Senator from Delaware would frame his amendment according to the historical fact, in the adoption of the Constitution, Mr. Clay would vote for it. The historical fact was, that the Constitution was adopted by the people of the several States, acting within their respective limits.

Mr. CALHOUN. The Senator, to establish the views of the other side, has selected a passage for his amendment which is their whole reliance. We rely on the historical fact; and the Senator from Delaware ought not to force his interpretation on us.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is much mistaken if he thinks our views are sustained only by the preamble (of the Constitution.) The historical fact is, that it is the Government, in the words of the Constitution, of "the people of the United States." It is so decided by Chief Justice Marshall. When the preamble of the Constitution was "We, the people of New Hampshire, Vermont," &c. the names of the several States were stricken out, and the existing expression inserted, in order to avoid all ambiguity. I do not depend at all on the preamble, but on the discussion in the Convention. I can demonstrate that it was regarded as a Government emanating from the people as a general body; and on this subject I shall be ready to wield a lance with the Senator on any substantial occasion. If the Senator puts a different construction on those words, be it so; I do not want to express any particular opinion on that subject.

Mr. BAYARD'S amendment was lost—yeas 8, nays 34; and the third resolution was adopted—yeas 31, nays 11.

SPEECH OF MR. J. L. MURRAY, OF KENTUCKY.

In the House of Representatives, January 9, 1838—In Committee of the Whole on the resolution offered by Mr. HAYNES to refer so much of the President's Message as relates to the finances, the safe keeping of the public moneys, etc. to the Committee of Ways and Means, and pending the amendment offered by Mr. CUSHING—

Mr. MURRAY being entitled to the floor, said—

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is, sir, with considerable reluctance that I rise, for the purpose of taking a share in the discussion of the subject under consideration. Nothing but a deep sense of the obligations of duty which I owe to the people whom I have the honor to represent, could at this time induce me so to do. As I have not, however, been heretofore obtrusive in debate, I hope the House will not consider me a trespasser on their patience for the little time which I shall occupy the floor. Great pains seem to have been taken to induce the country to believe that the recommendations of the President in relation to the safe-keeping of the public moneys, or, in other words, what has been denominated the "Sub-Treasury system," is ominous to the liberties of the people, and fraught with the most serious dangers. Such as have not fully understood the nature of those recommendations, and are unadvised as to the probable effects of their operation upon the country, should they be adopted, must have concluded, no doubt, from seeing so many bitter denunciations against them, that the system proposed could be little else than some fell measure of despotism. Those persons, however, must be much surprised, when they come to learn that so much of the Message as relates to this subject, implies nothing more than the safe-keeping of the public moneys by the Treasurer of the United States, by the collectors and receivers of the revenue, and by the officers of the several mints, until those moneys are paid over to the public creditors in the manner prescribed by law. In this there would seem to be nothing extraordinary in the management of our fiscal affairs; nothing beyond what has at times been the practice of perhaps every civilized government on the face of the globe, and is now the practice of our own Government; the whole system having been, from necessity, in operation since the suspension of specie payments by the banks in May last, but without those safeguards intended to be thrown around it by the recommendations of the President. Prior to the general suspension of specie payments, the public moneys seem to have been collected by the public officers, who, instead of paying them over to the public creditors, paid them over to the deposite banks, who kept and used such moneys until they were received by the public creditors. The collectors were the officers of the Government, and responsible to her. The banks were a class of agents of a very different character, being independent of, and not subject to, the control of the Government. These two classes of agents were then used in the collection and disbursement of the public revenues. The recommendations of the Message propose to dispense with the latter class of agents, and to retain only the first class in the performance of these duties. This would seem to simplify very much these important operations of the Government, and keep the public moneys always within her control. The former system was more complex, and left our public treasure in the hands of irresponsible depositories. This system is now objected to, on the ground that the depositories proposed would be unsafe, and too much would be added to the patronage of the Executive. It is objected to, also, on the ground that it would operate injuriously on the currency of the country. I shall notice these, and some other objections, in the course of my remarks. For the present, however, I will observe, that from the sentiments which I entertain, the objections appear to me to be themselves very objectionable. It does not appear to me that the Government funds ever can be safe in the hands of depositories not responsible to the Government, nor subject to her control. Such depositories will ever have it in their power to thwart the purposes of the Government, by withholding her funds, which, in extraordinary emergencies, as in times of war, might enable them to upset the Government. The history of the late deposite system is a clear exemplification of the danger of employing such depositories. The fact that the Government was pronounced bankrupt, and was, in fact, unable to pay her creditors, when she had at the same time near thirty millions of dollars in the hands of her deposite banks, which, from their suspension of specie payments, she was unable to command, is commentary enough on such a system; or, rather, the facts being stated, need no commentary at all.

On the other hand, I have been unable to discover in what manner the system proposed, if adopted, could injure or debase the currency of the country. So far as its operation may be concerned with the currency of the country, I am clearly of opinion that its effects will be salutary. For myself, however, I am well satisfied that nothing but a general and radical reform in the present banking system of the United States can relieve us from the sudden and disastrous fluctuations in our currency, which have heretofore so long and so often afflicted the country.

Banking, according to its present organization, is but an enlarged and legalized system of brokerage. It has accompanied its operations on the community with the most dangerous tendencies, corrupting the morals of the people by infusing into all classes, whether high or low, the most inordinate spirit of speculation, and sporting with their fortunes by the expansions and contractions of its credit, and depreciation of its paper. The seeming prosperity for a time with which it clothed the country, but duped and seduced our citizens to engage in unnatural speculations, for which they were unprepared, for which their former pursuit had disqualified them, and in which they involved themselves beyond their resources. All this but furnished to the banks additional facilities for ruining the country, by an unprecedented increase in the number of those institutions, and extension of their credit. Banking had become the most profitable and, at the same time, the most irresponsible of all the modes of speculation. A company of individuals had only to be incorporated as the stockoldhers of a bank; and they could, to any extent, exchange their credit, in the shape of bank bills, for the credit of the best citizens of the country, in the shape of endorsed promissory notes, and secure to themselves the highest rate of interest on the exchange. Though a mere exchange of credit, in such case the profits are all on the side of the bank, whilst the responsibilities are all on the side of the citizen. He and his endorsers are responsible personally, to the last cent of their property, for the payment of their note given to the bank, with the discount and interest thereon. The bank, whose stockholders are shielded from individual responsibility, and whose mock capital very often appears only on her books, and not in her vaults, gives her credit in exchange until it floods the country, upon which she pays no interest. The bank is always secure, and treasures up large profits, withdrawn from the industry of the community. The community may be ruined by the breaking of the bank, after which her stockholders are irresponsible. In this way splendid fortunes are amassed by the stockholders, without any portion of that hazard and responsibility usually attendant upon the enterprise of the honest adventurer. For the last year or two preceding the suspension of specie payments, the profits of the banks are known to have been enormous, varying, in most instances, from 18 to 50 per cent. Since the suspension, most of the banks have fallen into the keeping of their evil genius, being compelled, from the stern force of circumstances, to yield to the pressing or tempting necessities with which they are surrounded. The mammoth brokers, shielded from responsibility, and entrenched behind the forms of law, have fallen into the hands of the shaving shops and common brokers of the country, being compelled to become the victims of their exactions, or the panders to their iniquities. Brokers fix whatever price they please upon their paper; and although the character of the institutions must suffer injury, the community must bear the loss. I will give you one instance. In the West, for some time after the general suspension, the merchants of New Orleans continued to receive paper upon the banks of Tennessee at par, in payment of debts. The brokers of New Orleans, however, determined to give no funds for Tennessee paper without a discount of ten per cent. The consequence was, that the merchants were compelled to demand a discount also of ten per cent. that being the price placed upon it by the brokers. Instances, however, need not be cited except for illustration; the facts are known to exist, and the practice to prevail, in perhaps every commercial city in the Union. The siren herself is taken by means of the same charm with which she so often lured others to destruction.

But it may be presumed that the banks will not willingly submit to this mortifying and humiliating injury upon their credit, without endeavoring, by some means or other, to reap some corresponding benefit. The strongest temptation is thrown open to the banks to employ brokers to buy up and purchase in their paper at a discount, or such a price as has been placed upon it by the brokers. I do not affirm that this is the case, nor am I going now to stop to investigate the matter. I only state the temptation; for human experience has admonished us that when temptation courts, the lure is not always disregarded. What is lost in character may be compensated in gain. The history of banks will show that gain is the great object of their creation and existence. This they pursue with the avidity of a hungry tiger. It is never for a moment lost sight of in any calculation, nor forgotten in any emergency. The north pole is not more steadily watched by the anxious mariner than is gain pursued by the banks. If the good of the community and the gain of the banks come to be weighed against each other in the scales, the preponderance is always on the side of the bank interest. This, then, being a principal and leading ingredient in their nature, how is it possible to expect that banks that are lying like an incubus upon the community, powerless and almost motionless—like the wreck of some dismantled and foundered ship, brought to destruction in the distant ocean by the temerity and folly of her drunken helmsman, who sits in motionless stupor, and witnesses without emotion the surrounding disasters and distress of which he is the author—will resist the many opportunities that surround them of enjoying the savage and miserable consolation of profiting amidst the general calamity, by receiving additional accessions to their gains, though adding still further to the general prostration of the country. The amount of bank paper in circulation at the time of the late suspension of specie payments is said to have been $140,000,000. The depreciation in this enormous and bloated mass is estimated at 10 per cent. which, on the $140,000,000 in circulation, would be a loss to the community of $14,000,000. This was a clear loss; a deadening shock to the holders of the paper, sufficient of itself to produce very disastrous results.

This, however, was a small item compared with the general prostration of confidence and other results consequent upon the depreciation. The paper circulation being depreciated, forced the precious metals to disappear, or threw them into the markte as merchandise. The holders of specie laid it away under lock and key, or carried it to the brokers, and sold it for the premium it commanded. The miser made himself secure against the evils of depreciation, by locking up his gold and silver, whilst the Shylock and usurer fattened upon the premiums received from the brokers. But the honest husbandman who carried to market his humble products for sale, was compelled to receive either the depreciated paper of banks, or individual tickets, redeemable, not in money, but in the same depreciated paper. If, after receiving such paper at par for his marketable products, he calls upon the merchant to pay his debts, he is frequently told that his paper will be taken at a discount of 10 per cent. If the poor man utters any complaint at this, he is told a very reasonable tale by the merchant about the general embarrassment of the times, and that pressing necessity will compel him in a few days to exchange his notes and accounts for a constable's or other officer's receipt. This argument is too forcible to be resisted, and ten per cent. of the poor man's labor is gone. I need not notice the higher grades of trade, where we have found our exchanges broken up, our commerce broken down, and the growers of our staples, after being duped and seduced into debt, delivered over to the mercy of constables and sheriffs, with their products lying on their hands, unsold and unsaleable. Such have been the miserable effects of the present banking system in the United States. Thank God, the energies and resources of the country are now redeeming it from the thraldom under which it was placed. Specie is beginning to flow into our country at almost every port, and has nearly ceased to be an article of exportation. Our foreign debts are almost entirely extinguished, and exchanges three per cent. in favor of the United States. Our crops are abundant, and we yet possess all the elements of national wealth.

I will now give a glancing notice to the condition of these banks, for the purpose of seeing the manner in which they have been conducted, and also their fitness for being again made the depositories of the public moneys. From a published statement in the newspapers, which I examined a few days since, it appears that the banks of New York have an aggregate of specie, amounting to $3,482,620, and that their immediate liabilities amount to $33,313,821, viz: circulation $13,908,893, public and private deposites $19,404,928. These banks have, therefore, on hand but one dollar in specie for nine dollars and sixty-six cents and two-thirds of their immediate liabilities. From the same table it appears, that the immediate liabilities of the banks of Pennsylvania amount to $28,103,818 42; that is circulation $16,164,539 21, public and private deposites $11,939,279 21, their specie on hand $6,908,510 88, being one dollar for every four dollars and sixteen and two-third cents of their immediate liabilities. By the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the immediate means of the deposite banks of Virginia and North Carolina are stated to have been in July last, $3,972,655; their immediate liabilities $15,267,563. The immediate means of the banks of Tennessee and Alabama, at the same time, are stated to have been $3,506,164; their immediate liabilities $16,360,591. By his report to the special session, it will be seen that of nearly two-thirds of the deposite banks, their immediate means in July last varied from one-fifth to one-twentieth of their immediate responsibilities. The class of banks composed of the States of Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, had at that time of immediate means $1,168,022 in specie, whilst their immediate liabilities were $23,997,592; viz: circulation and deposites, public and private, $21,480,819; balance due other banks, after deducting all that was due from other banks $2,516,773. Such is the condition of these banks, whose extravagant credit has brought wide spread disaster over the greater portion of the Southwestern country, and whose paper in Kentucky has varied at a discount of from ten to twenty, and some of it as high as forty per cent. And these are the banks we are called upon to make the depositories of the public moneys. To renew between them and the Government the former connection, dissevered and broken off, not by any fault of the Government, but by the default of the banks. By their suspension of specie payments they ceased to be the depositories of the Government, and shall we again select them to perform a trust for which their past history and their present condition show them to be disqualified and unfit. How did they use the former deposites committed to their charge? Banked upon them, sir, in such manner, and to such extent, as to prostrate the country, and to put it out of their power to return them to the Government when called for and needed. And who are they who now insist upon a renewal of this connection of the Government and the banks? Mostly those very gentlemen who opposed this very system in the days of its prosperity. Who inform us that they predicted its ruinous consequences, and who now admit many of them that they have no confidence in it. They opposed the system when it "worked well," when the banks punctually received, transmitted and disbursed the public moneys, successfully regulated the exchanges of the country, and redeemed their paper and other credits in specie. Now they support the system after it has failed, and the banks have ceased to perform these important duties and functions. Such is the course pursued by gentlemen. Reasons are no doubt abundant and satisfactory to those who take that course; and it is very far from my purpose to impugn those reasons. One of the principal, no doubt is, that the Administration and its friends, upon whom all responsibility is said to rest, have found themselves compelled to oppose it. Sir, it was a strange story to me at the late session, that all responsibility devolved upon the friends of the Administration; that it was to them the country must look for every thing resulting from the action of Congress, whether for good or for evil. That those opposed to the Administration came here, not to bring forward any proposition, nor to support any that was brought forward; but to stand in the door, to obstruct the ingress and regress of the measures, and to embarrass and break them down. If it be true that the friends of the Administration are only responsible to the country, it behooves them of course to beware of the measures selected, to ponder well upon their consequences, but at the same time to support with zeal and efficiency such of them as they may believe will redound to the good of the nation. Those who have only to throw obstructions and embarrassments in the way, have a much easier task to perform. They may at all times be content that nothing has been done. For my part, I came here with very different feelings. I came prepared to do my duty to the country, regardless of party trammels. I was willing to accede to any reasonable compromise of policy for the purpose of rescuing the country from the thraldom under which it was placed. I thought the relief of the country much more important than the dominancy of party. I was willing to support a project for a national bank, if that were to be selected as the means of relief, and one could be organized on principles of reform and compromise, in such manner as to obviate the evils and dangerous tendencies of the late Bank of the United States; and all were well aware that no such institution could be established unless it should be the result of compromise. That such an institution could be created, subject to the control and superintendence of the people's representatives in Congress, and therefore a safe depository of the public moneys—a useful agent in managing the fiscal concerns of the Government—a successful regulator of the exchanges, and the dispenser of a sound currency to the people, I have no doubt. Here I will take occasion to observe, that pending the resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means at the last session, declaring it "inexpedient to establish a national bank, it was my intention to support the proposition of my much esteemed colleague, (Mr. Pope,) submitted by him with the view of being offered in due time as an amendment of the original resolution. His proposition was in the following words:

"That, to aid the fiscal operations of the Government, the business and commerce of the country, to restore public and private confidence, and to ensure to the nation a sound and uniform currency, it is necessary and proper to establish a Bank of the United States, with such capital as may be deemed sufficient, with such limitations and restrictions as will ensure an equitable distribution of the stock among the States and the citizens of the United States alone, prevent excessive issues of notes, exorbitant profits, all interference with the politics of the country, and reserving to Congress the power of preventing and correcting abuses of the charter."

This proposition assumes it to be good policy to establish a bank that shall not "interfere with the politics of the country," nor make upon the people unequal exactions from an equal "distribution of its stock among the citizens of the several States;" to be prevented from unsettling the value of the property and fortunes of the country, by "restrictions" upon its "issues" and the "profits" of its stockholders; and to be placed under the control of "Congress," by "reserving" to that body the "power," at all times, "of preventing and correcting abuses in its charter." As an abstract proposition, it conforms very much to my opinions on the subject, if a bank were to be created on the principles assumed; though I should prefer one on different principles. Whenever the gentleman, however, shall bring forward a project for a bank which will have the practical effects in its operations upon the country described in his proposition, it shall have my cordial support. Although the whole procedure on this subject was intended to have no practical effect, being introduced merely to elicit the opinions of the members, I should nevertheless have been much gratified if a vote had been taken on the above proposition. It was not allowed, however, to be submitted, as on the morning of the 5th of October, when a large portion of us were absent, not expecting the subject to be unceremoniously disposed of at that time, the original resolution was taken up, all the propositions to amend cut off by means of the "previous question," and the House forced to vote on the resolution of the committee without further consideration or debate. A justification for this course may perhaps be sustained upon the ground, and upon that ground only, that nothing practical was intended by the proceeding—there being no proposition before Congress to establish a national bank, and it being well understood that there would be none, as two of the co-ordinate branches of the Government, the Executive and the Senate, ha ddeclared against bank of any description; and it being also known that a considerable majority of our own House entertained the same opinions. As it was only intended to bring forward a declaration of the sentiments of the members, it was not important to myself, as my opinions on the subject were fully declared and well understood in my district previous to my election. But, sir, whilst on this subject, I must also take occasion to say that, in creating a national bank, it has never been contemplated by me that the interest of stockjobbers and speculators must be consulted; that a company of corporators must be enriched, though the safety of the people be jeoparded; that to them must be delegated the power of controlling at will the monetary concerns of this vast nation; to sport with the property of our citizens by the expansions and contractions of its issues; to claim and use the credit of the Government in speculating upon the country, and making upon the people unequal exactions; to have the control and custody of the public moneys, and be at the same time irresponsible either to the Government or the people; and therefore to have it in their power (as was lately possessed and exercised by, a great institution) to defy the action of Congress, to make war upon the Government, to corrupt the public franchise, to subsidize the press, and to arrest the operations of the Government, as might suit their cupidity or necessities, by withholding her funds. Mr. Jefferson was certainly right when he said that "such an institution, ramifying with its branches every portion of the nation, acting in phalanx and by concert, might, in a critical conjuncture, upset the Government." From the relief of such an institution may God save my country. The protection it would afford would be the protection of the devouring vulture; its contact with our political institutions as poisonous and desolating as the atmosphere of the bohon upas.

But a national bank, of any description, is known to us and to the nation to be wholly out of the question. So much so that the most zealous of its friends must admit that it would be a useless waste of time and money, and trifling with the patience of the people, to bring forward such a proposition. Shall we, then, supinely fold our arms and do nothing? or, what is worse than nothing, spend the time of the House in party charges and recriminations for the unenviable purpose of exasperating the people, and diminishing their confidence in the worth and stability of their Government? Or shall we, like real friends of the country, inquire, in a conciliatory spirit, what ought to be done, and, at the same time, what can be done? Can any available measure be brought forward with the prospect of success, that will be preferable to the recommendations of the President? I have patiently listened to all that has been said against the Message with no other view than to arrive at truth. I have heard much of argument, it is true, both plausible and ingenious; but I think I have heard more of bold assumptions, of bitter denunciations, against the President, against his history, against General Jackson, against his friends, and against his measures. At times we have been entertained with the charge that "Uncle Sam" is too whimsical and capricious and unsteady in his affections; that he was lawfully affianced and wedded to his first spouse, the Bank of the United States; that he capriciously and injudiciously divorced her for the illicit purpose of espousing his deposite banks, amounting to upwards of eighty in number, which espousal, it is supposed, was not altogether conformable to public taste and good morals; that being now a little piqued with these spouses, in consequence of their extravagance, they having made a little too free with his money, he has got into a pet, and concluded to live a life of celibacy, which, it is insisted, is more unreasonable than ever, and that Congress should no longer sanction his whimsical notions. For my part, I cannot admit that Uncle Sam is so much to blame; the provocation seems to have been altogether on the part of his eighty spouses; they appear to have been regardless of their plighted vows, and unfaithful to their engagements; they appear to have conspired to break him up by seizing upon all he was worth, locking the doors against him, and refusing to let him have back any portion of his money, not even enough to pay his agents and laborers. On the other hand, I think his determination to form no more such connections is perhaps well enough; the result, no doubt, of mature reflection and experience. If, like many others, in his youth he formed an imprudent connection unsuited to his genius or his constitution, or if since he has been led astray by the lures of a meretricious engagement, it is time for him to reform, to give up and abandon the errors of his youth, and adopt and conform to habits more suitable to his years and condition.

The country has also been frightened with the assertions that the recommendations of the Message, if adopted, "will place in the hands of the President of the United States the control, the full, complete and exclusive control of both the purse and the sword of the nation;" and, therefore, put it in his power to subvert the liberties of the country and subjugate and enslave our citizens. This was to me a very novel doctrine, as it never had occurred to me that, under our Constitution and form of Government, the President could control either the purse or the sword of this nation. In Great Britain the King is said to have the control of the sword, and Parliament the control of the purse. The power retained by Parliament over the purse is supposed to be a sufficient check upon the power over the sword conceded to the crown. The King can declare war, raise armies, equip fleets, &c.; but the supplies or money, which is to pay or defray the expenses, must come from the Commons.

By our Constitution, both these powers are reserved to Congress, neither being given to the President. Congress only can declare war, arm and equip fleets, raise armies, &c.; and Congress only can "lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, provide for the common defence and general welfare of the nation." The President can neither raise an army nor pay an army. He can neither declare war, nor raise money to pay an army to prosecute one. It is true that the duty of seeing the laws faithfully executed devolves on the President. He must see that duties, imposts, &c. are collected as directed by the laws of Congress. And after they are collected he must see that they are disbursed and paid out, in pursuance of appropriations made by Congress. These are mere Executive duties, to be performed in pursuance of and in obedience to the Legislative will. It is, then, very clear that the President cannot have the control of either the sword or the purse so long as the character and structure of the Government remain unchanged.

But it is said that the recommendations of the President propose "to cut the Government loose from the people. To provide for the Government, and let the people shift for themselves. To provide one currency for the Government, and another for the people." These are the round assumptions that are to go down with the people for argument. Is there, sir, matter of substance in these assertions, or are they thrown out as mere bugbears to frighten the people? Were it not for the high sources from whence I often hear them emanate, I would not hesitate to believe the latter. How can the Government be provided for, and not the people? or, how can it be severed from the people, when the Government, with its money and every thing appurtenant to it belongs to the people, is created by them, sustained by them, and administered for their benefit? All are in the hands of the people and subject to their control. Are the people's agents more interested than the people themselves, in having the Government well provided for? Are not these agents part of the people, selected by the people themselves, and responsible to them for the performance of the various trusts committed to their charge? I can easily conceive how an absolute monarch or despotic master could wield the rod of tyranny over his dependent subjects or slaves; but who before ever heard of a free and independent people playing the tyrant over themselves? With as much propriety might the Provincial Congress be accused of tyranny and cruelty, for calling upon and compelling the citizens to go forth and peril their lives in the battle field of our Revolution, as to accuse the Administration now of being regardless of the people's best interest, because that Administration is endeavoring to render safe and successful the operations of Government.

Surely, whatever is done for the benefit of the Government redounds to the benefit of the people. Our Government, thank God! has no separate existence, disconnected from the people. They are one and indivisible. They are legitimately and, I trust, indissolubly connected together, and organized to suit each other, in pursuance of the free and unbiassed will of the people; and whom God has joined together, let no man dare to put asunder. Is it right to create jealousies in the minds of the people against their Government, for the purpose of destroying their confidence in it? Does not such a course smack very much of that Iago spirit which would poison confidence in the purest and most unsullied happiness, by destroying confidence in the constancy of the most guileless innocence?

But it is said that the first message to this Congress "virtually asserts that the Government was created to take care of itself, and not the people, and that the President, therefore, leaves the people to shift for themselves." Let us recur to the objectionable paragraph in the message, and hear it speak for itself. It is as follows:

"Those who look to the action of this Government for specific aid to the citizen to relieve embarrassments arising from losses by revulsions in commerce and credit, lose sight of the ends for which it was created, and the powers with which it is clothed. It was established to give security to us all in our lawful and honorable pursuits, under the lasting safeguard of republican institutions. It was not intended to confer special favors on individuals, or on any classes of them; to create systems of agriculture, manufactures, or trade; or to engage in them, either separately or in connection with individual citizens or organized associations. If its operations were directed for the benefit of any one class, equivalent favors must, in justice, be extended to the rest; and the attempt to bestow such favors with an equal hand, or even to select those who should most deserve them, would never be successful. All communities are apt to look to Government for too much. Even in our own country, where its powers and duties are so strictly limited, we are prone to do so, especially at periods of sudden embarrassments and distress. But this ought not to be. The framers of our excellent Constitution, and the people who approved it with calm and sagacious deliberation, acted, at the time, on a sounder principle. They wisely judged, that the less Government interferes with private pursuits, the better for the general prosperity. It is not its legitimate object to make men rich, or to repair, by direct grants of money or legislation in favor of particular pursuits, losses not incurred in the public service. This would be substantially to use the property of some for the benefit of others. But its real duty—that duty, the performance of which makes a good Government the most precious of human blessings—is to enact and enforce a system of general laws, commensurate with, but not exceeding, the objects of its establishment, and to leave every citizen and every interest to reap, under its benign protection, the rewards of virtue, industry, and prudence."

I have been unable to discover in this paragraph any thing repugnant to the republican theory of our Government; and the practice of the Government ought to conform to its theory. I make no commentary upon it. The argument in the paragraph itself, is clear and irresistible in favor of the position it maintains. By way of backing it, however, with authority, which I know will not be questioned, I will read a paragraph contained in the last Message of the present Governor of Kentucky. That gentleman must be favorably known upon this floor, as having been lately a representative here from that State. His devotion to the Whig cause and to Whig principles is well known. He is, moreover, much esteemed by all parties for his candor, his talents, and his private virtues. Here is the passage in his Message which I allude to:

"Already are individuals to be found looking to the Government for aid and desiring the benefit of relief laws. How much more extensive would become this feeling of dependence and this desire for legislative interference, if the country had to undergo the sudden and unavoidable pressure and embarrassment incident to such an operation. So far as it can be accomplished, Government should prevent all occasion for a reliance upon it for relief. It should, however, at the same time, be understood distinctly that it has no constitutional power or right in any possible state of things, to interfere between man and man in relation to their private contracts. It is not proper to repair private losses incurred in any pursuit whatever, by enacting laws to operate in favor of one at the expense of another class of citizens. That would be virtually to take the property of one citizen and apply it to the use of another. The Government ought never to interfere with private pursuits; its real duty is to have and enforce a general system of laws, operating equally upon all, and to leave every citizen and every interest under its influence and protection to secure the advantages resulting from the exercise of economy, prudence, and industry. Whenever the conviction is fully impressed on the public mind, that no legislation for the exclusive benefit of the debtor portion of the community can take place consistently with the spirit of the Constitution, or the fair demands of an honest policy, even in periods of the greatest derangement and distress, every citizen, instead of relying on temporizing expedients and relief laws, will feel that his sure and only dependence is on his own industrious exertions, aided by prudence and persevering economy."

After reading these conclusive arguments of President Van Buren and Governor Clark, in defence of the same position, I will proceed to another branch of the same inquiry; and that is, to answer the charge that the President has recommended an unjust discrimination as to the character of the funds to be made receivable for the public dues; the effect of which, it is insisted, would be to provide one currency for the Government and another for the people. Let us see, for a moment, how this matter stands. In his last Message, the President makes no allusion to the character of the currency to be received; consequently, he cannot be charged with unjust discrimination in that document. In his Message to the special session of Congress, he recommends the reception of "specie or its equivalent," gold and silver, or "bank notes actually convertible into specie;" the latter to be received under such circumstances as will "allow of their early presentation for payment." Here seems to be no unjust discrimination, nor any beyond the former practice of the Government. The former laws of Congress on this subject declare, "that if bank notes are paid in the transactions of the Government, it must be under such circumstances as to enable the holder to convert them into specie without depreciation or delay. Surely gentlemen would not have the President to recommend the reception of depreciated bank paper not "redeemable, upon demand, in specie." This he opposes in his Message, and assigns, in my judgment, the best of reasons: that such a course "would, without the excuse of war or public distress, destroy that equality of imports and identity of commercial regulation, which lie at the foundation of our Confederacy, and would offer to each State a direct temptation to increase its foreign trade, by depreciating the currency received for duties in its ports; that "such a proceeding would also, in a great degree, frustrate the policy so highly cherished, of infusing into our circulation a larger proportion of the precious metals." Such seem to be the sentiments of the President, against which it would, to my mind, be very difficult to raise any reasonable or valid objections. In many of the cities and towns of the nation, the chief currency for "common hand to hand transactions," consists of individual and corporate tickets, redeemable, not in money, but in irredeemable, depreciated bank paper. The people take them from choice, to answer the purposes of change; but is that any reason why the Government should take such paper? Could she tender such paper to her creditors without subjecting herself to the merited charge of fraud? and would her creditors receive such paper when they have the common right of every citizen to demand gold or silver, if they choose to do so? As an individual, I may receive for my debts whatever I please; irredeemable depreciated paper if I choose. In performing the trust of an agent in collecting money for another, I would not dare to receive such paper, unless I intended to make it good out of my own pocket. How, then, is an agent of the Government to be expected to receive such paper? There can be but one answer given to such a question. But suppose the Government were to receive such paper for the public dues. Would not such a course stand condemned by every principle of sound policy, and be execrated by every citizen? Who cannot see the encouragement that would thereby be given to the emission and circulation of such paper? It would soon become the only circulating medium of the country. Do we not all look to the Government to discourage rather than encourage the circulation of such a medium. Sir, the Government is the safest and perhaps the only sure check we possess against a perpetual flood of inconvertible depreciated paper; which check can only be brought to operate upon such a state of currency by a refusal to admit it in the Federal transactions. Such is the opinion of very able financiers. And such was the opinion of the sage of Montpelier himself. In a letter to Mr. C. J. Ingersoll in 1832, in speaking of the Convention that framed the Constitution, in reference to this subject, he says, that "a virtual and incidental enforcement of the depreciated notes of State banks, by their crowding out a sound medium, though a great evil, was not foreseen; and if it had been apprehended, it is questionable whether the Constitution of the United States, which had so many obstacles to encounter, would have ventured to guard against it by an additional provision. A virtual, and it is hoped, an adequate remedy may hereafter be found in the refusal of State paper when debased in any of the Federal transactions."

Such was the opinion of Mr. Madison, who is yet, I believe, acknowledged to be good authority with all parties, even with those who have lost all confidence in Mr. Jefferson. On this point the President seems to be well sustained by reason, by sound policy, and by one of the most able and pure of American statesmen.

It has been said that the "banks will be unable to sustain themselves, unless they are made the depositories of the public moneys: that their paper will become disparaged and uncurrent, unless we impart to them the credit of the Government." In answer to this I will say, that if making the banks the depositories of the public moneys would militate against either the safety of the Government or the prosperity of the people—by putting the Government into the power of the banks in such manner as to enable them to arrest and paralyze all her energies, by withholding the deposites when needed for the public welfare, as they might be prompted from interest or necessity—or if imparting to them the Government credit would have a tendency to prompt them to over-banking, by inducing them to rely too much upon that credit—I would not make them depositories, though their stockholders should be thereby benefited. That such would be the direct tendency, we are admonished by past experience: and, as like causes produce like effects, it is but a fair calculation to make, that the same system would again produce the same consequences. In the creation of those banks by the several States, the credit of the Government was never contemplated as one of their resources. If their own, and such other resources as were contemplated in their creation, be insufficient to sustain them, their existence is an imposition upon the community in which they subsist, and the sooner they go down the better. But is there not a strong array of facts against the position of those who assume that the Government credit is necessary to sustain the banks? Since the formation of our Government, State banks have only been occasionally resorted to as public depositories, and perhaps their operations have never been more injurious to the community or to their own discredit, than during those very periods of their connection with the Government. From 1791 up to 1811, the first Bank of the United States appears to have been the principal depository of the Government funds. After the expiration of its charter, State banks were selected as depositories, and during the time of the performance of their duties as such, they all suspended specie payments, and involved the country in distress. The late Bank of the United States and its branches were the exclusive depositories of the public moneys from 1816 to 1833, when the State banks were again selected for depositories, and continued to be employed and to act as such till May last, when the same general suspension again took place, with all our late and present disasters following in its train. During the existence of the Bank of the United States the State banks were not only excluded from being public depositories, but their strength was overshadowed, and their paper to a great extent disparaged, by the operations of the Federal bank. Yet, from the time of their recovery from the severe shock given to them by that institution, which ended with the disasters of 1819 and 1820, they continued to prosper, and to perform their functions as banking institutions with much better success than since they were last selected as Government depositories. The reasons are obvious. They then saw the necessity of proceeding with caution and prudence, and of keeping their operations within their resources, which wholesome restraints were all abandoned when they came to rely on the money and credit of the Government. But, furthermore, there are now in the United States about eight hundred banks. No one, I presume, contemplates the employment of them all as fiscal agents for the Government. The late deposite banks amounted to something upwards of eighty in number, and I presume there would not again be a greater number employed. There would then be upwards of seven hundred banks, unprovided for by the Government, to furnish the country with the greater part of its circulation, though laboring under the disadvantage of being excluded from privileges enjoyed by the banks selected, or else they must go down in consequence of such exclusion, and leave their worthless paper on the hands of a suffering community. Take either horn of the dilemma, and the argument of gentlemen on this point must stand defeated. It is, therefore, my sincere conviction that it is better, both for the Government and the banks, that the separation take place; and, as the mutual friend of both, I feel myself bound to support the recommendations of the Message.

But, it is said, "that the recommendations of the President, if adopted and carried out, will make dangerous additions to the patronage of the Executive, and, therefore, endanger the liberties of the people."

Now, it seems to me to be a problem not easily solved, that gentlemen who are in favor of the establishment of an irresponsible, overgrown bank corporation, to have not only the custody and control of the whole of the public revenues, but the power also to break down the State institutions at will, and control the whole circulating medium of the nation, and who are well apprized of the tremendous influences which such an institution is able to exert over the fortunes and destinies of the people, should be so much alarmed and horrified about the danger of requiring the officers of the Government, who already collect her moneys, and are responsible for the discharge of their duties, to keep safely those moneys collected by them, for a few weeks or months, and pay them over at once to the public creditors, instead of paying them over to the bank depositories. Do we not know, from experience and observation, that no influence could add so much to the power of the Executive as an alliance with the banking institutions of the country. Bank influence is always on the alert, and never to be taken by surprise. It is the most subtle, the most active, the most seductive, and I may add, the most corrupting and dangerous of any influence under heaven. Suppose an ambitious President in league with the most powerful banking institutions of the country, in consequence of their being the public depositories. The banks, to secure Executive favor and advancement, are willing to minister to the wishes and ambition of the President. Possessing the control of the circulating medium of the country, they at once have it in their power to unsettle the value of the property and fortunes of the people—to oppress and overawe their debtors and dependants—to alarm the timid—to bribe the venal and corrupt—to interfere in the elections, and subsidise the press—combining altogether a concentration of power, than which it would be difficult to conceive of any thing which could be more alarming to the jealous defenders of civil liberty. Let it not be said that we shall always find sufficient security against such dangers in the virtue and intelligence of the people. That is an argument which will cut both ways, and be as much against as in favor of the position of gentlemen. It will apply with equal force against the supposed dangers of the system recommended in the Message. Such an argument, however, though always forcible and entitled to great consideration, is nevertheless very far from being conclusive and irresistible. I tell you, sir, that the splendor and eclat of a great man's name, when his career is marked and attended with the triumphal car of success, always beget in the people admiration and attachment, so much so that he will seldom be deserted by the people. The leader of a revolution, if it fails to succeed, becomes a rebel, and the penalties of a traitor are denounced against him. If successful, he becomes a great patriot, and the father of his country's liberties. Even the plunderer of mankind is said to be made or unmade by the caprice of fortune. If his career consist in heading a banditti, he sinks into an odious robber, and is hanged for his crimes. If in leading a victorious army, and commanding the destinies of nations, he is dignified with the title of hero, and admiration renders his name immortal. Day after day are we lectured on the subject of the aggression and dangerous march of Executive power. Yet the late and present Executive have always had arrayed against them the bank influence of the country. The struggle between the late President and the Bank of the United States was long and tremendous; it was such as will be chronicled in our history, as one of the most memorable struggles of our country—a struggle that exhibits the high and noble example of an American President periling himself to save his country from being triumphed over by a powerful bank influence, when by propitiating that influence, he could no doubt have secured himself in the Presidential chair, as long as ambition could have desired. Suppose a different kind of man had been President; or rather suppose the President the same man, with all his extraordinary advantages, but metamorphosed into a different character, with the desires and ambition of an usurper. Suppose him young and daring, and ambitious, panting like Cæsar or Cromwell for power and political glory; and, once obtaining power, determining never again to surrender it. Such a President would have lost no time in enlisting in his support such an irresistible and powerful ally. Possessed of the double influence of the bank interest, and his own extraordinary weight of character, he would have kept steadily in view a continued increase and accumulation of that influence, until the people would have been shackled with the bonds of slavery. He would have procured from Congress a recharter of the institution, with additional grants of power, first perhaps for a definite, but at length for an indefinite period, procuring from time to time additional grants of power, as every addition of strength given to the bank would also be an addition of power to the Executive arm. The bank, knowing well its stay and support, would always be ready to minister to his ambition or his vengeance. Such being the case, the Catos of American freedom might in vain make a show of resistance. Their puny and inefficient efforts would soon be quelled. In vain might the people mourn the subversion of their institutions, and sigh over their liberties lost, and gone for ever. Do you think, sir, this picture is altogether imaginary? Consult the pages of history, and you will find that examples are abundant to warn you of such dangers. It is important, sir, that the Government should have the control of her depositories. It should never be in the power of the banks to control the Government; nor should the Government have depositories which she is unable to control. The people, through their Government, should keep all power within their own hands, and any delegation of powers to others, in such manner as to put the powers delegated beyond the control of the people's representatives in Congress, is, at first blush, a violation of the doctrines of democracy. Those doctrines always contemplate that the people shall reserve to themselves at least a supervisory power to control the action of their representatives in Congress, and any delegation of power by Congress, whether to corporations or others, placing it beyond the power of the people to exercise such supervisory control, is a violation of the doctrines of democracy. To those doctrines I am bound to subscribe, to support and defend them regardless of consequences. They are not only approved of by my coolest reflection and best judgment, but they are endeared to me by my education and former relations in life. They were the first political lessons ever taught me, and they have grown with my growth, and strengthened with my strength. Every dictate of my judgment, whether derived from predilection, from reason, or experience, admonishes me that I ought not to depart from those doctrines. So far as regards my action as a representative, these sentiments are greatly strengthened by the obligations of duty. My constituents are, unequivocally, democratic in their opinions and predilections. They, moreover, occupy a position peculiarly favorable to the open exercise and expression of those opinions, free from the control of extraneous circumstances. There is no bank located within the borders of my district, nor any other corporation, arrogating to itself exclusive privileges, and corrupting the minds of the people with its baneful influence.

Nevertheless, I am not one of those who are opposed to all corporations. I would not indiscriminately oppose their creation, nor would I wage a war of extermination against them after they are brought into existence. Whether their creation has been expedient or inexpedient, whether the result of good or bad policy, they should, nevertheless, be protected in the proper exercise of their legitimate powers. But their abuses should be corrected, and their evils and defects guarded against in the creation of others. A full and complete supervisory control over them should never be lost sight of in their creation.

I now beg leave to recur to the conviction expressed by me in the outset, that nothing else than a general reform in the present banking system of he United States can save the country from the frequent recurrence of the same pecuniary embarrassments which have heretofore so often afflicted it. By a reform in the banking system, I am very far from meaning its annihilation. The benefits of a well regulated credit system, as the legitimate offspring of fair trade, must be obvious to all conversant with the condition of our widely extended and great commercial country. A stable and sound currency is necessary to the health and vigor and usefulness of the credit system. This can never be attained under the auspices of the present banking system of the United States. One of two alternatives must follow. Either we must hereafter continue to be afflicted with the same currency evils to which the country has heretofore been subjected, or else we must set about a reform of the currency, by placing it on a better basis than now supports it. This improvement might, no doubt, be effected by various means, the adoption of any one of which would accomplish the object desired. One means of improvement, which I will suggest, would be the establishment of all banks, in future, upon State capital alone, and a determination on the part of the States to create no more private or individual corporations for banking purposes. A diseased state of currency is chiefly the result of over-banking. This is prompted by individual interest, an inordinate desire on the part of bank stockholders to profit by their bank credits. A system which commits the currency of the country to the care of speculating capitalists, and then shields them from individual responsibility, is monstrous. By establishing banks in future upon State capital, exclusively, these evils would be avoided. The banks would then belong to the people, and the faith of the respective States would be pledged for the redemption of their paper. Public confidence in their paper would always be sustained. The bank profits paid by the people as a tax upon their currency, instead of being applied to enrich individual stockholders, would be placed in the treasuries of the respective States, and relieve the people, to a great extent, from direct taxation. And, sir, if a national bank were to be organized by Congress, I should greatly prefer it to be based principally upon a due proportion of the capital of the respective States. I believe that a safe and useful institution of that character could be organized, and I find I am not singular in that belief. But I cannot now go into this subject. In support of the main point, I beg leave to read an extract from a very able report of a committee of the Maryland Legislature "relative to the establishment of a State bank and a national currency." The committee, in giving their opinion, allude to a strong and well written article in the Quarterly Review as sustaining the conclusion to which they arrive. This report seems to have had an extensive circulation, and to have been much considered by the public. For the present use of it I am indebted to Mr. L. D. TEACKLE of Maryland, who has transmitted a memorial to this House embracing this report, and much valuable information on the subject of banking, for which I return him my thanks. The extract is as follows:

"The propriety of improving the principle of banking, for the common benefit of the whole country, has extensively engaged the public attention in England; and among the number of valuable essays which have appeared in the discussion of that topic, an article from the pen of an eminent writer in the Quarterly Review is most conspicuous."

In the prosecution of the subject, he speaks of the injurious operation of the present banking system in England, which is mainly that which produces a similar influence in the United States, upon the interest of land and labor, and of its tendency to accumulate the mass of circulating medium in the cities, in contradistinction with a public bank with branches in the different parts of the country, as follows:

"Hence the productive classes, and more especially the class engaged in agriculture, can no longer command that accommodation which they had been accustomed to receive. The operations of productive industry are thus impeded by the withdrawal of that capital which used to feed them. To this cause must also be ascribed the glut of money in the city market, which has rendered it extremely difficult to employ it to advantage, and has consequently reduced very greatly the rate of interest in the city, while money is scarce and dear in the country.

"We consider it, then, as quite evident, that the owners of money are to the full as much interested as the owners of land and the owners of labor, in resisting exclusive privileges, which prevent or impede the formation of safe establishments for granting loans for the benefit of the State. Such institutions would instantly infuse new vigor into the industry of the nation; animate the drooping energies of those who are engaged in the cultivation of the soil, and open a wide field for the profitable employment of the capital of the country; and by giving a new direction as well as a new impulse to industry, establishments of this nature would also prove the means of augmenting the national revenues. Increased productiveness would necessarily be followed by an increased consumption of commodities; this would open a new source of revenue to the State. An increase of revenue thus obtained would enable the Treasury to bring into action the latent resources of the country, and to promote the general prosperity.

"It would thus appear that there is no class, and, with the solitary exception of the proprietors of bank stock, there is no individual, who would not be benefited either directly or indirectly, by the introduction and discreet extension of the great principle in question. Such institutions would cause the prostrate and despairing and oppressed classes to be once more visited by the encouragement of hope; the industrious and frugal they would present with at least an opportunity of emancipating themselves from the thraldom and misery into which they have sunk; to the owners of capital, laid out in land or in other investments, they would be found the source of an improved revenue; and, finally, by multiplying the products of industry, they would yield an additional revenue to the State."

"It is understood that the odium excited by the inordinate privileges of the moneyed community largely contributed to the reform in England; and to a similar cause may be traced the French revolution; as the exemption from taxation enjoyed by the privileged orders of France, was, in effect, and actual substance, the same as a cession here of a sovereign right to a 'favored few' to tax the many for their special and exclusive benefit. And the privileged orders of corporators, in contemplation of this view, constitute the moneyed aristocracy, or idle and luxurious, who consume the fruits of the laboring classes, without contributing to their production. And this brings us to the original proposition, and to the conclusion that, if banks be necessary for the convenience of commerce, and the support of industry, let them belong to the States, and let the revenues derived from the voluntary contributions of the borrowers, be justly distributed for the common benefit of all the people. The committee, in support of their opinion, refer particularly, as the strongest case in point, to the Bank of the State of South Carolina, which is founded on the principle proposed, and which, through a successful course of twenty years, has more than realized the expectations of its projectors."

In support of the conclusions of the committee, they submitted with their report various extracts from letters of distinguished statesmen, from which I have selected the following, being only such as relate to the Bank of South Carolina:

From the late Governor of South Carolina, now a Senator in Congress.

"WASHINGTON, Feb. 11, 1832.

DEAR SIR: I received your esteemed letter, together with your report upon the subject of a State Bank in Maryland. The scheme proposed conforms very much with the character of our bank, from which we have derived large annual profits since its establishment, nearly twenty years ago, and the whole fiscal concerns of our State are passed through the public bank, which belongs to the State exclusively."

"Gov. James Hamilton, Jr. transmitted the usual Message to the Legislature of South Carolina, on the 29th November, congratulating that body on the abundant productiveness of the State Bank."

From a representative in Congress from S. Carolina.

"From authentic information and official documents, it appears that the success of the State Bank of South Carolina has been continuous and uniform throughout a course of nearly twenty years; during which it had to encounter the trying fluctuations of the money market, which brought the Bank of the United States to the very verge of dissolution, and all the revolutions and vicissitudes of trade and commerce from 1812 to the present time, including the disastrous years of 1819, '20, '25, and '26, from which it seems that the intrinsic merit and solidity of principle have been the main pillars of its support."

In addition to the foregoing extracts, I will add the following from the present Governor of South Carolina, who states, in his last Message, that the "liabilities of the banks of that State to all others than their stockholders, amount to $7,772,554 85; their whole assets $19,256,162 78; whole security to holders of notes and depositors, including individual liability of their stockholders to double the amount of their stock, exclusive of the State Bank, $34,438,364 78." "To this (is stated in his message) must be added the pledge of the State for the liabilities of the Bank of the State of South Carolina."

It would seem, from the foregoing statements, that South Carolina has acted with wisdom and prudence on the subject of banking, and I am much surprised that more of our States have not heretofore followed her example.

But, sir, if the States will continue to create private corporations for banking purposes, let them reform our banking system, by establishing those institutions upon principles different from those on which they are now based. Let the corporators be placed upon the same footing, and be made responsible in the same manner to the community as copartners engaged in other pursuits. If a company of individuals associate themselves together as merchants, each and all of them are liable for the debts of the concern. The law makes each partner responsible for the debts and liabilities incurred by the firm. There is no reason why a company of bankers should be individually exempted from this responsibility. Banking, like the vending of merchandise, is but a trade, a business, carried on for the purposes of profit; and a single bank may do more injury to the community than could be done by fifty merchants. Stockholders should, therefore, be individually responsible for the liabilities of the institution, at least to double or triple the amount of their stock subscribed. If, in addition to this, they were prohibited from commencing banking operations until three-fourths of the stock subscribed shall have been actually and availably paid in; their issues not allowed to exceed the amount of specie on hand beyond a reasonable proportion; their dividends and profits limited to a certain per cent. beyond which the stockholders should in no event be allowed to receive any thing; and the directors excluded from all stock or banking accommodations; the community would have some security against imposition, and the condition of the currency would be greatly ameliorated. The paper of such an institution would always command the most implicit confidence on the part of the public, without which no bank can be otherwise than an injury to the community in which it exists. In this, sir, I suggest nothing more than what is perfectly practicable—nothing beyond what may be effected by close, well guarded restrictions, which may easily be rendered efficient by the Legislatures creating such institutions, especially if they will reserve to themselves the power at all times to correct errors in their charters, or abuses in their administration. If the States create corporations for the purpose of enabling them to furnish the community with a currency, they are bound by every consideration, moral and political, to protect the community against their abuses. It is in vain to expect that corporate stockholders, who are allowed to bank as they please, and to whatever extent they may desire, and be at the same time individually irresponsible, will ever heed the public welfare, or neglect to sacrifice it whenever it hangs heavily on their prospects of gain, or comes in collision with their interest. They will always be too mindful of their own interest to keep watch over that of the public. As was said with great truth by Scotland's bard,

"——Mankind are unco weak,
And little to be trusted:
If self the wavering balance shake,
It's rarely right adjusted.

REMARKS OF MR. DUNCAN, OF OHIO,

n the House of Representatives, Dec. 18, 1837—On the resolution offered by Mr. HAYNES of Georgia, which was as follows, viz:

Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the finances, and every thing connected therewith; to the safe-keeping of the public moneys, and every thing connected therewith; and so much as relates to the Bank of the United States; be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DUNCAN said it was not his wish to detain the committee; he merely wished to correct some errors which the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Reed,) had fallen into, in point of fact, in relation to the political or party character of the standing committees of this House—statements which, if true or uncorrected, were calculated, coming from the source they did, to injure the character of the Speaker by whom they were appointed—to prejudice the Democratic party, and the Administration whom it is said (by the Opposition) the committees favor, without regard to principle, or the sacred nature of their duties. The gentleman objects to referring the resolution in question to the Committee of Ways and Means. "It is an improper committee, because there is a majority of it that are in favor of the Administration." He says all the committees, or nearly so, are of the same character. He said the time had come when the two great contending parties of this nation were nearly equal, and he thought the character of the standing committees, with regard to party, ought also to be as nearly equal. Indeed, said Mr. D., the burthen of his song, and the volume of his speech, consisted in complaints and charges of the inequality of the committees in a party sense. His complaints have gone abroad, swift as the mail can carry them; they are now spread over the country; and while I am now correcting his errors, his political friends are weeping over the vast injustice which he represents to have been done to the Opposition by the partial and unequal party character of the standing committees. How stands the matter? Let us disclose the facts as they are; and in doing so, I do not intend to charge the gentleman with wilful misrepresentation. I think him above doing any thing dishonorable to his age, his occupation, the office he holds, or the seat he occupies. But how are the facts in relation to the party character of the committees in question?

Mr. D. read from the list, which is as follows:

1. The Committee of Elections presents a majority in favor of the Administration.
2. The Committee of Claims, for the Opposition.
3. The Committee of Ways and Means, for the Administration.
4. The Committee on Revolutionary Claims, for the Opposition.
5. The Committee on Commerce, for the Administration.
6. The Committee on Public Expenditures, for the Opposition.
7. The Committee on the Public Lands, for the Administration.
8. The Committee on Public Land Claims, for the Opposition.
9. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, for the Administration.
10. The Committee on Manufactures, for the Opposition.
11. The Committee for the District of Columbia, for the Administration.
12. The Committee on Agriculture, for the Opposition.
13. The Committee on the Judiciary, for the Administration.
14. The Committee on the Militia, for the Opposition.
15. The Committee on Indian Affairs, for the Administration.
16. The Committee on Territories, for the Opposition.
17. The Committee on Military Affairs, for the Administration.
18. The Committee on Invalid Pensions, for the Opposition.
19. The Committee on Naval Affairs, for the Administration.
20 The Committee on Roads and Canals, for the Opposition.
21. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, for the Administration.
22. The Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business, for the Opposition.
23. The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, for the Administration.
24. The Committee on Expenditure in the War Department, for the Opposition.
25. The Committee on Patents, for the Administration.
26. The Committee on Expenditures for the Navy, for the Opposition.
27. The Committee on the Public Buildings and Public Grounds, for the Administration.
28. The Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of the Post Office, for the Opposition.
29. The Committee on Accounts for the Administration.
30. The Committee on Mileage, for the Administration.
31. The Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of State, for the Administration.
32. The Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of the Treasury, for the Administration.
33. The Committee on the Expenditure on the Public Buildings, for the Opposition.

This last is an entire whole-hog modern Whig committee. Thus, with the exception of the three next preceding the last, we see that the committees run pari passu so far as party is concerned. Now, sir, what has become of the gentleman's lamentations about injustice to the minority in the appointment of committees. They have gone abroad like other Federal howlings, to have their effect on subsequent elections. I would not have been so minute in presenting the errors contained in the member's remarks, but for the daily efforts used to send abroad such misrepresentations for the purpose of destroying the influence of the Administration and bringing it into disrepute with the people. Here are letters and figures, which show, to the understanding of all who may see them, that the whole groundwork of an hour's labor to bring the honorable Speaker and the Administration into disrepute, is without existence. I say daily are such misrepresentations sent to every part of the country—to the fireside of the rich and the poor; and that, too, at the expense of the people, for no other than the unhallowed purposes of political delusion.

A word of and to the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Ewing.) He objects to the reference in question. He denounces the Committee of Ways and Means as a party committee, unworthy the confidence of the House or the people. "They have administered to the people, and their doses have been found wanting." "We have had to swallow their doses; they are bitter doses; they nauseate without relieving. The people have rejected them as inapplicable to the complaint. To the dogs with their medicine." Sir, it is not my business, said Mr. D., to defend the committee from abuse and detraction. Each of them is more able to defend himself than I am; nor does such abuse require defence or answer; it carries with it its own antidote with all intelligent, honorable, and high minded people. I only think it necessary here to say that the Committee of Ways and Means is a finance committee, and the committee to which all financial matters ought to be and always have been referred. This is the regular channel through which regular financial business flows to the House or Senate; whether presented for the consideration of Congress by the President of the United States, the Heads of Departments, members of either branch of Congress, or by private individuals; and Mr. D. saw no necessity now for crossing the usual channels of legislative business merely to gratify party hostility and vindictive whims. Mr. D. said he had some professional advice to give his friend from Indiana; and Mr. D. hoped he would receive it in a kind spirit, as that was the spirit in which it was offered, and no charge or fee should be made. He would recommend to his friend the political doses prepared and prescribed by the Committee of Ways and Means. The gentleman would eventually find them to be well calculated to improve his political health. True, they would be nauseous for a while. It was proper that they should be so. It was a wise order of Providence that all valuable medicines, such as were intended for the cure of obstinate diseases, were nauseous and sickening, disagreeable to the taste and offensive to the smell. If it were otherwise, their constant and daily use for trifling causes would render them useless for the purposes for which they were made; for it was a principle in the animal economy to adapt itself to the use of almost any application to the destruction of the effect of that application. Hence the obvious necessity for those peculiar qualities of the most valuable medicines. Political matters were so arranged that the gentleman was compelled to take the committee's doses, let the quality and quantity be what they might, nolens volens. There was no let up in the matter: the people had so ordered it, and the gentleman ought to be satisfied. He ought to take them in a spirit of resignation; and, moreover, inasmuch as the people had indirectly appointed them the political physicians to constitute the Committee of Ways and Means, to prescribe for him, he is, in conformity with the fundamental principles of the Constitution and Government he has sworn to support, bound to take their prescriptions in perfect confidence and good faith. Faith is all-important in things that relate to time as well as to eternity. The great miracles that were wrought in the days of the Apostles were wrought by faith. If my friend wishes the full benefit of the committee's prescriptions, he must have faith. True, the gentleman is laboring under very malignant and obstinate political maladies, and those too of long standing. Still Mr. D. would unhesitatingly give it as his professional opinion, that if his friend would take in good faith the committee's prescriptions, he would recover. The modus operandi, it was said by eminent physicians, of calomel and other mercurial preparations, was to produce a new disease, that is, a mercurial disease, which neutralizes and counteracts the disease which the mercury was given to cure; and this from a principle of the animal economy, that the human system will not entertain two diseases at one and the same time. The mercurial disease being the more potent, the natural disease is ejected, and the patient has only to recover from the mercurial disease, (which he is almost sure to do,) and the consequent debility thereupon, which is soon overcome by a judicious administration of the appropriate tonics. The modus operandi of the committee's prescriptions to my friend, will be similar to that just described. A new political disease will be formed, which will take the place of that under which he now labors; and he will be restored. The artificial disease which secures restoration will probably be Loco Foco, for an explanation of which I would refer my friend to the member from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) in whose keeping the term seems to be. Should my friend from Indiana pursue the course here prescribed, there is no doubt in my mind of his perfect restoration. The wounds, bruises, and putrefying sores, that now beset him from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet, will disappear; the scales will fall from his eyes, the leprosy will depart from his body, and the polluted, sickening and pestilential waters of Federalism, that inundate his system, will dry up; and, before the end of the present session, he will come out a healthy, sound, and energetic whole hog Jackson Van Buren anti-bank Democrat, from head to heels.

Mr. D. said he was bound to notice some hard things that fell from the mouth of the member from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) who immediately preceded the two gentlemen that he (Mr. D.) had in part, but imperfectly, responded to The member commenced his speech on the President's Message, by uniting with the President in prayer and thanksgiving (I hope he is not ironical) for the happy, healthy and prosperous condition our country is in at this time. The gentleman may be sincere, but this recognition on his part of happiness and prosperity for which he professes so devoutly to thank his God, does not correspond with the Federal howling, weeping, wailing and gnashing of teeth with which our ears have been greeted or rather grated for the last six months by him and his party, for the misfortunes and ruin of our poor country, by a profligate and worthless Administration, as they say, and in which howling the member has always been foremost and loudest. I think there is a Divine declaration that the prayers of the wicked avail not; how far this declaration may apply to the gentleman's case I know not; it is sufficient for me to know that we are enjoying temporal happiness beyond any people on the face of the earth, and that there never was a greater abundance of all the comforts of life in our country, at any one time, than we now enjoy; for which, I trust, we all feel that thankfulness and gratitude which become the people of a civilized and christian nation, to the Giver of all Good. But the member no sooner finishes his devotional exercises than he deserts the President, and denounces his message as "a poor thing," a "poor neglected thing," a Loco Foco document, and the author of it a vile demagogue. In relation to the quality of the Message, Mr. D. had come to a different conclusion; and he was happy to say he was not alone in that opinion. He had that morning received several letters from his friends that he had the honor to represent, whose talents and whose capacity to judge in these matters would at least compare with the member's, who united in their commendations as well of the measures recommended in it as the true Republican principles it contains; he had also received several respectable newspapers from various sections of the State he had the honor in part to represent, all of which concurred in the same high opinion of the Message. "But it was a poor neglected thing." How neglected? Not by the people. Every hour furnished intelligence that it was hailed by the friends of equal rights, and the supporters of the Constitution. When, then, or how, has it been neglected? Not by the House, for it had its attention as soon as its business would admit—as soon as the committees were formed and reported, the appropriate references were commenced to be made, and that would be continued as fast as the vindictiveness and hostility of the Opposition would permit, who so far seem determined, at all hazard, and at any expense, to cripple the administration, and obstruct the regular course of business in this House. The member, after denouncing the whole Message in these general terms, takes it up by parts and denounces it. From page ninth, he reads: "On that occasion (meaning and referring to the extra session) three modes of performing this branch of the public service (meaning the safe-keeping and transfer of the public moneys) were proposed!" Here the member stopped short, gave us one of his wondrous wise looks, in which he manifested great astonishment and surprise; denounced the statement of the President as false, and asked emphatically, and with an air of apparent triumph and defiance, "who will or dare say that there were three propositions for such a purpose presented to Congress at the extra session?" "Who in this House," he repeated, "dare assert such a thing." I dare assert it, (said Mr. D.) and I dare assert it without the fear of successful contradiction from any man from any quarter. He said he had heard members before use the word dare in a wrong and improper manner. To say a member dare not do a thing, was using language that could not be carried out. It was too strong an expression. There were members here who dare say any thing that truth, justice, and moral principle did not prohibit. Mr. D. said he had surveyed most of the members of the House; he, with his eye, measured their length, their breadth, their circumference, and their diameter, and, more particularly, the eye, which was the index to the heart; and he had seen nothing in the shape of a modern Whig that ought, for a moment, to deter a man from saying any thing. He repeated, that he dare say there were three propositions before Congress at the extra session, for the safe-keeping and the transfer of the public moneys, all of which received the attention and the action of Congress; and this, too, he dare say on his own responsibility, without even turning to the journals. The first proposition he would name was the Sub-Treasury system, (usually so called,) recommended by the President in his message. The second was a proposition made by a small party here, called the Conservatives, which was, in the language of the President's Message, "the revival, with modifications, of the deposite system established by the act of the 23d of June, 1836," etc. and the third proposition was a national bank; none of which can be said to have received the definite action of Congress except the last named proposition; and that, it is hoped, got its last and final sentence, and everlasting doom, by a large majority of both branches; so I throw back the charge of falsehood upon the member from Virginia.

When the member finished his daring and bantering tirade, he amused himself and his friends awhile by singing glory and hallelujahs to the recent Whig victories. This he and his party had a right to do when there was any thing that would do for an apology for a Whig victory; for they were "Like angels' visits; few, and far between."

They came about as often as the locusts, but were not quite so destructive as that insect when sent upon the Egyptians as a divine curse.

Here, Mr. D. said, as he was about to trace up and present the genealogy of the Whig victories, it was necessary for him to explain what he meant by the term, as applied to the party opposed to the Administration. He wished it distinctly understood, that when he used the term Whig it was not because there was any applicability in the term, to the principles of the Opposition; it was merely to accommodate them. The Opposition were in the habit of taking to themselves a new name as often, at least, as the return of each Presidential election. They had nearly exhausted the political vocabulary. They take a name for political effect. They ask to be known by it so long as it will answer that purpose, or until it is degraded. The last name by which they ask to be known, is "Whig:" not that they possess any of the political principles of the patriots of '76, who were known by that name, and which was at that time, and really is now, synonymous with "Democrat."

The term Whig in the United States at this time is significant of Federalist in '96, a term that the self-named Whigs of this day were then proud of, but their principles are still the same. Of this truth we have some practical demonstrations. We are all aware of a sanguinary war now raging on our borders in the Canadas. The patriots of Canada have snuffed the breezes from our continent, and caught the spirit of liberty which we enjoy. They have, in the language of our gallant ancestors, pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, in the cause of freedom, and are now battling for independence.

The citizens of the United States have taken sides, (in feeling and spirit.) You find the Democracy on the side of the patriots, who are there called Whigs; and the modern Whigs you find on the side of the tools of aristocracy and the minions of royalty, there called Tories. I hold in my hand one of the most respectable bank organs and Federal sheets perhaps in the United States, bearing no less title at its head than National Intelligencer, which contains a long article (and favorably received too) denouncing the patriots of Canada as radicals, disturbers of the peace, agrarians, etc and in character with the Fanny Wrights and the Loco Focos of the United States. Then, sir, we find that the Whigs of this country are the Tories of Canada, and the Whigs of Canada are the Democracy of this country. This is as it always has been, and as it will continue to be. I hope now that I am understood that, when I speak of the modern Whigs as a party, I mean the same party governed by the same principles that characterized the Federal party in '96, and who were known by that name.

But to return to Whig victories and Whig glory. I would advise the Whigs to use their glory sparingly. I fear they are too prodigal of it. They ought to use it that it may last until next fall; for then the people will make them sing glory to the tune of "Burns's Adieu." I think the experience and history of our country furnishes us with but three Whig victories. One of these was in the year 1796, a triumph over the principles of Democracy that will be long remembered, and can only be lost with the history of our country; a triumph that let loose the foul waters of Federalism to the inundation of the best prospects of productive liberty. This Whig victory gave birth to the alien and sedition laws, that constitute, to this day, and ever will, a foul and black spot upon the American statute book; which, though they tarnish the proud character of our free institutions, serve as an imperishable dixit that, great and good as is our political fabric, and great as were the sacrifices of life, blood, and property by which it was purchased, it is but a human institution; and to preserve it requires nothing short of the vigilance and patriotism that wrested it from the hand of tyranny.

I think the next Whig victory is to be found in the chronicles of 1824. This was a most glorious victory, inasmuch as it was a victory over popular suffrage. It was worth all the other victories put together. It was a victory of the aristocracy of wealth over the democracy of numbers. True, it was obtained in direct violation of the spirit and meaning of our Constitution, in the abuse of our free institutions, and in the face and name, and nature of our Government; but this did not make the victory the less glorious with those who can stretch the Constitution to the extent of their own wishes. The glory of this victory lasted four years, and was not unlike a Bacchanalian feast for that length of time; but the people, true to their common country when it is in danger, rallied in their majesty to the polls, and swept from the chessboard the political workers of iniquity of that day, and with them their glory.

We now come to the victories of 1837, to which the gentleman has been so long and so loud singing glory, assisted by those of his friends who could join in the chorus, and those who could not, done their part by looking effect to the best advantage. Sir, if justice to the subject would permit, I would not for a moment disturb the member and his friends in the enjoyments of their supposed victories, but I feel bound to make some expositions in relation to the recent elections. The member, in his ecstacies, makes some assertions that the true results of the recent elections will not bear him out in. He tells us in his shouts of joy that the people have risen in their strength from Maine to Mississippi, and denounced the President and his Loco Foco Sub-Treasury scheme. I suppose he has reference to the result of the elections in Maine, New York, and Mississippi. As all this display of victory and glory is for home consumption and party effect, it is a duty I owe to the cause, and the party I support, to give some statistics that will present these elections in a different light. Maine has not polled her strength since 1834; there has been no excitement in that State since, sufficient to draw her voters out; at that time her Democratic vote was 38,000, and her Whig vote 34,000, the aggregate 72,000. In 1837, the two candidates for Governor had about 34,000 each, it is not known which is elected. The Senate of Maine is decidedly Democratic. It is evident that the Democratic strength was not at the polls by between four and five thousand, while the entire Whig strength was: their vote being the same that it was in 1834. The absence of the Democratic vote can be accounted for from the fact that the Democracy of Maine, as well as of every other State in the Union, are the laboring classes of society, and never all turn out to elections, unless there is an exciting question.

How is it with New York? By the returns of 1834, (a year of excitement, and the only since that time,) compared with the returns of 1837, there is an aggregate deficiency of near 54,000 votes; there is a Democratic deficiency of 41,000, and a Whig deficit of 13,000. How, then, let me ask, can New York be said to have denounced the President and his Loco Foco Sub-Treasury scheme? Does the result of the elections in New York either show a change of political principle in that State, or does it denounce the President in the unmeasured terms represented by the member? But how stands Mississippi?—gallant Democratic Mississippi must be lugged into the jubilee; she must be dragged forward to swell the Federal triumph, for which this day seems to be set apart. It would seem that policy would have dictated a different course with regard to Mississippi, lest the whole object of all the bacchanalian feasts would be disclosed to the people in whose eyes it is intended to throw dust.

It is well known that Mississippi has just elected a Democratic Governor by a large majority; nearly all her cabinet officers and a large majority of both branches of the legislature are Democratic. The Whigs have indeed returned two members to Congress, but the election was entirely a one-sided business. The present worthy and talented members (Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson) were elected in July. When they presented themselves to be qualified as members, an Opposition member on this floor objected on the ground that the election had been ordered for the extra session only, and was, therefore, null and void.

The objection was overruled, but the whole case was referred to the Committee of Elections. The Committee reported in favor of the sitting members; and after a protracted, careful and deliberate examination of the whole case and the circumstances connected with it, of both a legal and constitutional character, this House sustained the report, and adopted these gentlemen members for the entire twenty-fifth Congress. These gentlemen were not candidates at the fall elections. The democracy of Mississippi held no election for Congressmen, except where they were unapprised of the decision of this House. But the modern Whigs of Mississippi, in character with their party elsewhere, regardless of law and the solemn decision of this body, assuming that Congress had not the constitutional right to decide upon the competency of its own members, (a right which is as palpable and as express as any other power on the face of that instrument, and until now has never been denied,) went on to vote for candidates, and having no opposition, of course elected them. If this be a Whig victory, the member and his party are welcome to it, with all the other victories over which they are now glorifying. But when the free people of this Union look at the result, they will say that the Democracy of Mississippi have gloriously triumphed, and that their Congressional election was the mere spasm of an expiring faction. The last struggle of a party which, whether known as Federalists, National Republicans, Bank men, Anti-Masons, or Modern Whigs, have always been known by their unyielding and uncompromising hostility to the Democratic party and the Democratic principles, as well as their law and constitutional defying spirit. So much for Mississippi and her recent elections. Now, sir, I will ask, in the spirit of candor, where is the cause for all this Whig rejoicing? Where does the member find reason to justify the broad assertion, that the people from Maine to Mississippi have denounced the President or any of his measures? Is there any thing in the result of these elections that would justify the President in deserting the principles he has always practised, the party to which he belongs, and the measures upon which he was elected? The people will answer this.

The member has amused us with some fine sayings and sweet stories in favor, in approbation, and in confidence of the dear people, and in confirmation of their capacity for self-government. When did the member acquire this late confidence in the wisdom of the people, so at war with every principle of the party to which he belongs? Will the member be so good as to favor us with his experience that has brought about this wonderful conversion, by which he is brought to worship at the shrine of the people's wisdom? Was it by the glorious triumph of popular suffrage and the Constitution over corruption, coalition and bribery in 1828, when the people, in their patriotism, their strength and their majesty, crushed at one blow the midnight workers of the political iniquity by which they were defrauded of the Chief Magistrate of their choice, by the election of Andrew Jackson, and by which the violated Constitution was restored, and the right of suffrage secured? Was it then that the member formed his attachments for the dear people, and his confidence in their wisdom and integrity? Or was it in 1832, when the same people elected the same distinguished individual to the same distinguished office, which is the highest in their gift, and the highest that man can hold, and that, too, in gratitude for prostrating a faithless institution, that the member is now sustaining, to the utmost of his ability, in defiance of the thrice expressed will of the same people, to whose wisdom he is singing hosannas? Or was it in 1834, the memorable panic era? This was a time that tried men's souls; corruption and bribery walked naked, shameless, and fearless, in the highways. The wealth of the aristocracy was spread over the land, to the corruption and bribery of every man, and every institution. The newspaper presses were bought in the public market, and in open day, and bribed at midnight in secret corners. The doubting were made to tremble, and the firm to fear; but still the Democracy stood fast; they rallied to the standard of the man that never deserted them in their country's greatest perrils. The country was saved, and the Constitution was saved. Was it then, I ask, that the member in confidence, and in gratitude, throwed himself into the arms of the people, and embraced their faith?

The President, in conformity with the duties he owed to his country, and the solemn oath he had taken to execute the laws and to administer the Government according to the best of his skill and ability, regarded it as an imperious duty to remove the deposites of the public money from a faithless, worthless, dangerous, and unconstitutional institution, that had been vetoed by the people, and by the exercise of this duty had drawn upon his devoted head the concentrated wrath and indignation of the United States Bank and the aristocracy of the country; but the old soldier, who knew no fear or any interest except that of his common country, met the storm and triumphed, for he was on the side of justice and the people. I ask, was it then that the member enrolled himself on the side of the people? or was it the little, petty, short-lived Whig victories of 1837 that have removed the scales from his eyes, and brought him to a sense of the power, the wisdom, and the justice of the people?

The member seems apt at calling names, and with others of his party colleagues here, at prefering charges against the Democracy of Executive influence, vassalage and corruption. These charges seem to be as common as the ordinary day business of this House. I think, sir, charges of this kind come from the Opposition in bad taste and worse time. A party who, (with many honorable exceptions, I am happy to say,) live, move, and have their political being, and daily support, by and from the banks. No southern slave whose bondage is absolute and unconditional, is more under the dominion of his master than hundreds and thousands of that party, (who, by their representatives, are daily making these charges against the Democracy and their representatives,) are under the control and dominion of the banks. Look, sir, at their newspaper presses; how far have they fallen from the holy purposes for which they were originally invented and established! In place of being the mediums through which virtue, science, and general intelligence is to flow to the public mind, they have become the receptacles of all that is abominable in slander and vile in detraction. Their columns have become the filthy suers and polluted sluices, through which there is no slander too base, or falsehood too malignant and poisonous, to pass to the destruction of morals and the peace of society.

The virtuous and the patriotic find no advocates in them. The warrior and the statesman, whose lives have been worn down in the service of their country's highest interests, are alike the subjects of their abuse and detraction. And look, sir, at their swarms of letter-writers, who annoy you at every step and every corner, who, like lank, lounging, hungry dogs, that lean upon the gate posts, and yelp and howl around this Capitol, and feed upon the crumbs that fall from the tables of those who are themselves the subjects of bank corruption and Federal bribery. I say such charges come in bad time and in bad taste from such a party. The Democracy are emphatically the freemen of this country. They depend not on banks nor on the smiles of the Aristocracy for their maintenance. They depend upon their sweat, their toil, the fields that they have cleared with their own hands, and the rains of Heaven, for all they have and all they wish.

But the member calls names. He has denounced the whole Democratic party, with a bitterness and vindictiveness I hope unworthy of his heart, as Loco Focos. I am unacquainted with the meaning of the term Loco Foco; it is of a tongue unknown to me. If the term is political in its signification, and is expressive of a love of liberty, a regard for the support and literal construction of the Constitution, a disposition to support our free institutions, and an unyielding hostility to a national bank, to odious political distinctions, unconstitutional monopolies, and exclusive and dangerous privileges for the benefit of the few to the exclusion of the many, then I am a Loco Foco, and I am proud of the name; I hope I shall never abuse or disgrace it. But I am now going to tell you, sir, another thing I dare do. I dare pronounce any man on this floor or elsewhere, a base LIAR and a reckless SCOUNDREL, who dare denounce me a Loco Foco, and attach thereto any other political meaning than that which I have just described.

The member pronounces the President a vile demagogue. I have heard this member before denounce the President and all his Cabinet, as knaves and fools. But why is the President denounced as a vile demagogue? I suppose it is because he holds the true Democratic doctrine in his Message, that "the voice of the people is the supreme law of the land;" and because he pledges himself to give to the measures adopted by Congress his hearty co-operation, to the fullest extent which his views of the Constitution and his sense of duty will permit.

Mr. Chairman, I think there can be no better evidence that a man is a vile demagogue himself, than to hear him perpetually denouncing other statesmen and politicians without discrimination, vile demagogues, knaves and fools, who are opposed to him in politics.

The world has never been clear of demagogues since the first formation of government. Egypt, in her first Government, had her demagogues. Cyrus came near being destroyed by a demagogue. Darius fraudulently ascended the throne of Persia by the intrigues of a demagogue. Carthage had her demagogues, as the unhappy fate and misfortunes of the brave Hannibal, who subdued the Alps, conquered on the plains of Italy, and carried the Carthaginian arms to the gates of Rome, and the downfall of her Government, and destruction of her city, will bear testimony. Greece had her demagogues, as the persecution and death of her good, wise, and just Socrates will bear evidence. Rome had her demagogues; and the United States have their demagogues.

If there is any one abominable thing on the face of the earth more abominable than another, it is a vile demagogue. Kingdoms have been prostrated; empires have been dissolved, and Republics have been subverted by demagogues. The greatest, the wisest, and the most virtuous men that ever adorned the human family have been brought to poverty, persecution, and death by vile demagogues. There is no man who now moulders with the dead, who was more slandered and traduced than has been the statesman, the patriot, and the philosopher of Monticello, by the vile demagogues of the same party to which the member belongs. There is no man who mingles with the living, who has been more traduced and vilified by vile demagogues, of the same party, than has been the winter bleached patriot of the Hermitage, who only lives to link the living with the dead, and to tell the stories of the Revolution, and the sufferings, hardships, and privations of our fathers, with a warm heart, and with living lips. Can Mr. Van Buren then expect to escape the slander and detraction of vile demagogues? When he does, he must know he has lost favor with his God and his country. Reward awaits virtue and merit. This is a Divine promise.

The names of those statesmen and patriots, when all now living will be mingling with the dust, will occupy a part of the brightest page of American history, and will still live in the grateful remembrances of their countrymen, while the names of the vile demagogues who have traduced them, and are now slandering them, will be consigned to the rubbish of a corner, or only be seen in the polluted columns of a bought or bribed and a corrupted newspaper.

REMARKS OF MR. POTTER, OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In the House of Representatives, January 4, 1838—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The following resolution of Mr. HAYNES being under consideration:

Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the finances, and every thing connected therewith; to the safe-keeping of the public moneys, and every thing connected therewith; and so much as relates to the Bank of the United States, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means."

On the 19th December, Mr. CUSHING of Massachusetts submitted the following resolution as a substitute for parts of the resolution of Mr. HAYNES:

"WHEREAS, the influence of the Executive Department of the Federal Government has, for some time past, in derogation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution, continued to increase, and ought to be diminished:

"Resolved, therefore, That in order to correct the said abuse, so much of the President's Message as relates to the collection, safe-keeping, and transfer of the public money, be referred to ———, with instructions to report:

"First, such method of keeping the public treasure, effects, and other property, as in the judgment of the said committee shall most conduce to promote the welfare, and to secure the liberties of the people; and, secondly, such other reforms in the practices of the Government as in their opinion shall tend to bring back the administration thereof to the standard of the original purity of the Constitution."

Mr. POTTER, being entitled to the floor, rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The reading of the Constitution, as expounded by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, prefacing the introduction of the resolution offered by him, in many points accords with the Republican code of 1799. Light has broken upon us from a region heretofore hostile to the Conservative doctrines of a strict construction of the delegated powers of the Constitution. All should concur in the soundness of the positions, that public opinion is the ultimate arbiter of every measure of Government, and that a salutary jealousy of the encroachments of power is germain to the preservation of free institutions. The checks and balances of power, as delegated to the co-ordinate branches of the Government, must be sacredly preserved, to retain the symmetry of the whole. Whenever either branch take a single step beyond the boundary designated and drawn around them by the Constitution, they wander into a boundless field, susceptible of no clear or accurate definition. So long as we preserve the principle "that all powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people," and restrain each separate branch of the Government in its constitutional orbit, the people of this country will be free, in the loftiest sense of freedom. Free to do all good; restricted only from evil; every man pursuing the bent of his own genius or fortune; every citizen protected by laws inviolable, or whose violation is instantly punished, by certain and just penalties—we will only cease to be free when the people becomes corrupt. When that period arrives, freedom will not be found here. When you witness the contumely of man to man; the vindictiveness of popular rage; the down cast visage and degraded form of the corrupted serf—you may with certainty pronounce this people are no longer free. They have abandoned freedom's living principles—justice, temperance, and truth. The infringement of any of the constitutional powers of either of the three branches of our Government should be met at the threshhold. If the Executive has "in derogation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution," trenched on the judicial or legislative powers, it should be sternly rebuked, and confined to its constitutional boundaries. In doing this, we should be careful not to inflict a wound upon the principles of the Constitution. Republics should guard against the danger of faction, and always bear in mind, that in the midst of glowing harangues and pompous professions, the most deadly stabs are aimed at liberty. Recollect the fate of France: for a time the mightiest of republics; for the mercy of heaven the briefest: all was hypocrisy that was not horror—equal rights were those of equal robbery—liberty veiled her face, and the offerings on her violated shrine, were the spoils of patriotism, virtue, and honor.

The reasons assigned for a departure from the usual course of reference, demands a careful and attentive consideration. The truth of the bold assumptions, of usurpation of power "in derogation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution," contained in the resolution, should be tested. That portion of the President's Message, referring to the financial relations of the Government, have been brought into review, and the recommendations of the President arraigned with peculiar asperity. It is alleged that an appeal was taken from the principles of the Message sent in at the extra session to the people, and that the response has been gloriously against the President; that new light has been shed on the vexed question of a national bank; that the ignis fatuus that led Tennessee, with other sections of the Union, astray, has been dissipated, and that the broad and glorious banner of a new monopoly "streams in light;" that Maine, Rhode Island, and New York have rebuked the President, yet he contumaciously adheres to his course. As to the elections in Rhode Island and Maine, the principles developed in the Message could have had, in the first, no influence whatever, and in the latter, not one out of one thousand of the voters had seen or read it before casting their suffrages. In New York, their State elections were mixed up with numerous ingredients. Nay, it is evident that, in the one party, there was union, zeal, money, and talent; in the other, supineness, discord, and division. The rejoicing and illuminations for the victory of party, in that State, by many who were "too moral and religious" to rejoice and illuminate for the victory of their country's arms over a foreign enemy, may raise a spirit in the empire State which will turn this joy into sorrow. What do the political opponents of the President desire him to recommend—a national bank? This the honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Underwood) points out as the panacea for every ill. Can the President consistently recommend this measure? A high regard for the "national will" constitutes a primary article in the creed of Democracy. When fully expressed, it should, on every occasion, be the rule governing the public functionary in his official action within the pale of the Constitution. Sovereignty rests in the people, who created this Government to secure and protect their liberties, and advance their prosperity and happiness. All, in every station, should bow with submission to the popular will. This voice has been heard again and again, within the last few years, on the question of a national bank; and in language which "those who run may read," the American people have rejected the project. The late President, pending the canvass for re-election, vetoed the bill rechartering the bank, and fearlessly cast himself upon the intelligence, virtue, and patriotism of the people for support. The response was given in characters of living light; the subject was fully discussed and perfectly understood; the power of an existing institution of great strength, and whose branches were deeply rooted in every State in the Union, was enlisted in the conflict. What was the result? The re-election, by an unprecedented majority of the electoral votes, of that man, who had staked his political destiny on opposition to a national bank. This was no pehemeral voice of the people, but a direct and constitutional expression of the popular will.

The decisive measure of the removal of the deposites from the vaults of the bank, produced a second conflict before the people. The succeeding Congressional elections in every State in the Union were made to turn on the questions of support or opposition to the bank, and approval or hostility to this measure of the Executive. Who does not recollect the remarkable epoch of the "panic session of Congress?" a period memorable in the history of our country for the fierceness of the political contest that convulsed Congress and the country. A majority in the Senate, composed of men, whose brilliant talents and commanding eloquence would have shed lustre upon any deliberative body in the world, in opposition to the Administration, arraigned the President before that high tribunal, and declared his acts relative to the removal of the deposites to be in derogation of the Constitution and laws. This severe censure was published to the world, and carried, as if upon the winds, to every city, town, and hamlet, in the Union. Pecuniary distress and embarrassment were brought upon the people by the action of the bank, clamor raised to a fearful extent, and the walls of the Capitol, for days and weeks, and months, made to echo and re-echo with eloquent denunciations against the tyranny and usurpations of the Executive, and the timid and base subserviency of the Democratic members of Congress to the mandate of power. Yet the people, unawed, intelligent, fearless, and free, returned a majority of the friends of the Administration into this Hall; and State after State, on the expiration of the Senatorial term of the incumbents, sent into the other wing of the Capitol advocates of this leading measure against the bank. The election of the present Chief Magistrate was not devoid of a like test of the popular will on this question. An honorable gentleman, pending the canvass, called upon the candidates for an expression of their opinions, upon the expediency and constitutionality of creating a national bank. A full, frank, and explicit opinion, adverse to the power of creating a bank under the Constitution, as well as its expediency, was given by the President. This declaration of principles was published to the constituency of the Executive, and was acted upon by them. The party press hostile to the election of Mr. Van Buren, made it a prominent topic of discussion and attack. On the other hand, his friends sustained him, on the ground of opposition to a bank. Thus it was known to every voter, that if he was successful in the contest, so far as Executive approval was necessary to the creation of a bank, there existed an insurmountable difficulty. The official oath "to support the Constitution" to him who believed that the people had not delegated to Congress power to incorporate a bank, was an impassable barrier. With this clear exposition of constitutional principles before them, a majority of the people elected the present Executive. So much for the expression of public opinion, on mature reflection and elaborate discussion, when the very point at issue was before them. Has it been reversed? Has Georgia gone in favor of a bank? The recently elected Governor of that State denies the power of the United States, under the Constitution, to create corporations. South Carolina rears aloft her palmeto flag, inscribed with the principles ingrafted in the Message. A majority of both Houses of Congress have, at the recent session, declared against a national bank.

Time will tell whether New York has abandoned her principles, and deserted her favorite son, for a faithful adherence to Democratic doctrines. I apprehend the late election will be found to be no test in that State on this question. The repeated action of the people was certainly intended to be operative on the Chief Magistrate, elected under auspices similar to those which marked the elevation of the President. How, then, would he stand before his constituents and his God, if he should, without change of opinion on the constitutional delegation of power, recommend the creation of a national bank? A recreant to his conscience, and a betrayer of the trust confided to him, his name would become a hissing and scorn in all future time—condemned and despised by those who now charge it upon him as a crime that he does not make himself this abandoned thing.

The reception of the depreciated paper of non-specie-paying banks in the collection of the revenue finds no advocates here or elsewhere. The deposite act of 1836 must be repealed, before a re-union of the Treasury with the State institutions can be solemnized. The act of suspension dissolved the connection. Is it true policy to renew it? The dishonor of their own bills caused a cessation of the interchange of bank notes and bank credits at par between the institutions of the different States. This precluded the Treasury Department from the facility of transferring the funds on deposite from the various points where collected to the places where they were to be expended by law and the wants of the Government. However abundant the revenue was, in its general product, it became inadequate in the process of its application. The possession of public funds deposited in the Western and Southwestern banks afforded no evidence of a fiscal capacity to discharge a public debt on the Atlantic seaboard. The difference of exchange increased the embarrassment; as the amount of Legislative appropriations are uniform, wherever the objects are to be effected; no allowance having ever been sanctioned by Congress on account of the varying rate of exchange. The plain duty, in relation to the debtors and creditors of the Government is to produce uniformity; no creditor should receive more and no debtor should pay less, on the same account, than every other debtor and creditor in the nation. All demands should be provided for promptly and efficiently, at the proper place of payment. The fiscal arrangements of the Government should be so directed, as to do justice to all the people, as well in the collection as disbursement of the revenue. Experience has demonstrated, that these objects cannot be attained through the fiscal agency of local banks, under the existing laws, and the reception of depreciated paper issues for the dues of Government. The collection of the revenue in the constitutional currency, or its equivalent, and the care and custody of its funds by the Government, either in the hands of public agents, or on special deposite with corporations, is the remedy recommended by the President. Has this a tendency to increase Executive power? It is apprehended that the reverse would be found to be the effect in its practical operation. We have seen the Executive and National Bank antagonist powers in conflict. It required the prodigious personal popularity of the remarkable man who lately filled the Executive chair to withstand the efforts of the bank to prostrate him and the great party which sustained him. If they had been united, what power in this nation could have consummated their overthrow? Nothing but a revolution and civil war, in which the energies of an enraged people were exerted, would have sufficed to have produced such a result. The first impulse in the nature of banks is to make money and support the power which can sustain and promote their interests. Their very constitution makes them allies of power; to advance their interests, and increase their profits, if moving in harmonious action with the Executive branch of the Government, it is feared, they would sustain its measures even if they would "sting the political liberty of this country to death." To guard against the recurrence of evils, and to restrain banking corporations within their appropriate and legitimate sphere, is the desirable object which every sound statesman should endeavor to effect. The power of the National Government over State institutions is exceedingly limited. The remedy must come from the State sovereignties. The renovation of the system belongs to them. Banks are so intimately interwoven in our habits, so connected with our domestic institutions, that none but a madman could contemplate their destruction. They were called into being to subserve the interests of the community. Lop off their excrescences and they minister to the prosperity of the country. Intimately blended with the business of the whole people, their true interests should be cherished and protected as part and parcel of the general industry of the country. When their notes are convertible, at the will of the holder, into specie, they are the representatives of value, and then become the equivalent to specie. When they cease to be redeemable on presentation, their reception for the dues of the Government, would banish equality of taxation, a fundamental principle of our institutions. The reception of the notes of the State institutions for duties or taxes was first recognised by Congress in the adoption of the joint resolution of 1816. Prior to that period, it was left to the vigilance and discretion of the Executive department. The act of 1789 required "all duties to be received in gold and silver only." The construction given to the act in 1790 was, that it was confined to two objects: "1st, the exclusion of payments in the paper emissions of the particular States; and 2d, in securing the immediate and ultimate collection of the duties in specie." Under this construction, the revenue was received in the notes of State banks, convertible, at the will of the holder, into the precious metals. This basis of their reception should not be widened; it is certainly as broad as the interests of the Union require. The point at issue may be reduced to a single proposition: Are the State banks entitled to the public moneys, to be deposited with them as capital to bank upon, or to be used as a means of increasing their dividends, and enhancing the profits of the stockholders? The benefit is confined to the few, to the exclusion of the many; a spirit of wild speculation is engendered by the over-issues of banking institutions; an inordinate thirst for gambling is diffused among the mass of the community; an emergency arises: contraction, as an immutable law of trade, follows expansion; the circulating medium is rapidly decreased, and poverty and distress overwhelm the community. These are the evils that flowed from a union of the public money with State institutions. Are they to be renewed?

The organization of the standing committees by the presiding officer of this House, is another reason assigned for a departure, from the usual mode of reference. The allegation is, that he has improperly given to the friends of the Administration, an unusual preponderance on the committees, and excluded the Opposition from their just representation. There is nothing so easily made as general declamation and loose charges. To sustain them by facts, is a much more difficult task. The touchstone of truth disipates the mist, and tests their accurac. By the rules and orders of the House, thirty-two standing committees, exclusive of the Committee on Mileage, are to be appointed by the Speaker. In the performance of this duty, the utmost fairness and liberality was extended to the political opponents of the Administration. Out of the thirty-two standing committees, fifteen have, in their composition, a majority of members politically hostile to the Administration. In proportion to the numbers of the two great parties which divide this country upon the floor of this hall, candor must admit that this is no unequal distribution of power. The Committee of Ways and Means, and of several other committees, which are intimately connected in their duties with the Executive branch of the Government, and requiring consultation with, and reciprocal trust and confidence between, the various heads of departments and the committees, have in their composition a majority of the friends of the Administration. Is this unusual and contrary to the course pursued by other presiding officers, who were the predecessors of the present incumbent? A recurrence to the past history of legislaion in this country exhibits no instance of the Speaker elected by the friends of the Administration, giving to the minority the control of those committees. The Administration are responsible to the nation for the successful issue of the Executive duties while entrusted to their hands; yet their adversaries complain of unfairness, because the political friends of the Administration in this House do not surrender it, bound hand and foot, into their safe and holy keeping. I would concede greatly to these honorable gentlemen, and have confidence in their sagacity and political tact. But this is asking rather too much. The people, in the exercise of their high powers, have chosen to entrust the present Chief Magistrate with the Administration for four years. They elected a majority, avowing similar political principles, into the popular branch of the Legislature; that majority elected the Speaker. If in the selection and organization he had so arranged the committees, as to give the minority power to embarrass the Executive in the performance of his official functions, he would have been derelict in his duty to the nation, and unworthy of the high station which he occupies. No honorable man would have been guilty of such base treachery to the country and his political friends. Yet because this high functionary has not accommodated the minority, and yielded to them the control of the committees, so as to efficiently aid them in their efforts to prostrate the Administration, all is wrong; and he, in obedience to orders from the palace, has surrendered the rights and liberties of the House. So it has ever been, and so it will remain. Party and political intolerance knows no liberality, when urged on by the hope of attaining power.

It is due to the Speaker to say, that he has won the meed of approbation from political friends and foes, by the suavity of manner, dignity, and impartiality with which he has filled the duties incident to the honorable and arduous post which he occupies. Contrast the political complexion of the committees in other days, and under former Administrations, with their present organization, and it will be self-evident that no cause has been given for this assault upon the Speaker. In the first session of the 19th Congress, during the period you, sir, (Mr. Adams) was President, and your political friend, Mr. Taylor, Speaker, the committees were thus arranged, (see Journal, page 27.) Committees consisting of 7 members:

The Committee of Ways and Means, four Administration and three Opposition.

Foreign Affairs, five Administration and two Opposition.

Manufactures, five Administration and two Opposition.

Naval Affairs, five Administration and two Opposition.

The second session, (see Journal, page 23.)

The Committee of Ways and Means, five Administration and two Opposition.

Foreign Affairs, five Administration and two Opposition.

Judidiary, four Administration and two Opposition.

Naval Affairs, five Administration and two Opposition.

Subsequently, during the Administration of President Jackson, a majority of his political friends elected Mr. Stevenson, of Virginia, Speaker. During his administration of the duties of that station, the organization of committees will be apparent by the following extracts:

First session of the Twenty-first Congress, (see Journal, page 27.)

The Committee of Ways and Means, five Administration and two Opposition.

Commerce, five Administration and two Opposition.

Judiciary, four Administration and three Opposition.

Manufactures, five Administration and two Opposition.

Foreign Affairs, five Administration and two Opposition.

Military Affairs, six Administration and one Opposition.

Second Session of the Twenty-First Congress. (See Journal, page 34.)

The Committee of Ways and Means, five Administration and two Opposition.

Commerce, six Administration and one Opposition.

Judiciary, five Administration and two Opposition.

Military Affairs, six Administration and one Opposition.

Foreign Affairs, five Administration and two Opposition.

At the Second Session of the Twenty-Third Congress, during the Presidency of Gen. Jackson, a distinguished and able gentleman, whose talents and political tact has commanded my highest admiration, exerted, in opposition to the Administration, succeeded Mr. Stevenson in the Speaker's chair—I allude to the honorable gentleman (Mr. Bell,) from Tennessee. How did he organize the committees as to political arrangement? Did he give to the Opposition a majority on these leading committees? He had too high a sense of honor thus to betray his political associates. If he was not justly chargeable with servility and submission to the rescripts of the palace for such organization, does it become the followers in his wake, to denounce the Speaker for pursuing a precedent set by the leader of their party on this floor? By a reference to the 33d page of the Journal of the 2d session of the 23d Congress, it will be perceived, that on the Committee of Ways and Means were six Administration and three Opposition.

Foreign Affairs, seven Administration and two Opposition.

Post Office and Post Roads, six Administration and three Opposition.

Military Affairs, eight Administration and one Opposition.

Commerce, five Administration and four Opposition.

At the First Session of the Twenty-Third Congress, the Opposition had a majority in the Senate, who determined to change the rule relative to the appointment of committees. Accordingly, they took from the Vice President, Mr. Van Buren, the power of appointment, and transferred it to the Senate. How was this power exercised in the composition of the committees? The 35th page of the Senate Journal gives the response. The committees consisted of five members, viz:

Finance, four Opposition and one Administration.

Commerce, three Opposition and two Administration.

Naval Affairs, four Opposition and one Administration.

Public Lands, four Opposition to one Administration.

Post Office and Post Roads, three Opposition to two Administration.

This Committee on Finance were appointed to sit in the recess, and investigate the affairs, etc. of the Bank of the United States. It consisted of four Opposition members, and one Administration, (Judge Wilkins,) who being appointed Minister to the Court of St. Petersburg, did not attend the investigation—(see Journal, p. 391.) Was this complained of as unfair? or was it thought tyrannical and unjust by the friends of the Opposition? When operating in their favor, the rule has been rigorously enforced. Why should they now complain, when applied to themselves? The facts developed prove conclusively that the Speaker has violated no usage or principle in the organic arrangement of the committees.

The conduct of the Committee of Ways and Means at the extra session is denounced, and is said to have been such as to render it unworthy of trust. What outrage upon the rights and liberties of this House or the nation did they commit? When yield their own judgments to the Executive mandate, and registered the decrees of the palace? When interposed a barrier, excluding the people from their representatives? Sustain the accusation, that the committee are guilty of these charges so boldly made, and I, for one, will go as far as the farthest, not only to withhold any subject from being referred to them, but to purge the national councils from such unworthy members. The proof is upon those who file the accusation. If they fail to sustain their charges, they occupy no very enviable niche in the temple of fame. He who wilfully calumniates another, is destitute of every honorable feeling.

In what do these high crimes and misdemeanors of the committee, consist?

1st. That they assented to and knew that their chairman consulted the Secretary of the Treasury on the financial bills.

2d. That at the request of the chairman, the Secretary transmitted to him drafts of some of the bills; not one of which was adopted by the committee.

Was there any thing reprehensible in this? or was it in accordance with the usages and practice of committees from the origin of the Government? The third section of the second article of the Constitution, directs that the President "shall from time to time give to the Congress information on the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." Under this clause, the recommendations of the President are annually laid before Congress. In this he certainly does not derogate from either the "letter or spirit" of the Constitution. The second section of the act establishing the Treasury Department, expressly makes it the duty of the Secretary "to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit." For what purpose is this officer "to digest and prepare plans?" Evidently to communicate them to Congress, and to the committees of Congress whose duty it is to reject or mature bills to carry the plans devised and digested into effect. In the origin of the Government it was not thought to be either dictation from the White House for the Secretary of the Treasury, to submit to Congress, in a report, the plan digested for sustaining public credit; or servility in Congress to receive and act upon these suggestions. An early report of Mr. Secretary Hamilton, in 1795, exhibits the view that many of the framers of the Constitution, and of the law organizing the Treasury Department, took of the duties of the Secretary relative to every subject connected with the revenue. The custom of committees consulting with, and requiring information from, the heads of Departments, in relation to matters intimately blended with their duties, has been uniform and unbroken, during every Administration; and on all occasions, when required, the Secretary of the Treasury has communicated with committees of the House, on subjects connected with the finances of the nation. The Secretary of State, in relation to foreign affairs, has, by that committee, unquestionably been called upon for information, and doubtless, sir, you (Mr. Adams) have frequently communed with the chairman during the period that you so ably filled the station of chief of that Department. The measures taken by committees relative to a Bank of the United States, presents a striking instance of the intimate relations subsisting between the Secretary of the Treasury and committees connected with finance.

The plan of a national bank had its origin in a report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 13th of December, 1790. A memorial for the renewal of the charter was presented to Congress on the 29th of January, 1810, which was referred to a committee of seven—Mr. Montgomery of Pennsylvania being the chairman, a gentleman of as high-toned patriotism and of as pure moral integrity, as ever graced the councils of this country. This committee, through their chairman, addressed a letter to the Secretary, "requesting him to furnish such information or observations in relation to the subject-matter thereof as connected with the financial and commercial interests of the United States." In reply, the Secretary (Mr. Gallatin) referred the committee to a report he had made to the Senate, in which the plan was developed on which the re-charter, in his opinion, should be predicated. Was this application, in the purest days of our Republic, deemed an outrage on the rights and liberties of the House, and the committee thought unworthy of further trust and confidence? The discovery had not then been made that it was contamination to call on the proper head of the Department for information. The suspicion of "clandestine" arrangements between the committees of this House and the Secretary, found no abiding place in the bosoms of honorable members. At the third session of the thirteenth Congress, John W. Eppes was appointed chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and on the 14th of October, 1814, he consulted with, and applied to, the Secretary of the Treasury, "to suggest any other or such additional provisions as may be necessary to revive and maintain public credit." The plan of a bill for the incorporation of a national bank was submitted by the Secretary to the committee, in his response to the call of the chairman, and acted upon by them. In the House, after discussing for weeks the bill for the creation of a bank, on the 25th November Mr. Lowndes moved its reference to a select committee, which was adopted. Mr. Lowndes was appointed the chairman of that committee, and on the 27th November consulted Mr. Dallas, then at the head of the Treasury Department, and received his suggestions with the high respect to which they were entitled. What this distinguished South Carolinian did not hesitate to do as chairman of a committee, might certainly be done by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means without reproach. At the first session of the Fourteenth Congress, a select committee was appointed in relation "to an uniform currency," of which Mr. Calhoun of South Carolina was chairman. On the 24th December, 1815, the Secretary of the Treasury, at the request of the committee, addressed a letter to their chairman, to which was appended "the outline of a plan for the national bank, referred to in his letter." Did the enlightened and patriotic men who composed the committee, or the House of Representatives, deem this an unauthorized intrusion and usurpation of power? The idea never entered the mind of any member of the committee, or of the House. The practice, now denounced in unmeasured language, has received the sanction of precedent in all past times in the history of the Government; men of the highest order of intellect, of the purest principles, and of the most ardent patriotism, failed to discover the evils depicted, from the practice of consultation with the heads of departments. Why should the present Committee of Ways and Means be an exception to the general rule? Why should they be now arraigned and condemned, for the effort to obtain accurate and correct information on subjects pertaining to their duties? Does it arise from the reckless character of the Opposition? Does "the end justify the means?"

But ah! this committee, at the late session, did not read in the committee room the memorials presented for the establishment of a national bank. Monstrous! what unheard of audacity! a committee daring to report "that it is inexpedient to charter a national bank," without reading in their room all the memorials and all the names appended. The mass of these petitions were from the same mint—stereotyped editions of a common origin—in the same words and letters, from the crossings of the t to the dots over the i. What a flood of light they were calculated to shed on the subject! Printed and reprinted by the orders of the House—morning after morning laid on the desks of the members. Who had not seen them? who had not read them? True, all must have seen and read them, yet they were not read in the committee room. There is a magic in the reading within the walls of the committee room, which the most intimate knowledge of their contents cannot replace. It was a grave duty which the committee was bound to perform. They must not only read over and over again some forty memorials, couched in the same language, containing the same words, letters, and syllables, but they must count the names of the petitioners. For not performing this grave duty, they have committed the "unforgiven sin!" Suffer me to inquire, how it happened that the distinguished members of the Opposition, who were on that committee, did not call for the reading of these memorials? The duty was as imperative upon them as any other members of the committee; they had an equal right to read, or cause to be read, these extraordinary papers; are they too derelict in their duty to the people? Have they trampled on their rights, and disregarded their petitions? It is the first time either political friend or foe ever charged my distinguished colleague, (Mr. Sergeant,) a member of the committee, with a neglect of official duty—a gentleman of singular promptitude, in the discharge of every matter confided to his care; of great experience and commanding talents, known to be favorable to the prayer of the petitioners; can he be truly charged with treating their prayers with contumely? He never would have stood silently by and suffered the voice of the petitioners to be suppressed. Why, then, did not he call for the reading of these petitions? Because he knew, as every man here knew, their contents; and could not distinguish the immense importance of acquiring that knowledge only in the committee room. Is he to share the fate of his co-members? If they are no longer trustworthy on this account, he is equally a participant in the fault. To impugn the majority, and fasten a charge upon them, are the Opposition in this hall prepared to prostrate their ablest and noblest champion? Well may he exclaim, "Save me from my friends." No man in this Hall more highly prizes the right of petition—none acquiesce with greater deference to the popular voice—none regard with higher respect the request of any portion of the people, than I do; but I cannot perceive just cause for the magnitude attempted to be given this charge against the committee.

At the commencement of the late session the cry was raised of ruin and distress brought upon the country by the course of the Administration. The rash conduct of the former Executive, and the blind adhesion to his policy by the present Chief Magistrate, denounced. The failure of the experiment, and the usurpation of power by the Executive, loudly proclaimed. The charge that the friends of the Administration recommended measures for the benefit of the office holders, but proposed nothing for the relief of the suffering people, was iterated and reiterated. These charges were so frequently made and so earnestly repeated by honorable gentlemen, that I, a tyro in political conflict, was induced to anxiously inquire, How is this? In a short period the curtain was lifted, and the object of the Opposition partially developed.

Four several bills, eminently calculated to give immediate relief to the people, were reported, and came to be acted upon. Intimately connected, the fate of all depended upon the adoption of the whole. It was soon apparent that those denounced as the enemies of the people were exerting every nerve for their relief, and the denouncers struggling for the defeat of measures calculated to afford that relief. Why was this so? Was the motive patriotic, or did opposition to the measures arise from hostility to the Administration? Was the object, at all hazards, to render the dominant party odious to the people? A project unworthy of the true patriot and lover of his country. These measures have gone into operation, and, judging from results, have proved highly beneficial. The depression in trade has gradually been ameliorated; the foreign and domestic exchanges brought within a small fraction of par value; the mercantile and manufacturing interests resuscitated and revived. Time, the unerring test of measures, stamps, in indelible characters, the chimerical nature of the evils predicted from the policy adopted by the majority during the extra session. The war has again been proclaimed; the tocsin sounded upon this floor; the plan of the campaign formed and partially unveiled; the Administration is to be stabbed through the sides of the standing committees of this House; destroy the confidence of Congress and the people in these committees, and a political point is gained. Is it the game, to operate on the various State Legislatures now in session, and induce a belief that the Administration are in a minority, in the popular branch? Effect abroad, by a show of strength in the early part of the session, is worthy of a bold and desperate effort. The history of nations has demonstrated that those who pursue power, and think they have it within their grasp, are not to be controlled by nice distinctions of right and wrong in their plans of operation, to attain the desired boon. With all the deep commiseration expressed for the miseries of the people, what plan do the Opposition propose for relief? Who has seen it? who has heard it? Able, talented, and wise, what is their policy to extricate the country from the evils that overshadow it? Within the walls of the Capitol it has been announced that "the Opposition had no plan to propose." The policy avowed was "to fold their arms and stand aloof;" their practice, to assail indiscriminately every measure brought forward by the Administration. The old and worn out theme of the invasion of the "letter and spirit" of the Constitution by Executive usurpations, is to be revived; the rusted armor to be furbished anew, and the scenes of "the panic session" to be re-enacted. Those whose length and breadth of patriotism will not suffer them to act for the relief of the country from blight and destruction, because the Executive is not of their party, do small credit to the venerable name of Whig: a name identified with all that is high, holy, and pure, in the annals of our country. Is the struggle for power and place? The glittering bauble of the Presidency glances before the vision of more than one aspirant. The "spoils," a word eschewed in debate, but never forgotten by Whigs when in power, would, if success should crown their efforts, doubtless be equitably distributed. But far be it from me to intimate that such small matters influence the course of honorable gentlemen. Whigs should spurn such incentives to patriotism. They claim that the virtue and intelligence of the nation is embodied in their ranks. Be it so. It is a commendable virtue in a party not to leave unheralded their devotion to popular rights. To achieve their object, it is only necessary to induce the people to confide in their professions. Unfortunately for them, there has been a singular apathy to their complaints in the great body of the people. For years they have turned a deaf ear to the solicitations of the pure and patriotic Opposition. The chameleon does not change its hue more frequently than this party their names. The colors of the rainbow are not more various than the mixture of party measures and principles professed in different sections of the Union. But all these efforts have failed in obtaining the confidence of a majority of the people. Yet Whigs all, they are "like unto a net that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind." The coinage of new and odious appellatives, bestowed upon the Democracy, is brought in aid of other means to put down the Administration. "Loco Foco destructives," embellish and adorn the speeches of honorable gentlemen. The time was, when the word "Democrat" was synonymous in the same party vocabulary, with all that was base and vulgar—the party with whom I am proud to act, are satisfied with that venerable cognomen. The Democracy consists of the great body of the people: are they destructives? What do they desire to destroy? Themselves: their own property; their own rights; their own liberty. Are the Opposition to remain in the minority until they convince the people that they are incapable of self-government? A task of no inconsiderable difficulty. "Deferred hope maketh the heart sick." That hope will, I trust, never be fulfilled, which depends upon the abasement of the people for its fruition.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

In Senate, Tuesday, January 9, 1838—The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. CALHOUN's resolutions, on the relations, &c. of the States and General Government. The question being on the fourth of the series as follows:

Resolved, That domestic slavery, as it exists in the Southern and Western States of the Union, composes an important part of their domestic institutions, inherited from their ancestors, and existing at the adoption of the Constitution, by which it is recognised as constituting an important element in the apportionment of its powers among the Sates; and that no change of opinion or feeling, on the part of the other States of the Union in relation to it, can justify them or their citizens in open and systematic attacks thereon, with the view to its overthrow; and that all such attacks are in manifest violation of the mutual and solemn pledge to protect and defend each other, given by the States respectively, on entering into the constitutional compact which formed the Union, and, as such, are a manifest breach of faith, and a violation of the most solemn obligations."

Mr. GRUNDY said that, having been absent from sickness when the votes were recorded on the passed resolutions, he took this opportunity of saying that he zealously concurred with the object of the resolutions, and, had he been present, should have voted in favor of every one of them.

The question was then taken on the passage of the 4th resolution, and was carried, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—34.

NAYS—Messrs. McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Smith of Indiana, and Swift—5.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the fifth resolution as follows:

"Resolved, That the intermeddling of any State or States, or their citizens, to abolish slavery in this District, or any of the Territories, on the ground, or under the pretext, that it is immoral or sinful, or the passage of any act or measure of Congress, with that view, would be a direct and dangerous attack on the institutions of all the slaveholding States."

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut rose and said that he did not intend to press on the Senate any remarks of his while these resolutions were under discussion. He had very cheerfully given his support to them; but in doing so he had not intended to declare that he was in favor of slavery, and he would therefore take up no more of the attention of the Senate than was necessary to express his conceptions of the material difference that existed between those that had been passed and the one that was then before them. If he were to say that he was in favor of slavery, he would be a solitary individual entertaining such sentiments in the whole North. The Northern States had all declared themselves to be opposed to slavery. They possessed the undoubted right to establish it among themselves, as it now exists at the South; but they have not done so; on the contrary, they have declared that it shall not exist among them. They, therefore, furnished the strongest evidences of their opposition to this institution. He (Mr. S.) entertained the same opinions that were held at the North on the subject. Were he an inhabitant of a slaveholding State, he possibly might be well enough satisfied with slavery, and employ it in the condition that it is in. But it was only necessary for him to say now that he was opposed to slavery, because it was contrary to the feelings and opinions of the people in his section of the country, and because he looked upon it to be an infringement of a natural right. He did not mean to say that such natural rights could be exercised by the black population of the United States, or that they were in a condition to exercise them; but he believed that if this population was in a condition to exercise them, there would be almost a unanimous sentiment throughout the country in favor of their emancipation. We mean at present (Mr. S. said) to declare that we recognise the constitutional rights of the slave States in their slave property—that we do not mean to infringe those rights. He believed that the true interests of the slave States would be best prometed by liberating their slaves; but that (Mr. S. said) was a question of their own, and for them only to decide. But he rose (Mr. S. said) to express his views as to the difference between the resolutions which had been passed and the one at present before them. Those that were passed were only declaratory of constitutional rights, which he thought they were bound to recognise, and on these grounds he gave his support to them. But what (Mr. S. asked) was this fifth resolution? Was it not wholly different from the others? This was a field in which the people of these United States had a right to enter and to discuss—the expediency of slavery in this District. If (said Mr. S.) we are called on here to act as legislators, he for one would be ready to say that it would not be expedient to legislate on the subject, because it would be unjust to the holders of slave property, but he would be unwilling to say that it was unconstitutional to abolish slavery in this District.

When they came to talk of prescribing limits to the discussions of the people of the United States, they were not acting within the limits of their duty. If, said Mr. S. we do not act in conformity to the will of the people of the United States, they can exercise a proper check or control over us. What was this fifth resolution but the prescribing a rule to limit the discussions of the people of the United States hereafter, and the setting themselves up as censors over them? This Mr. S. thought was going far beyond the limits of their duty. While he would cheerfully oppose any unconstitutional interference with the institutions of the States, he would at the same time avoid expressing any opinions adverse to the right of the people to discuss such subjects as were properly open to them. He opposed this resolution, not because he did not go heart and hand with the gentlemen of the South in the maintenance of their constitutional rights, but because he believed that its adoption, so far from answering any good end to the people of the slave States, would have an injurious effect on their interests.

Mr. PIERCE of New Hampshire rose, and said the Senate had at come at length to the ground on which this contest was to be determined. The District of Columbia was now emphatically the battle-field of the Abolitionist, and the resolution immediately under consideration, with, perhaps, some modifications in phraseology, would present the true issue here and to the country—an issue which would raise, not a mere question of expediency, but one of a much higher character, in which the public faith is directly involved.

That my position, said Mr. P. may be distinctly understood, some explanation is perhaps due to the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, especially as there is a manifest disposition, in certain quarters, to pervert our votes and misrepresent our motives.

I have given to the resolutions all the consideration which I am capable of bestowing, and have listened to the debate which they have elicited with interest and profound attention.

If the grave objections suggested on the other side were sustained by an examination of the resolutions themselves, or a course of sound argumentation, they would ensure my opposition. What are they? The first that reached my ear was, that they contain latent nullification. I have waited to hear the particular resolution, sentence or phrase pointed out in which this heresy is supposed to be concealed, and I have waited in vain. Having, then, assertion on one side, and what appears to me to be the plain reading of the resolutions and the frank and unqualified declaration of the mover on the other, I must be excused if I do not take the alarm.

We have next eloquent disquisitions upon the liberty of speech and the freedom of the press. To every sentiment uttered upon these subjects I yield my cordial assent; but why introduced on this particular occasion, I have been at a loss to determine. Would any man here abridge the liberty of speech, or assail the freedom of the press? I take it not. Is there any thing in the resolutions to sanction an invasion of either? Not a syllable. That these are privileges most dear to every American is freely admitted by all. Why such a variety of changes have been rung upon them in this debate, others may determine. It is not my province to judge of motives, and I would take occasion only to remark, that no man shall make up an issue upon this subject for me. I oppose the Abolitionists, for the very reason that I entertain a sacred regard for these in common with all other rights secured by the Constitution.

But it is further urged against the resolutions, (said Mr. P.) that they are mere abstractions. Sir, it is quite immaterial what name you apply to them; sufficient is it that they meet the case, that they encounter the Abolitionist upon sound and tenable ground, and furnish a conclusive answer to his importunities. To say that the petitions refer only to this District, and that the principles asserted in the preceding resolutions are consequently without application, is perfectly idle. It is impossible to read a single number of the leading abolition periodicals, without perceiving that their object reaches far beyond this District, and stops at no point short of general emancipation in the States. And yet, sir, I suspect that you would find few intelligent Abolitionists, who would assert that Congress has the constitutional power to interfere with slavery in the States; but admitting the want of power here, they hold it to be their duty, as individuals, to persevere in the cause. Regarding the institution of slavery as morally wrong, or sinful, if you please, they consider themselves, as citizens of the Union, responsible for its continuance, wherever it may exist within our borders. This feeling has its origin, to some extent, in a misapprehension of the structure of our Government, and this error the preceding resolutions are calculated to correct. They assert, in effect, that the citizen of New Hampshire is no more responsible, morally or politically, for the existence and continuance of this domestic institution in Virginia or Maryland, than he would be for the existence of any similar institutions in France or Persia. Why? Because these are matters over which the States, respectively, when delegating a portion of their powers, to be exercised by the General Government, retained the sole and exclusive control, and for which they are alone responsible.

Now, let these doctrines be universally understood and admitted, and you take one great step toward satisfying the consciences of honest, but misguided people, in one section of the country, and quieting the irritation, for which there has been too much cause, in the other. This we have attempted to do. We are bound to go further, and frankly to declare to these petitioners, that so long slavery shall continue in Virginia and Maryland, it is vain for them to expect its abolition here; that we are forbidden to legislate upon this subject, under existing circumstances, by obligations hardly inferior to the Constitution itself; that Congress cannot abolish slavery in this District, against the wishes of the inhabitants, without a gross breach of public faith, and an outrageous infraction of private rights.

At the time the cession was made, domestic slavery existed in the States of Maryland and Virginia: it still exists there; and it has also existed here from that day to this. Now, how is it possible to mistake what must have been the understanding of both parties at the time? No man, it strikes me, can doubt for a moment, who will regard, without prejudice, the relative position of this "ten miles square," the objects of the cession, and the manifest interests of the States making it. Who can believe that these patriotic States would have parted with their territory, if they could have supposed that the rights and property of their citizens, living upon it, were to be invaded, against their consent, and in defiance of their remonstrances? I have no hesitation in saying that I consider slavery a social and political evil, and most sincerely wish that it had no existence upon the face of the earth; but it is perfectly immaterial how it may be regarded, either by you or myself; it is not for us to sit in judgment, and determine whether the rights secured to the different States by the Constitution are blessings or otherwise; it is sufficient for the argument that they are rights, which the inhabitants do not choose to relinquish.

Further, Mr. President, suppose, for a moment, that the cession had never been made, and that the States of Maryland and Virginia should now attempt, without the consent of the inhabitants of the District, to interfere with this description of property—to abolish slavery within these portions of their respective limits, and retain it upon its present basis in every other portion. What would be the consequence? Why, the law could never be enforced; and every reflecting man throughout the whole length and breadth of this country would revolt at such a wanton disregard of equal justice and of equal rights and privileges. And yet, because the States have generously ceded their territory to you for certain purposes, you propose to do this very thing, and thus requite their confidence and their spirit of accommodation, by opening a common refuge for their runaway slaves. I will only add, upon this point, that the Abolitionist would do well to pause in the midst of his zeal, and inquire calmly and dispassionately whether, in fact, any thing more than a nominal advantage would be gained by the abolition of slavery in this District, and whether even this would not be acquired at a serious sacrifice. It is admitted that domestic slavery exists here in its mildest form. That part of the population are bound together by friendship and the nearer relations of life. They are attached to the families in which they have lived from childhood. They are comfortably provided for, and apparently contented. Now, let a bill for the abolition of slavery in the District pass either House of Congress, and what would take place here? Why, before it could possibly become a law, all these ties would be violently sundered; every slave in the District would be removed beyond its limits; their present comparatively easy condition changed, it is probable, for one of greater rigor; and, with all this accomplished, you would not have made the slightest progress in diminishing the aggregate amount of slavery in the United States.

Mr. President, yielding to my inclination, I would here take leave of this irritating subject, now and for ever; but the manner in which it appears to be connecting itself with other topics renders it proper, in my judgment, to add a few remarks.

When, it is often asked, is this agitation, in Congress and out of it, to cease? When is it to terminate, and with what results? These are questions which, three years since, would not have cost me one moment's uneasiness. I thought the apprehensions of Southern gentlemen, to a great extent, had their origin in a morbid sensibility upon this subject. Still, mindful of their interests and peculiar relations, I appreciated their feelings, and deeply regretted the cause of irritation. And now these questions would create little interest, certainly excite no alarm, in my mind, if agitators upon the subject were only to be found in the circle of avowed Abolitionists. With regard to the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, I am perfectly satisfied, as well from my own observation as from the expression of the Legislature during the last winter, that public sentiment can hardly be said to be divided upon this subject. But here, sir, I feel bound to admit that there are indications in New England which cannot and ought not to be overlooked. The aspect of things in this respect has undergone some change, and I fear the elements of still greater change are in active operation. I do not mean to say that the Abolitionists proper are gaining strength rapidly; but what I do mean to say is, that they are finding allies in the cause of agitation in the political press. Sir, if politics are to be mingled with this subject, let it be known; it cannot be proclaimed too soon. I have been taught that the way to overcome difficulties and threatening dangers is to meet them on the advance, not to await their approach; and, although I would create no unnecessary alarm, I assure the mover of these resolutions that he shall not find me standing tamely by, or attempting to lull others into false security by the cry "all's well," when I believe there is danger—when I know there is an enemy in motion, professing and claiming to be influenced by considerations and governed by motives above and beyond the Constitution and laws of my country, and that enemy likely to be sustained by an alliance with party politics. No, sir, we have no concealments upon this subject. All we demand is, that since we are to be the first to feel the effects of Abolition ascendancy at home, should it never be acquired, (which, by the way, I by no means anticipate,) we may meet the question unembarrassed, and not be driven by any course here upon a collateral issue, such as the right of petition, or any other. The force of this suggestion will be more fully apprehended after the remarks which I am about to make.

It is not to be disguised that, from an insignificant beginning, and with comparatively few, even now, who hold what are generally considered abolition sentiments, this subject is assuming an aspect of fearful interest and momentous consequence. The Senator from Alabama on my left, (Mr. KING,) in my judgment, pointed, at an early day of the session, to the true cause of alarm, if any exist. It was this: that religious fanaticism no longer moves alone in this matter: that the misguided enthusiast has joined hands with the designing politician. Sir, I refer to it with reluctance. I have no party purposes to answer. I should be unworthy of a seat here, and unworthy of the confidence that has been reposed in me by an honest, intelligent, and patriotic people, if I could indulge any thing like partisan feelings on an occasion like this. No, sir: no, sir. I believe this question may, and I believe it is the only question that can, lead to a dissolution of this Union; and I have but one object, that is, to guard against it; to preserve inviolate the public faith and the provisions of the Constitution under which we have so long lived in prosperity. The Abolitionists, it is well known, long since avowed their determination to make this the test question in elections; and I have seen, with profound regret, that in one State at least some of the prominent individuals of both parties have submitted to their catechisms. Let those who doubt that the politicians in Connecticut and New Hampshire are making use of Abolition for party purposes, with a view to the approaching elections, notice the tone of the political newspapers there within the last three or four weeks. It is true they do not avow Abolition doctrines, but they make up an issue not warranted by the state of facts, and that issue happens to be the same upon which the Abolitionists are waging their war. They allege that to receive and lay upon the table, without reading or printing, is equivalent to the rejection of petitions. Why should not that course be taken with them? Has there not already been sufficient agitation in Congress and out of it? Has not time enough been wasted? The same petitions, in substance, have been presented year after year and session after session. During the last Congress they were made the subject of special reference and report. Their contents are familiar as household words. The mind of every member is definitively made up upon the question they involve. Argument has been exhausted again and again. And what is now demanded? Why, not only that you shall receive petitions, but that you shall take a particular course with them, which is in accordance with the views of these gentlemen, who, not satisfied with the exercise of their own rights, assume the prerogative of sitting in judgment, and determining what are your duties.

The coincidence upon this point between one portion of the political press in New England and the abolition press proper, just at present, is truly remarkable: the same sentiments, the same arguments, the same opprobious epithets applied to the members of both Houses of Congress from that section of the Union, who oppose any action upon this subject. For instance, the delegation in the other House from the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent here, are charged by the Abolition press with having denied the right of petition, and the same thing is reiterated by the political press, in the face of their votes upon the direct question during the present session. It is notorious that the question of receiving petitions upon this subject has been taken in both Houses, and decided affirmatively by overwhelming majorities; and yet there is a persevering and systematic attempt on the part of the political as well as the Abolition press to give the impression that the right of petition is denied. I have already detained the Senate longer than I intended, and will not pursue the subject further than to add, that he has turned over the pages of history to little purpose, who would not regard with unqualified horror the connection of religious bigotry with political power; and to warn gentlemen on all sides to frown upon the first manifestations of a disposition to connect the politics of the day with that spirit of fanaticism which, under the pretence of promoting the cause of civil liberty, would trample in the dust our glorious Constitution, adopted in a spirit of compromise and concession, and in the exercise of that spirit alone to be maintained.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky, rose. He said that, if the object of these resolutions was to produce peace and allay excitement, it appeared to him that they were not very likely to accomplish such an object. More vague and general abstractions than they were could hardly have been brought forward, and they were more calculated to produce agitation, and stir up discontent and bad blood, than to do any good whatever. Such he knew was the general opinion of Southern men, few of whom, however they assented to the abstractions, approved of this method of agitating the subject. Mr. C. was quite at a loss to comprehend what good such resolutions could effect; there was nothing practical in them; they were in the air, aerial, unbusiness-like, theoretical abstractions, only calculated to agitate, and to bring the rights of the South to trial, to bring them up for discussion, to create difference and discord on abstract questions among those who all agreed on the one practical point, viz: that the rights of the South must be preserved. He (Mr. C.) would not say that they were the work of Abolitionism, but of this he was certain, that such a mode of bringing the South to trial, and putting up her rights to be disputed, by drawing out theories on which no two men could absolutely agree, was most eminently calculated to aid, and no doubt would greatly aid, the Abolitionists. The mover of these resolutions relies mainly upon two points to carry the Senate with him: first, he reiterates, over and over again, the trite theme and cry of "danger to the Union;" and next, that, if he is not followed in this movement, he urges the inevitable consequence of the "destruction of the Union."

Mr. C. thought it possible the gentleman might be mistaken. It possibly might not be exactly true that, to save the Union, it was necessary to follow him. On the contrary, some were of opinion, and he for one was much inclined to be of the same view, that, to follow the distinguished mover of these resolutions, to pursue the course of irritation, agitation, and intimidation which he chalked out, would be the very best and surest method that could be chalked out, to destroy this great and happy Union. The Senator (Mr. CALHOUN) is daily, and almost twenty times a day, telling us that the disease is great—is terrible—is frightful—is absolutely incurable! But, if it be as he represents, if the disease be incurable, why does he come forward as a physician to heal a disease which he himself declares to us is past all healing? What can possibly be the object of the resolutions, if the evil they propose to assuage is past all cure? What was the use of bringing them forward, if the gentleman is sincere in thinking that no application can be of any benefit to a disease which he paints every hour of the day as being frightfully removed from all the powers of remedy? Is such language, on the other hand, only intended as a politic method of carrying by force and terror and alarm every trembling vote in his train? Whatever might be the object of the gentleman, it certainly appeared rather strange to him (Mr. CRITTENDEN) that he should bring forward his resolutions as a remedy, and descant most forcibly upon their healing, testing, curing, and sanatory powers, and almost in the same breath tell us that the disease is so fearful, so far gone, so alarming, so terrific, that his very remedy which he offers is good for nothing!

So far it appeared to Mr. C. that Mr. CALHOUN's course was not calculated to heal, or to produce peace, though such he professed were his objects. There was again another argument on which he rested, which also appeared to Mr. CRITTENDEN calculated to produce confidence in the Abolitionists, and alarm in the South, and all the friends of the South; calculated, he thought, if it were not exposed and avoided, to add thickly to the ranks of Abolitionism, and to weaken the ranks of the South, by forcing out many of its warmest and most ardent friends and supporters. The argument was—though not of course so plainly and openly expressed—that there could be no confidence in any opposition to Abolitionism, unless it came from Mr. CALHOUN and his party! unless it came from the State rights party! And, therefore, the necessary consequence which follows is, that unless the whole country shall follow the gentleman, and range themselves behind him in his party, there can be no preservation of the Union, there can be no available opposition to Abolitionism! Such a mode of acting and reasoning upon the subject appeared to Mr. C. as making a stalking horse, a tool, of Abolitionism, to serve as a mean, and as an instrument of promoting personal views and party ambition, under the pretence of infinite good to the country.

He (Mr. C.) admired the ingenuity exhibited by all this; he did not complain of the genius and talent which could convert a danger and an evil to its own purposes; but he should complain of, or rather pity, all, if any, who might be led to answer this end by the alarms and terrors thrown out! Yes, if what the gentleman says be true, we must all join his new friends and party, or—the country is ruined; all is ruined; the Union will perish; Abolitionism will rear its frightful head in horrid triumph! There is no possibility of escaping all these dreadful horrors but by joining him and his new friends and party! We may give the South our good wishes, nay, we may be resolved to stand by the South, and die for its rights and our rights, but it will all be in vain, unless we join the gentleman and his party! What is the effect of all this? What is this but saying to the Abolitionists "go on, go on; all is in your favor, do not calculate on any opposition but from me and the State rights party!" Such a course and such declarations may well create a just and solid ground of alarm to the South! What! are there no friends to the South but the gentleman and his little party? Is it left so weak, so helpless, so friendless, as to have no friends, no sympathy, no supporters in the whole country, but the gentleman himself and his little State rights party? Is there no other banner displayed? Is there no other banner under which its friends must arrange themselves, but the tattered, shattered, ragged rag of the flag of this little State rights party? But what is this party for which such vast preponderance is claimed; which takes to itself such exclusive powers, and calls for such unqualified allegiance and submission? What are its principles? What has it done? For the life of him he could not tell! If he knew any thing of himself and his own principles, he was a State rights man himself, staunch and true, for he would not allow his own State (Kentucky) to be encroached upon one foot. If principle made him one, he was one of this party; but if to follow the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN) was all that made one, he was quite sure that he (Mr. C.) was not, and would not ever (in that sense) be one. But because he did not follow in the gentleman's party, was he, therefore an Abolitionist? This was, however, the inference which he (Mr. CALHONN) had taken upon himself to draw. Like the Saint in Hudibras, who might commit any sin with impunity, on account of his great piety, so here, such is the virtue of a political name, that whoever enlists under the banner, is free from all imputation, while all the sins that can be imputed to man are laid upon the shoulders of those who do not fall into the privileged ranks of the immaculate party!

Mr. C. was for holding this Government strictly to its powers: is that, he would ask, being a State rights man? But suppose he would vote for a bank! That would not be allowed, and must then be stricken off the roll! What must he do? What sentiments must he hold? Must he go with the member from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) in every thing, and, if he did not submit, was he to be considered an Abolitionist? Mr. C. only made these remarks to show to Mr. CALHOUN, if it were possible, the extreme indiscretion of the tone and line of argument upon which he had thrown himself; the bigoted politics he laid down, that every one must follow him, implicitly, or else they were, by necessity, Abolitionists. To say the least, he thought there was great indiscretion in such a course; and it was (however it might appear otherwise to the hasty and hot-headed) seriously calculated to bring injury upon the cause of the South, instead of benefit. He (Mr. C.) was no more an Abolitionist than Mr. CALHOUN himself: there were thousands as sound as Mr. CALHOUN could be, he might say sounder, who yet were calm and temperate and quiet. And though he (Mr. C.) was far indeed, as was well enough known, from being an Abolitionist, yet he could not concur in the extravagant alarms which Mr. CALHOUN was repeatedly sounding in the ears of the Senate. He could not agree with him in the extravagant expression of such mental terrors. He did not think the South ruined, the country ruined, all ruined, every thing ruined, unless he (Mr. CALHOUN) was implicitly followed! Far from it. He felt secure; the country was secure; the South, the Union, all was secure, behind the firm barrier of the Constitution. We are (said Mr. C.) strong in the Constitution; strong in public opinion, which is on our side; strong in the votes which have always been for our rights and for the Constitution; and, lastly, we are stronger than all in the strength of the States, which are able to protect themselves.

Mr. C. said he could see no good whatever as likely to result from these resolutions. He did not think their language decorous enough as applied to sovereign States. The States are the sovereign elements of this Union, and shall we talk to them of "intermeddling?" If the States were entitled to respect from any quarter of this Government, it was here in the Senate that they ought to meet with respect. He therefore deprecated the use of language harsh, offensive, indecorous, and irritating, especially when by such language the object professed to be aimed at was to unite, to soothe, and to allay excitement. The means for this were in direct contradiction to the end. As to the Vermont resolutions, which these were especially framed to meet, he (Mr. C.) would laugh to scorn the pettish language of such documents, but he would not officially treat a sovereign State with indignity.

It was declared (Mr. C.) said) that petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia were a direct attack on the institution of slavery in the States. Mr. C. said this was an abuse of language. If it could be regarded at all as an attack, it certainly was not an avowed or direct attack upon the institution of slavery in the States, and he saw no propriety of using terms of mere exaggeration and alarm. If the question of the power of Congress to abolish slavery in the District was a controverted one, had not a State a right to petition on the subject? And should they undertake to denounce the conduct of a sovereign State?

Mr. CALHOUN followed in reply. He said that he was not at all surprised that he and the Senator from Kentucky should take such very different views of the subject. We differ totally as to the facts, and it is not wonderful that we should differ as to the remedy. With such opinions as the Senator entertains, all attempts to resist a thing so innocent and harmless as abolition must appear perfectly useless. He sees no danger in the organization of 150,000 persons into societies, with a powerful press and ample funds, imbuing the rising generation at the North with the belief that the institutions of the Southern States were sinful and immoral, and that it was doing God service to abolish them, even if it should involve the destruction of half of their inhabitants, who are represented as murderers and pirates. It would be in vain for him to attempt to discuss the subject with the Senator from Kentucky, while he continues to entertain such opinions. But three years since, we considered three hundred societies to be a cause of just apprehension; and now they number 1,500, and are increasing at the rate of one a day, and the Senator sees nothing to excite attention. To what extent must the disease progress before he can be moved? If it should spread universally over the non-slaveholding States, so that the two sections should consider each other as the most odious of the human race, could the Union exist? And if not, he would be glad to know to what point it must extend before it becomes dangerous, and when we would be justified in resisting it? He would be glad to hear the Senator's answer to this question.

The Senator next objects that these resolutions are mere abstractions, and therefore worthless. The Senator could not be ignorant of the rise and progress of the important political revolutions recorded in history, and he would appeal to him, if what he calls abstractions did not lie at the bottom of most of them. Have not almost all of the revolutions in our parent country, from Magna Charta down to that which placed the present royal family on the throne, originated in abstract principles? Did not our own Revolution originate in abstractions of the highest order? We did not wait for actual oppression to rouse us to resistance; but, as Burke said, we snuffed the approach of tyranny in the tainted breeze. To come down still later, did not the abstract resolutions of his own State, and that of her honored mother, strike down at a blow the alien and sedition acts to the ground, and effect a revolution which will be felt so long as we are a people? With these striking examples, can the Senator consider abstractions so very worthless? The fact is, that it is abstract truths only that deeply impress the understanding and the heart, and effect great and durable revolutions; and the higher the intelligence of a people, the greater their influence. It is only the ignorant and the brute creation over whom they have no control.

The Senator next accuses him of inconsistency. He rests his charge on the assertion that I despair, and then infers that he (Mr. CALHOUN) acted inconsistently in introducing these resolutions. It was painful to be misrepresented as frequently as he was in debate. He had never uttered the language of despair, though he had often said that the dark and fell spirit now abroad in the non-slaveholding States would end in a catastrophe, if not arrested. If it continued to advance without resistance, it would terminate in disunion or civil commotion. It was unavoidable. But he had never said that it could not be arrested, if timely met, and in the decided manner it should be. He had also said that the battle must be fought in the North, or the South must take the remedy into its own hands. Others had said the same; and for using this language, the Senator comes to the conclusion that he despaired, and on this slender foundation raises the charge of inconsistency. In the same spirit, he charges him as using angry and violent language, because he had thought proper to draw up the resolutions in strong and decided terms, and defend them in the same terms in debate.

The Senator next takes offence, because he relied on the State rights party to oppose the Abolitionists in the non-slaveholding States, and asks if, by the State rights party, was meant the small party under a tattered and torn banner? He supposed the Senator meant the Nullifying party; and, if so, he feared it would be a very unequal contest in the northern States.

[Mr. CRITTENDEN explained.]

Mr. CALHOUN resumed. He used the expression on another occasion, and in a more restricted sense, than when he used it on the present.

The Senator next inquired what was meant by the State rights party. He did not expect the inquiry from that quarter; but, as it was made, he would reply to it. He meant the party who believed that this was a Federal Republic—a Republic, the constituent parts of which were States, in contradistinction to a national consolidated Republic, in which the constituent parts were the aggregate mass of the American people, taken collectively, and in which the States bore the same relation to the whole as counties do to the States.

He is next accused by the Senator with charging all who were not of the State rights party as being Abolitionists. This has as little foundation as the other charges of the Senator. So far from making such a charge, he expressly stated, again and again, that he acquitted the great mass of all parties of abolition, and that he believed that we had the good wishes of the great body of the national or consolidated party, and who were ready to vote that it was inexpedient to touch the subject of slavery. But he also stated, when he looked for a constitutional remedy, he was compelled to turn to the State rights party, in whose creed only it could be found. If, then, he looked to one party, instead of both, it was simply because the political creed of the one furnished a remedy, and the other did not; and has not this debate furnished incontestable proof of the truth of his assertion? Others had taken offence at the same declaration, and he called on them to refute what he had asserted, by laying resolutions on the table framed in their view of the Constitution, which would oppose the slightest constitutional barrier against the encroachments of the Abolitionists. None had been, and he had a right to infer that none could be. But he would rejoice to have his impressions corrected, if erroneous, and to have the co-operation of both parties, and would now call on the Senators who differed from him on the federative character of our system, to submit resolutions, as substitutes for his, that would oppose an effectual constitutional barrier to the doctrines of the Abolitionists. He was not so much attached to his own but that he would cheerfully surrender his for others of equal force.

We are next told by the Senator, that the term direct is not correctly applied; as an attack on slavery in this District or the Territories cannot be a direct attack on slavery in the States. He believed, notwithstanding the objection, that the epithet could be fairly defended. The avowed object of the Abolitionists, in attacking slavery in this District and the Territories, was to attack and destroy it in the States; and is as much a direct attack as firing a train to blow up a magazine would be an attack on the magazine itself. But as such discussion would lead to metaphysical niceties, he would, to accommodate the Senator, agree to strike out the word, and make it read a dangerous attack on all the slaveholding States; which would not be much less strong.

It is finally objected by the Senator, that the expression intermeddle was disrespectful, when applied to the States. He did not think so. It was used in the general, without designating any State, and he thought the Senate had not only a right to use it, but were called on by the circumstances in which it was placed, to define its position and declare its opinion, in reference to the interference of one portion of the Confederacy with the peculiar institutions of the other. It had unquestionably the right to say what is its conception of such interference, whether it was consistent with the Constitution, with the peace and harmony or existence of the Union, or not, and no State had a right to consider such declaration as an offence. But he was anxious to modify his resolutions, as far as phraseology was concerned, so as to suit others, and would yield, without hesitation, the word intermeddle, and substitute in its place any attempt. It would not vary the sense, nor weaken the expression materially, while, he trusted, it would entirely remove the objection of the Senator to the resolution.

Mr. PRESTON suggested to the mover to strike out the words "on the ground or under the pretext that it was immoral or sinful," and insert "on any pretext whatever."

Mr. CALHOUN objected to striking out the words referred to by his colleague; they met the Abolitionists directly; but would accept as a modification the words he proposed to add.

Mr. PRESTON moved further to insert the words "also a violation of the public faith implied in the cession of this District by the States of Virginia and Maryland."

Mr. CALHOUN had always been of the opinion that any interference with slavery in this District would not only be a violation of the public faith to the States of Virginia and Maryland, but would also be a direct violation of the 8th amended article of the Constitution. He had not, however, thought proper to assert it, as he knew that there was a majority in the Senate of a different opinion, and as his object was to place the question on no particular portion of the Constitution, but on its general character and structure, which he thought was much stronger, and much less liable to be disputed. He would neither object nor assent to the proposed modification, and would leave it, without further remark, to the decision of the Senate.

Mr. PRESTON'S second amendment was then agreed to; after which

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky rose to say a few words. He said that he could vote for neither the fifth nor sixth resolution, in the shape in which they were presented by the Senator from South Carolina. Although he had risen to state his objections particularly to the fifth, now that he was up, he would make some general observations on the whole subject of the series of resolutions.

I have voted, (continued Mr. C.) without hesitation, for the first resolutions offered by that Senator, after they were modified or amended, not from any confidence which I have in their healing virtues. I have voted for them as abstract propositions, and in the sense in which I understand them; that is, in the plain natural sense which their language imports. With respect to the point so much insisted upon in this debate, and which had produced great controversy in former times, whether the Constitution is to be regarded as the work of the people of the United States collectively, or of the separate States composing the Confederacy, I have always thought that more importance is attached to it than it deserves. Wether formed in the one mode or the other, the powers granted in the Constitution, and its true interpretation, are exactly the same. The real question in considering the instrument is, not how the Constitution was made, but what is it, as it is? What are the powers delegated by it—the powers necessary and proper to carry into effect the delegated powers—its prohibitions? What, in short, is the sum of its whole powers? I have always understood, according to historical fact, that the Constitution was framed by a Convention, composed of delegates appointed by the Legislatures of the several States; and that after it was adopted, it was submitted to Conventions of Delegates, chosen by the people of the several States, each acting separately by and for itself; and, being ratified by the Conventions of a sufficient number, it became the Constitution of the United States, or, in its own language, of the people of the United States.

The series of resolutions under consideration has been introduced by the Senator from South Carolina, after he and other Senators from the South had deprecated discussion on the delicate subject to which they relate. They have occasioned much discussion, in which hitherto I have not participated. I hope that the tendency of the resolutions may be allay the excitement which unhappily prevails, in respect to the abolition of slavery; but I confess, Mr. President, that, taken altogether, and in connection with other circumstances, and especially considering the manner in which their author has pressed them on the Senate, I fear that they will have the opposite effect; and particularly at the North, that they may increase and exasperate, instead of diminishing and assuaging the existing irritation. I apprehend that they will only serve to furnish new texts for fresh commentary and further divisions. And I cannot but regard the unnecessary combination of the subject of abolition with that alien and the most exciting of all subjects at the present period, the annexation of Texas to the United States, in the same series of resolutions, as peculiarly unfortunate. I know that Texas is not specially mentioned in the last resolution, but the country will understand the intention and allusion of the resolution as distinctly as if it had been expressly designated. It cannot be forgotten that, immediately after the tidings of the memorable battle of San Jacinto reached this city, the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) expressed in the Senate his opinion that the independence of Texas ought immediately to be recognised, and his wish that, before the adjournment of Congress, it should be annexed to the United States. A resolution now lies upon the table of the Senate, introduced by the other Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston,) proposing a contingent annexation of it to the United States. When these facts are borne in mind, will not all understand the last resolution, although abstract in form, as intended to commit the Senate, in advance, to the annexation? Our purpose, our anxious aim, should be to compose the North, to arrest the progress of the spirit of abolition, and to give strength and confidence to the numerous friends of the Union in that quarter. Is it then wise and discreet to blend these two unhappy causes of agitation together? Had we not better keep them separate and distinct, and the act on the prudent maxim that sufficient for the day is the evil thereof?

The Senator from South Carolina has offered his resolutions, he tells us, to revive and rally the State rights party. But I cannot think that the slaveholding States ought to consent to place their peculiar interests in the exclusive safe-keeping of any one party, however correct some of us may believe its principles to be. Are not the clear, undoubted, acknowledged guaranties of the Constitution of those interests far above, and superior to any security which can be derived from the particular tenets of any party? Parties rise up and go down, but the Constitution remains a perpetual and sure bulwark against all attacks upon the rights of the slaveholding States, from whatever quarter they may proceed. No, sir: do not let us put our trust in any party exclusively; let us invoke the united guardianship of all—the Whigs, the Democratic party, the Republican party, the Jackson Van Buren party, the Federal party, the Union party, the Nullifiers and the Loco Focos—all, in preserving the inviolability of the Constitution, and protecting against every encroachment delicate and momentous interests, which cannot be seriously touched, without endangering the stability of our entire political fabric.

We want in the slaveholding States nothing done here to stimulate our vigilance, or to unite us upon the subject of our present deliberations. We may differ there in the degree of sensibility which we display; but we are all firmly and unanimously resolved to defend and maintain our rights at all hazards; and should the hour of trial ever come, those who appear now the least agitated, will not be behind those who are foremost and loudest in proclaiming the existence of danger. The object of the Senate should be to allay excitement, quiet the public mind, and check the progress of the spirit of abolition at the North; and, above all, to strengthen the well-disposed, and to give no advantage to agitators. It was with that view I have inquired of Northern Senators, charged with the presentation of abolition petitions, whether the spirit of Abolitionism was spreading; and, if so, what was the cause. Their answer was, that it was increasing; and that the cause was the impression which the Abolitionists had been able to make on the northern mind, that the constitutional right of petition was denied them by the two Houses of Congress. This statement is corroborated and confirmed by information which has reached me through a variety of channels. Many who are not Abolitionists, are induced to join them, because they believe the right of petition has been practically denied. On this subject, allow me to read an extract from a letter (the perusal of the whole letter is at the service of any Senator) which I have lately received, addressed to me by a highly intelligent and patriotic gentleman in Rhode Island. [Here Mr. CLAY read the following extract:

"I have been so much gratified with your remarks in relation to the cause of the increase of the Abolitionists in the North, that I thought it might do some good, and at least relieve my own mind, if I stated to you what we think on the subject here. There is no doubt but that the Abolitionists are recruiting here by the artful mode in which they turn to their account the spirit or sensitiveness manifested by the southern members on the subject of slavery, and they are encouraged, also, to greater efforts, because they think they see in all this a proof that the work of agitation is thus begun in the South, and that the leaven will work until the whole lump is leavened. If the petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia had been duly received and considered as other petitions would have been, I have no doubt this agitating subject, if not put entirely at rest, at least would not now have been so connected with the sacred right of petition as to enable it to produce the effect it now does amongst us.

"At our last election for members of Congress, letters were sent from the secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society to each of the candidates, requiring of them a communication of their sentiments on the right of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and the right of petition to Congress on this subject. Each candidate answered (except one) in such a way as that he might have consistently received the votes of the Abolitionists. If the simple question had been upon the expediency of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, these gentlemen would probably have all answered in the negative. You see, therefore, how this question is brought to bear on the people, and through them on the members of Congress, and we, who feel opposed to the whole of this anti-slavery machinery, find ourselves deprived of the power of doing any thing effectively by the impolitic zeal of southern gentlemen. To them, therefore, I would appeal, (unless, in truth, they are desirous of abandoning the Union,) that they would so let their moderation be known unto all men, that the fanatics of the North, as they choose to call them, may be put in the wrong before the whole people, so that their own friends here may have some ground to stand upon.

"I look forward with great apprehension to the time when the North and the South shall be unanimously divided with that zeal which may urge each to action on the subject of slavery. The Union will not only then be dissolved, but the people on both sides so exasperated that a furious fanatical anti-slavery and pro-slavery war will be inevitable. Men enough will be found to seek to ride upon the whirlwind and direct the storm in the North as well as the South, and the Union and the spirit of Republicanism will expire together amidst throes and convulsions, which will cover our now beautiful land with desolation. Does the chivalry of the South desire to point its lance at the breasts of the Northern fanatics? When was chivalry a match for fanaticism? Let the Crusades—let the success of Cromwell answer. When men already begin to court death in the cause of anti-slavery, as giving them the crown of martyrdom, (I allude to Lovejoy, and we understand that another has already offered himself to share the same fate,) what may we not expect when patriotism shall arm in such a cause, and it shall become identified not merely with the liberty of the African, but our own liberty and prosperity! And is it not well to look around us before we urge each other to this dread precipice? If there is nothing due to those men at the North who are lighting up this flame, is there nothing due to those who are endeavoring or are desirous to extinguish it? Is there nothing due to our common country—to the civilized world, that this light among the nations should not be extinguished, and extinguished in blood? Mr. Calhoun is reported as having spoken 'with contempt of the idea of arguing this question with the Abolitionists by means of a report from a committee.' I ask him not so to argue with them, but I ask him so to argue with those who are not already with these men, as to prevent their enlisting under their sable banners. But if there are any men at the South who think as some of our Northern men thought in former days, that our country is 'too big for union,' and 'that Federalism is founded in mistake,' (the sentiments of Fisher Ames, published by his friends,) to them I have nothing to say, and of them I have nothing to hope, but that they will add fuel to the flames until their own people may be ready to trample upon that Constitution under which we have so long prospered as a people, and which, if administered in its true spirit, will insure domestic tranquillity, promote the general welfare, and (in the language of its preamble) 'secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.'

"On this subject may we be advised by the wisdom of Washington in his farewell address, and may 'these counsels of an old and affectionate friend' (to use his own words) 'control the current of the passions, and prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations.' May 'they moderate the fury of party spirit, and guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism.'

"I have taken the liberty of writing you, currente calamo, this long letter; my object is my best apology; we are bound together by a common interest, and while so much is doing to alienate us from each other, shall no voice be heard preaching peace, union, and concord?"]

I could not offer you, sir, any argument so good as that which is so feelingly and eloquently enforced in the extract which I have just read. It is well known to the Senate that I have constantly entertained the opinion that the best way to check the spirit of abolition was to receive respectfully, and refer these petitions to the proper committee. That would be the Committee for the District of Columbia; one now, and which probably has been, ever since the commencement of the Government, so constituted as to comprise a majority of members from the slaveholding States. If they were thus referred, silently referred, as has been the practice during a great part of the period of the existence of the Government, there would be no agitation fomented here, no ground for asserting that the sacred right of petition had been violated.

The People may attempt to exercise that right in three different descriptions of cases: 1st. In instances where Congress manifestly does not possess the constitutional power to grant the relief prayed for. In these, the petition may be rejected instantly, without reference and without debate, and no just cause of complaint would exist. 2d. In cases where the constitutional power, the exercise of which is invoked, is controverted, doubtful or uncertain. In these, a reference of the petition may be necessary to examine into the existence of the power, as well as into the expediency of exercising it. Of this controverted nature is the legislative power of Congress in this District. No one would contend that a petition to establish a Bank of the United States should be instantly rejected, without debate and without reference, upon the sole ground that a large portion of the Senate should think it unconstitutional. Other examples of contested power may be easily conceived. And 3d. In cases where the power is incontestably possessed by Congress to grant the redress prayed for. In the two last descriptions of cases, I think that Congress is bound attentively to receive the petitions, and respectfully to dispose of them. A Government which, like ours, is the Government of the people, should be parentally administered, so as not only to do right, but, as far as possible, to give general satisfaction.

It has been argued that, when a petition is once put in the possession of the Senate, the right of petitioning has been practically enjoyed; and that the Senate may reject it instantly, refer it, lay it upon the table, or dispose of it as may be thought proper. Undoubtedly this is true; but in the great business of human life, public and private, the manner in which it is transacted is often as important, sometimes more important, than what is done or refused. And a wise Government should be particularly careful not to wound or inflame popular sensibility on subjects respecting which large masses choose to exercise the constitutional right of petition. The course which the Senate has pursued, in regard to these abolition petitions, for about two years past, is this: a Senator states from his place that he is charged with the presentation of of one of them, and moves that it be received. Another Senator thereupon rises, and moves that the motion to receive the petition be laid upon the table; and the Senate accordingly orders the motion to receive the petition to be laid upon the table; and thus the petition is not received in a parliamentary sense. The Senate does not decide the question of its reception.

This course I have always thought unfortunate. It is unsatisfactory. The petitioners feel that they have been neglected, and they allege that the right of petition has been denied. But it has been contended that these petitioners are mad and reckless fanatics, and it has been indignantly asked whether they merit respectful treatment. Mr. President, my observation and experience in life have taught me, that when we are addressed or assailed, our conduct should not be regulated by the harsh, vituperative, or fanatical language, or the condition, whatever it may be, of those who approach us, but by the standard of our own respectability, standing, and character in life. And in regard to these petitions, the question should not be so much what do the petitioners deserve, as what is due from the calm, elevated, dignified, august character of the Senate of the United States? These petitioners, misguided as they are, and highly mischievous as I believe the tendency of their proceedings to be, are a part of the people of the United States and our constituents. Shall we allow ourselves to be rash, to be moved by anger, or transported by rage, because fanatics, as they are called, or thoughtless men and women, present petitions to accomplish an object which, if seriously entertained, would justly excite profound alarm?

The mode of disposing of these petitions which the Senate has lately pursued has certainly not produced the tranquilizing effect so anxiously desired. It has, on the contrary, aggravated, and I fear will continue to aggravate, the disease. The Abolitionists have not diminished, but increased, and increased, as the most satisfactory information assures us, because they have been able to persuade many that the right of petition is invaded and has been denied. And many who are not Abolitionists now unite with them to assert and maintain the right of petition. It is to be seriously apprehended that co-operation for one purpose may ultimately lead to co-operation for other purposes, not within the original contemplation of the parties. If the Senate, by persisting in its recent course, enable the Abolitionists to derive succor from new allies; and if we should also unhappily place in their hands an additional instrument, by unnecessarily coupling the annexation of Texas with the subject of abolition in the same series of resolutions, then indeed there will be too much reason to apprehend that the North, at no distant day, will be united as one man.

It appears to me, sir, that what becomes us is to keep the Abolitionists separate and distinct from all other classes, standing out in bold and prominent relief; and the subject of Abolition separate and distinct from the right of petition, from Texas, and from all other subjects; let them stand alone, unmixed with the rest of the community, without the general sympathy, and exposed to the overwhelming force of the united opinion of all who desire the peace, the harmony, and the union of this Confederacy. I would receive, respectfully receive, their petitions, refer them, and occasionally present calm, dispassionate, and argumentative reports against them. This is the manner in which petitions for abolition were received in the first Congress, upon the recommendation of Mr. Madison; and that in which they were ever afterwards received, until the practice was changed about two years ago. What is there in the mere fact of the reception of a petition to create alarm? Or in its subsequent reference, especially to a committee known to be hostile to its object?

But it is said that these fanatics are beyond the reach of any argument; and it is triumphantly asked, Will you condescend to argue with such deluded persons? Yes! I say, yes. To preserve these admirable institutions of ours, and this glorious Union, from the possibility of all danger, I would argue with any one, with lunatics themselves, in their lucid intervals, and argue again and again. It is not, however, to recall alone the Abolitionists to a sense of peace and duty, that these appeals to the reason, the judgment, and the patriotism of the country, should be sent forth from these halls. They would address themselves, with powerful effect, to all that, vastly the largest, portion of the Northern community who are uninfected by Abolitionism. When has Congress unsuccessfully appealed to the intelligence, the patriotism, and the valor of the American people? In such a cause we should never tire nor despair.

Mr. President, I have no apprehension, not the smallest, for the safety of the Union, from any state of things which now exists. I will not answer for consequences which may ensue from harsh and opprobrious language, and from indiscretion and rashness on the part of individuals or of Congress, here or elsewhere. We allow ourselves to speak too frequently, and with too much levity, of a separation of this Union. It is a terrible word, to which our ears should not be familiarized. I desire to see in continued safety and prosperity this Union, and no other Union. I go for this Union as it is, one and indivisible, without diminution. I will neither voluntarily leave it, nor be driven out of it by force. Here, in my place, I shall contend for all the rights of the State which has sent me here. I shall contend for them with undoubting confidence, and in all the security which the Union confers, under all the high sanctions which the guaranties of the Constitution afford, and with the perfect conviction that they are safer in the Union than they would be out of the Union. I am opposed to all separate confederacies and to all sectional conventions. No state of actual danger exists to render them expedient, or to justify deliberation about them. This Union, this Government, has done nothing, nothing whatever, to excite the smallest alarm. It will do nothing; but if it should; if, contrary to all human probability, the rights and the security of the slaveholding States shall be assailed by any authoritative act emanating from this Capitol, a state of things for resistance, forcible resistance, will then occur. It will be time enough then to act. No man in full health will take medicine because he may be sick, amputate a perfectly sound limb because it may be fractured or seized with gangrene, or perpetrate suicide because death is his ultimate and inevitable doom. And, sir, when that fatal day shall come, if it ever do come, when the slaveholding States have to defend, by force, their rights, the State whose servant I am will rush to battle, as she always has done, with her accustomed ardor, and with gallantry unsurpassed by that of any other State. And those States and their citizens will be found to sustain these rights with most vigor and success, who, unmoved by false alarms or imaginary or aggravated dangers, with a firm and fixed purporse of soul, stand prepared, in every real exigency, to vindicate them at every extremity.

Having, Mr. President, said so much on the general subject, with the permission of the Senate, I will read certain resolutions which I have prepared, embracing the whole ground occupied by any of the petitions in respect to domestic slavery in the United States. They are the following:

Resolved, That the institution of domestic slavery, as now existing in many of the States of this Confederacy, is subject to the exclusive power and control of those States respectively; and that no other State, nor the people of any other State, nor Congress, possess, or can rightfully exercise, any power or authority whatever to interfere in any manner therewith.

Resolved, That if any citizens of the United States, regardless of the spirit of peace, harmony, and union, which should ever animate the various members of the Confederacy, and their respective citizens, shall present to the Senate any petitions touching the abolition of slavery in any of the States in which it exists, all such petitions shall be instantly rejected, without debate, and without further or other proceedings thereon, as relating to an object palpably beyond the scope of the constitutional power of Congress.

Resolved, That when the District of Columbia was ceded by the States of Virginia and Maryland to the United States, domestic slavery existed in both of those States, including the ceded territory; and that, as it still continues in both of them, it could not be abolished, within the District, without a violation of that good faith which was implied in the cession, and in the acceptance of the territory, nor, unless compensation were made to the proprietors of slaves, without a manifest infringement of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, nor without exciting a degree of just alarm and apprehension in the States recognising slavery, far transcending, in mischievous tendency, any possible benefit which could be accomplished by the abolition.

Resolved, therefore, That it is the deliberate judgment of the Senate, that the institution of domestic slavery ought not to be abolished within the District of Columbia; and it earnestly hopes that all sincere friends of the Union and of harmony and general tranquillity will cease to agitate this disturbing question. But the Senate feels itself, at the same time, constrained, from a high sense of duty in respect to the constitutional right of petition, to declare that it holds itself bound to receive and respectfully to treat any petitions, couched in decorous language, which may be presented by citizens of the United States, touching slavery within the District of Columbia.

Resolved, therefore, That, upon the presentation of any such petitions, they shall be received, and referred to the appropriate committee.

Resolved, That it would be highly inexpedient to abolish slavery in Florida, the only Territory of the United States in which it now exists, because of the serious alarm and just apprehensions which would be thereby excited in the States sustaining that domestic institution; because the people of that Territory have not asked it to be done, and, when admitted as a State into the Union, will be exclusively entitled to decide that question for themselves; and, also, because it would be in violation of a solemn compromise, made at a memorable and critical period in the history of this country, by which, while slavery was prohibited north, it was admitted south of the line of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude.

Resolved, That no power is delegated, by the Constitution, to Congress, to prohibit, in or between the States tolerating slavery, the sale and removal of such persons as are held in slavery by the laws of those States.

Resolved, That, whilst the Senate, with painful regret, has seen the perseverance of certain citizens of the United States in the agitation of the abolition of domestic slavery, thereby creating distrust and discontent and dissatisfaction among the people of the United States, who should ever cherish towards each other fraternal sentiments, it beholds, with the deepest satisfaction, every where prevailing an unconquerable attachment to the Union, as the sure bulwark of the safety, liberty, and happiness of the people of the United States.

There is nothing abstract or metaphysical in them. They relate to the abolition of slavery in the States, in the District of Columbia, and in Florida, the only Territory of the United States where it exists, and to the sale and removal of slaves in the States whose laws recognise the institution of slavery. They cover the whole field, and nothing but the field: they have no ulterior views. They approach the subject in hand directly, without the necessity of any interpretation. They do not seek to renovate any party, nor to place the high interests to which they relate in the exclusive custody of any one party. Resting upon, and sustained by, the Constitution, they appeal to the sound discretion, the sober judgment, and the patriotism of all parties. I may not ask the sense of the Senate to be expressed upon each of them; but I shall offer that relating to the District of Columbia, and that to the Territory of Florida, as an amendment to the fifth resolution, submitted by the Senator from South Carolina. I think the charge upon the petitioners of intermeddling with abolition in this District is harsh, and that some less offensive word should be used. The District of Columbia is the seat of the common Government of the United States. It was ceded for that express purpose. Each State has as much interest in it, and as much right to petition about any thing within it, as any other State, and no more. Nor can I concur with the resolution, in declaring that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia would be a direct and dangerous attack upon the institution of slavery in the States. I am prepared to say that it would excite "a degree of just alarm and apprehension in the States recognising slavery, far transcending, in mischievous tendency, any possible benefit which could be accomplished by the abolition, or to use any other equivalent language. We can no more say that the abolition of slavery in this District would be a direct attack upon the institution in the States, than we could assert, if any one of the slaveholding States were to abolish slavery within its own limits, that that would be a direct attack on the institution in other slaveholding States; or that Great Britain, by abolishing slavery in her West India possessions, made a direct attack upon it in the United States. Nor is the case at all altered by the motives, whatever they may be, which shall be avowed for abolition. In conclusion, I move the third resolution of the series which I have suggested, as an amendment to the fifth resolution proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CALHOUN followed. He said he felt some inducement to persevere in the course he had heretofore pursued, by now seeing the concessions which were proposed by the resolutions just read by the Senator from Kentucky. Mr. C. now saw it conceded, that where the object was clearly unconstitutional, the Senate was not bound to receive a petition. At first, the broad ground was taken that the right of petition was so sacred that any refusal to receive a petition, no matter on what subject, and no matter how objectionable its language, would be an invasion of it. Now it was conceded that they were not bound to receive a petition when the subject of it was clearly unconstitutional. Now, as to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky to the fifth resolution. He would state, in general terms, what was the great characteristic difference between them. The Senator went on the principle that concession was the way to meet these Abolitionists. He, on the other hand, went on the ground that we have no safety but in standing fast on our rights. What was the state of the question? The Abolitionists tell you, in so many words, that their object is to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia as but one step towards final abolition in the States. With this object, avowed by the Abolitionists, what do duty and policy demand on our part? We see the end; and that, if it can be effected, it would be our destruction. Shall we yield, or stand fast? That is the question. If we yield an inch, we are gone. The very ground on which we are asked to make the first concession will be urged on us with equal force to make the second, the third, and every intermediate one till the last is consummated. The first is to yield the right of petition, and to discuss the subject with the Abolitionists, in order to appease them, and to stop agitation. This the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) urges on us, which he tells us would have a happy effect in quieting the public feeling. Does he not see that, if we should have the folly to make this concession, we will be next urged to yield to the abolition of slavery in this District on the very same ground? We will be told that there are but two thousand slaves in the District, and if we yield to so small a request, all will be quiet. If that be conceded, we will be next told, we must yield to the abolition in the Territories, and then to the abolition of what they call the slave trade between the States, and, finally, to abolition in the States. At every step they would become stronger, and we weaker, if we should be so infatuated as to make the first concession; and the Senator from Kentucky, at each step, would no doubt be able to read just such a letter as he had just read, from some well intentioned but weak individual from the North, telling us, if we would only yield the immediate point at issue, all will be quiet, and that our cause would be strengthened. No: there never was a question agitated where the most unyielding opposition was so necessary for success. The difference between him and the Senator from Kentucky was as wide as the poles. That gentleman was for concession, and he was utterly opposed to all concessions in any shape or form; and for this reason he was decidedly opposed to his amendment. It was now too late in the day to go into the subject farther, and he would conclude by repeating, what he had so often said, that while he was ready to yield to any modification going to the mere phraseology, he would not agree, under any circumstance, to surrender the principles on which they were drawn.

Mr. CLAY, in reply to Mr. CALHOUN, observed, the Senator from South Carolina seems highly delighted with having gained a point which he calls a concession on my part: that is, the immediate rejection of all petitions touching abolition in the States. But whoever contended that Congress was bound to entertain petitions relating to an object manifestly beyond the scope of its constitutional powers? We have only insisted upon its obligation to receive petitions when Congress possesses power, or the power, being controverted, is a fit subject of investigation. Whatever has been gained by the Senator, in respect to these, I fear is more than neutralized by a loss to the slaveholding interest, arising from the handle which is made of an alleged denial of the right of petition. If our object really be to diminish the number of petitioners, we should present no collateral or false issues to the country. We should never forget that it is not here that we should look for salutary effect from our proceedings, but among the people.

But the Senator expresses his alarm at the reception of petitions. Why, sir, what is there justly alarming in the mere fact of receiving a petition? Action, Congressional action, alone can justify alarm. The Senator thinks my resolutions make a concession. Of what? The right to abolish slavery in the States? No. They demand an instantaneous rejection of all such petitions, as being palpably beyond the powers of Congress, and therefore not even debateable. The right to abolish slavery in the District? No. The strongest grounds—stronger than the Senator's own resolution—are assumed against it. The right to abolish it in the Territory of Florida? No. All the considerations against it are arrayed in forcible language. The right to prohibit the sale and removal of slaves from State to State? No. The constitutional power of Congress to do that is denied. And it is remarkable that, while my resolutions deny that power, his are altogether silent about it.

What, then, do my resolutions concede? They admit the right of petition touching slavery in this District. But before the Senator can justly denominate that a concession, he ought to prove that there exists no such right. That, I think, he has failed to do. If, as I think, the Constitution requires the Senate to receive such petitions, it is manifest that, in obeying its commands, and conforming to duty, the Senate grants nothing, concedes nothing. If it be the right of the petitioners to present, and the duty of the Senate to receive these petitions, it is manifest that, by refusing to receive them, cause of complaint is given. Now, I have always found that the best way to ensure respect to my own feelings and rights from others, is to treat their feelings and rights with respect. The Senator mistakes moderation, conciliation, and firmness, for concession; and rashness, and intemperate language, for security.

Concession! We cannot alter the Constitution. It is that which guaranties the right of petition; and the alleged concession is to be found not in my resolution, but in the Constitution. But what, again I ask, is there in the fact of receiving a petition which is to throw us into a nervous fit? Why, sir, if a man were to present me a petition to grant him Ashland, (or Orozimbo! exclaimed some Senator—or Orozimbo, said Mr. CLAY, whose death I am sorry to announce to the Senate, and he was a great loss, public and private,) I would, without the least apprehension for the loss of my property, put it in my pocket, or lay it upon the table. Will not the Senator comprehend the difference between the act of receiving a petition, and the grant of the thing petitioned for? When we see some measure of Government, affecting the security of the interest in question—some real concession, it will be time enough to proclaim the existence of danger, and to resort to means of security.

The Senator from South Carolina has adverted to the radical difference between us on this subject. I regret it, but I fear that it is not confined to this matter. For a long period of our service in the public councils, no two public men ever coincided upon all great measures of policy more than the Senator and myself. We agreed as to the War, the Tariff, Internal Improvements, a National Bank, etc. But, when, to my utter astonishment, I heard the Senator, at the extra session, declare that he had always thought a national bank unconstitutional, the last link in the chain of opinion which connected us was broken and destroyed.

The honorable Senator is not more firmly resolved than I am to sustain the just rights of the slave-holding States. We differ as to the means. He goes for strong language, menacing tones, and irritating measures; I for temperate, but firm, language, conciliation, and for obeying the injunction of the Constitution, in respect to the right of petition, which is never improperly denied without wounding popular sensibility. He, doubtless, does not desire to affect the stability of the Union; but I cannot but fear that his whole course on this subject has that tendency. I think that all our proceedings here should be regulated by the fact that the States are all parts of one great confederacy, and should seek to increase the harmony and strengthen the union between them. We should never act as if we were a divided people, or could possibly become so. I cannot believe that it is prudent or wise to be so often alluding to the separation of the Union. We ought not to be perpetually exclaiming, wolf, wolf, wolf. We are too much in the habit of speaking of divorces, separation, disunion. In private life, if a wife pouts, and frets, and scolds, what would be thought of the good sense or discretion of the husband, who should threaten her with separation, divorce, disunion? who should use these terrible words upon every petty disagreement in domestic life? No man, who has a heart or right feelings, would employ such idle menaces. He would approach the lady with kind and conciliatory language, and apply those natural and more agreeable remedies, which never fail to restore domestic harmony. [A general burst of laughter, which continued for some time.]

Mr. CALHOUN replied, that if he had really been inconsistent, as the Senator supposes, in reference to the bank, he might find a justification in the example of the Senator himself. The only difference between them would be, that the Senator had changed from an anti-bank to a bank man, and he from a bank to an anti-bank man.

The subject of the bank, and the consistency of himself and the Senator, had been gratuitously introduced, and did not belong to the question under consideration; but as the Senator had thought proper to make the charge of inconsistency, he felt called on to repel it.

He, then, had never been, in any proper sense of the term, a bank man, as he had been opposed to the system ever since he had formed a deliberate and mature opinion in relation to it. It is true, he supported the chartering the late Bank of the United States in 1816, but it is no less true that he was opposed to the system at that time, and so expressed himself in his opening speech on the question. In supporting the bank then, he yielded to what he believed to be the necessity of the case, growing out of the connection between the Government and the banks—a connection which originated before his time, and was beyond his control. He then said that, so long as that connection existed—so long as the Government received and treated bank notes as gold and silver—it was bound to regulate the banks, and that a Bank of the United States was the only efficient and legitimate means of effecting it; and such is still his opinion.

If, then, his course in 1816 and now, was different in relation to the bank, it must be traced to a change of circumstances, and not to a change of opinion. At the former period, the connection between the Government and the banks existed with no prospect of its termination, or the possibility of rescinding it; but, now, fortunately, it has ceased by operation of law; and he, for the first time since he had been in public life, was free to take a position in reference to the bank in conformity to his principles. Four years ago, on questions growing out of the removal of the deposites, he explicitely avowed his opinion, in the strongest terms, against the system. If this was the only charge of inconsistency that could be brought against him in a long political life, he had reason certainly to congratulate himself as not being inconsistent, and he certainly had as much right to accuse the Senator of separating from him, as he had to make the charge against him.

But the Senator is not content with making the charge of inconsistency. He makes the grave accusation against him of alluding to the possible dissolution of the Union; but fortunately for him, there was but a slight difference between the Senator and himself in reference to this accusation. We both speak of the possible dissolution of the Union; the Senator when the Bank is the subject of discussion, and he when Abolition. That is all; and he might with as much justice charge the Senator with hostility to the Union, as he had him.

But the Senator tells us that we set out in public life together; that we travelled a long time the same road, but have separated. He believed it was true that we both set out on the same principles, and in the same party. We both professed at the start the doctrines of '98, and belonged to the Republican party; and it is true that we are now separated. He left it to the world to judge which had departed from the original faith. It was not a question for the Senator and him to decide.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator himself was the first to speak of a radical difference between him and me on all subjects. We set out in life together; but in his opinion the Bank of the United States cut asunder the last chain between us. We were together in '98, and since then we have taken long voyages; but whither did the principles of '98 carry him? into what port? They carried me into the port in which I always anchor—the port of the Union—the whole Union—without the separation from it of any member.

The Senator chose to repeat what is no novelty, but has been often suggested on this floor, that I have changed my opinion as to a Bank of the United States.

[Mr. CALHOUN. I accused him of no change.]

But I have changed, resumed Mr. CLAY; and I have changed with the country. I opposed the old Bank of the United States, on the want of constitutional power, and on other grounds. But the war came, then a suspension of specie payments, and a derangement of the currency; and the whole country cried out for a Bank of the United States. If the country had been adverse to a bank in 1816, it could not have been established. If I am taunted with such a change, I thank God it is the only point of national policy which, in the whole of my public life, I have changed.

In 1815–16 the constitutional power to establish a bank was admitted. We were then in habits of the greatest intimacy. I was then Speaker of the House, and he at the head of the committee out of which the bank grew. Never then did I hear from him a sentiment adverse to the power of the Government to establish a bank; and when, afterwards, in company with a gentleman from Virginia, I heard it for the first time, mutual surprise was expressed and felt.

Mr. CALHOUN replied, that the Senator draws a feeble conclusion, if he intends to impeach the correctness of his memory in reference to his course in 1816. It would indeed be surprising if, after more than twenty years, the Senator should recollect the position which he assumed in discussion at that time in reference to the banking system, while it is not all surprising that he should forget it, even if it attracted his attention at the time. Four years since, on an occasion not less memorable, he made the strongest declaration against the system which stands on record, and yet the Senator does not recollect it; and with what propriety, then, can the Senator venture to appeal to the absence of his recollection on the same subject twenty-two years since, with the view of impeaching the correctness of his memory?

Mr. CLAY said he would not controvert the assertion of the gentleman, but he had not heard him.

The Senate then adjourned.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, Jan. 10, 1838.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the fifth of these resolutions, together with the substitute offered yesterday by Mr. CLAY, in relation to slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories.

Mr. CALHOUN rose and said that he had examined the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) which had been offered as a substitute for the fifth resolution, and that it was impossible for him to bring his mind to give it his support, or to vote for it if it should be adopted in any thing like its present shape. He would very very briefly state his reasons.

It, in the first place, entirely abandoned the Territories to the Abolitionists. His fifth resolution covered both this District and the Territories, but the amendment wholly omitted the latter, and left them defenceless to the invasion of the foe.

He next objected, that it conceded, by almost necessary implication, the right of Congress to appropriate the public funds to purchase and emancipate slaves; a concession among the most dangerous and unconstitutional that could be made. If once admitted, it would be very easy to complete the end the Abolitionists have in view, and that wholly at our expense. If we yield that point, the work will soon be consummated.

His next objection was, that it impliedly admitted it to be the duty of Congress to receive and discuss petitions to abolish slavery in the District: in his opinion a most unfounded and dangerous assumption; but he had so fully expressed his opinion on that point, on former occasions, that he would not now occupy the time of the Senate in repeating the reasons for his opinion.

He finally objected, that the tone of the amendment, and of the remarks with which it was ushered in, was altogether too low for the subject and the occasion. He was adverse to all violence of language, in the expression of legislative opinions; but when the subject was one of such unprovoked outrage on one-half the States of the Union, and so pregnant with disastrous consequences to all, he could not reconcile it to his impression of propriety to speak in the low and subdued tone of the amendment.

For these reasons he could not vote for the amendment, should it be substituted for his fifth resolution, unless greatly modified and strengthened.

Mr. CLAY said he very seriously regretted it; but if the Senate would consider the subject, they would find nothing in the objections. As to the amendment not providing protection for the Territories, in the series of resolutions which Mr. C. had offered yesterday, there was one that expressly provided for Florida, the only Territory concerned, placed on the strongest grounds.

As to the right of the Government to purchase the slaves in the District, the amendment recognised no such thing. It simply says you cannot emancipate them without compensation. But whether you can do it at all or not, it does not assert. It says you cannot do it without compensation; but it does not say you can with compensation.

My idea in framing that resolution was to throw around the District of Columbia every security, in three distinct propositions. One was the plighted faith of this Government in the transaction by which the District was acquired. The next was, that you have no right to abolish slavery here without indemnity. The third was, that you cannot do it without exciting a degree of alarm in the Southern States of this Union—without transcending all the benefits of any results. I hoped these would form a barrier that would exist for ever, or at least till circumstances should no longer require it. But I have no objections to withdraw one of them; the two remaining ones will be sufficient.

If I am right in supposing there is nothing in the exceptionable clause that authorizes the right to purchase the slaves in the District of Columbia, there can be nothing whatever as it respects the slaves in other parts of the Union; more especially as in the resolutions themselves I declare the inviolability of slavery in the States.

The Senator's third objection is to the right of petition involved in the amendment. Sir, I warn the Senate that there can be no continuance of the invasion of the right to petition. Mr. C. mentioned a State Legislature that had now under consideration this subject of the invasion of the right of petition; and from Kentucky, a slave country, he had this morning received a letter from one of the most intelligent men, in which he says you cannot maintain your ground; beware how you attempt it. This is a point on which I know I differ from the Senator, and I should regard nothing more fatal than a deliberate determination of this body to invade the right of petition. Does not every State claim in the District equal rights? There is but one measure more fatal than the invasion of the right of petition, and that is to adopt the concluding resolution of the Senator from South Carolina. I make no imputation against his motives: but that his act may be fatal to the peace, and may endanger the Union of the country, is to be seriously apprehended.

The last objection was that the tone of the amendment was subdued; but with what propriety is this charge? It is in language as strong as ever was used. You cannot abolish slavery without a breach of the public faith. Can any thing be stronger? It equals the Constitution itself.

And then that you cannot abolish slavery without mischievous and dangerous results. Is this undertoned? Sir, in public life, I prefer firmness and decision unaccompanied with rashness or violence.

Mr. BUCHANAN inquired if he was to understand the Senator from Kentucky as having modified his resolution.

Mr. CLAY said he would readily do so, as it appeared that it would render the resolution more acceptable to the Senate. Mr. C. accordingly struck out that part of the resolution, relating to compensation to the owners of slaves.

Mr. HUBBARD then called for the reading of the original resolution, and it was read accordingly.

Mr. CLAY said that there was one observation peculiarly applicable to the resolution under consideration. He believed that we had but one Territory, that of Florida; and how could we assert that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the Territories of the United States would be a violation of faith, implied in the cession of the District, since Florida was acquired twenty years after the cession.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the part of the resolution referred to by the Senator from Kentucky was inserted as an amendement offered by his colleague. He presumed that his colleague referred to the District of Columbia only.

Mr. PRESTON, with the consent of the Senate modified his amendment, so as to append the words "violation of the public faith, implied in the cession of the District of Columbia," at the end of the resolution.

Mr. KING of Alabama said his principal objection to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky had been removed by the modification the honorable gentleman had himself made; as it stood, it was to him very objectionable. He was not prepared by any action here, to give to the people of any portion of this country the idea, even by implication, that the public money could be appropriated to liberate slaves in this District, or in the States or Territories. The Senator from Kentucky had, with a becoming spirit of liberality, removed that objection, and he would now give the amendment his support. He had not risen to enter into any discussion. He had remained silent during this protracted debate, on a subject in which all must know he could but feel a lively interest. His sole desire was, that such a direction might be given to this matter, as to allay the excitement that pervaded the country, and put a stop to the further progress of the spirit of abolition. If the Senator from Kentucky will further modify his amendment, so as to include the Territories, setting forth in explicit terms, that, to abolish slavery in them, would be unjust to the inhabitants, calculated to excite just apprehensions of the slaveholding States, and dangerous to their domestic institutions, he believed it would do much to quiet the public mind; and he hoped, with this modification, the honorable Senator from South Carolina would consent to accept it.

Mr. CLAY then modified resolution, so as to meet the views suggested by Mr. KING.

Mr. SEVIER asked the Senate to add the words, "and also against the treaty stipulation with Spain of 22d February, 1819, which guaranties the right of property."

Mr. CLAY remarked that he was not aware of such a treaty stipulation; but if there was such, he would cheerfully insert it.

Mr. CALHOUN said he could appeal to the Senate, that he had shown throughout this discussion a liberal spirit of concession, and a perfect readiness to make any modification of these resolutions that did not sacrifice the principles on which they were based. Farther he could not go, and he had hoped that none of the friends of those principles, who had thus far supported him, would ask him to go farther; and it was with profound regret that he had heard the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, (Mr. KING.) He would tell him, to vote for this amendment to strike out the fifth resolution, and substitute what the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) proposes, even as now modified, would be an utter abandonment of the entire ground assumed in the resolutions already adopted. The great and governing principles which pervade all these resolutions are non-interference on the part of any of the States or their citizens with the institutions of the other States, and the non-discrimination on the part of this Government (the common agent of the States) in reference to the institutions of the several States—principles that lie at the foundation of our political system—principles which cannot be departed from without bringing the whole superstructure to the ground—principles which place slavery in this District, or wherever it may exist in the Territories, under the same broad shield that protects it in the States. To attack it in one State would be to attack it in all; and in like manner, and for the same reason, to attack it here, or in the Territories, is to attack it in the States; and this the fifth resolution, now proposed to be stricken out, directly affirms. He regarded slavery, wherever it exists throughout the whole Southern section, as one common question, and is as much under the protection of the Constitution here, and in the Territories, as in the States themselves; and herein lies our only safety. Abandon this, and all is abandoned.

He would tell the southern Senators if these great principles be abandoned, theirs will be the responsibility. If they yield, if even a small portion, one or two, yield in the slaveholding States, the members from the non-slaveholding States must yield. They cannot do otherwise. You force them to do it. How can they stand up when you abandon your position? How can they defend themselves at home, when told that even southern members had surrendered the ground? Let not the fallacious hope of drawing in votes, of uniting all, induce a surrender of the strong and impregnable position we occupy. There is no hope but in meeting the danger, and it is better to stand alone, without a vote beyond the slaveholding States, than to surrender an inch of ground. But such will not be the alternative. If we stand fast, all who agree with us from every quarter, all who hold to our political creed, will ultimately rally around our principles and the Constitution; but, on the contrary, if we surrender our ground, in order to bring in the timid and those of an opposite creed, we will lose all. The timid will become more timid, and those of a different political faith, in spite of all the concessions you may make, will, in the hour of trial, be found in the opposite ranks; and thus principles and supporters, all will be lost. Be it remembered, be it held fast in our recollection, that the fifth resolution has been so modified, as to phraseology, as to make it acceptable, he believed he might say, to nearly all; and that if it be struck out, it could not but be considered as an abandonment of the principles which pervade these resolutions, and an adoption of those contained in the amendment, as far as this District and the Territories were concerned.

He ought not, perhaps, to be surprised that Senators should differ so widely from him on this subject. They did not view the disease as he did. He saw working at the bottom of these movements the same spirit which two centuries ago convulsed the Christian world, and deluged it in blood; that fierce and cruel spirit of persecution which originated in assumed superiority and mistaken principles of duty, that made one man believe that he was accountable for the sins of another, and that he was the judge of what belonged to his temporal and eternal welfare, and was bound, at the peril of his own soul, to interfere to rescue him from perdition. Against this fell and bloody spirit it was in vain to interpose this amendment. Something higher, more sacred, appealing more deeply to the heart and understanding, must be offered; and let him tell Southern Senators, that if they should surrender the impregnable position assumed in the original resolutions, and place their hope in mere inexpediency, the time will come when they will bewail their folly in sackcloth and ashes. An inflexible adherence to our principles and our rights, and a decided and emphatic tone, equally remote from violence or concession, only can save us. The deluded agitators must be plainly told that it is no concern of theirs what is the character of our institutions; and that they must not be touched here, or in the Territories, or the States, by them or the Government; that they were under the guardian protection of the Constitution, and that we stood prepared to repel all interference, or disconnection, be the consequence what it might.

It had pleased Providence, said Mr. CALHOUN, to cast his lot in the slaveholding States. There were his hopes, and all that was near and dear to him. His first duty was to them, and he held every other, even his obligations to this Government and the Union, as sacred as he regarded them, subordinate to their safety. He knew he would be assailed, both here and elsewhere, for this avowal; but he had long been accustomed to such assaults. They had no terror for him. It would take something much more formidable to compel him to suppress his sentiments, or drive him from the performance of what he believed to be his duty, than the pens of hired scribblers, or the denunciations of an organized press.

Before he concluded his remarks, he would call on the Southern Senators to bear in mind that the first battle is to be fought in this District and in the Territories; and that, by carrying these points, the Abolitionists hoped to carry them in the States. To yield here, or in the Territories, is to give ground where the two lines come into conflict; to give the first victory to the foe, with all the fatal consequences which usually follow a defeat on the first encounter. With these reflections, he would ask, he would make a solemn appeal to his associates from the South: which presented the more impregnable position on these exposed points—the high and lofty ground of non-interference and non-discrimination assumed in the fifth resolution, or that of inexpediency in the amendment now proposed as a substitute? And he would ask, on what motive of policy, or duty, would they surrender the stronger and occupy the weaker—give up the Constitution, and rely on expediency?

He saw (said Mr. C.) in the question before us the fate of the South. It was a higher than the mere naked question of master and slave. It involved a great political institution, essential to the peace and existence of one-half of this Union. A mysterious Providence had brought together two races, from different portions of the globe, and placed them together in nearly equal numbers in the Southern portion of this Union. They were there inseparably united, beyond the possibility of separation. Experience had shown that the existing relation between them secured the peace and happiness of both. Each had improved; the inferior greatly; so much so, that it had attained a degree of civilization never before attained by the black race in any age or country. Under no other relation could they co-exist together. To destroy it was to involve a whole region in slaughter, carnage, and desolation; and, come what will, we must defend and preserve it.

This agitation has produced one happy effect at least; it has compelled us to the South to look into the nature and character of this great institution, and to correct many false impressions that even we had entertained in relation to it. Many in the South once believed that it was a moral and political evil; that folly and delusion are gone; we see it now in its true light, and regard it as the most safe and stable basis for free institutions in the world. It is impossible with us that the conflict can take place between labor and capital, which make it so difficult to establish and maintain free institutions in all wealthy and highly civilized nations where such institutions as ours do not exist. The Southern States are an aggregate, in fact, of communities, not of individuals. Every plantation is a little community, with the master at its head, who concentrates in himself the united interests of capital and labor, of which he is the common representative. These small communities aggregated make the State in all, whose action, labor, and capital is equally represented and perfectly harmonized. Hence the harmony, the union, and stability of that section, which is rarely disturbed except through the action of this Government. The blessing of this state of things extends beyond the limits of the South. It makes that section the balance of the system; the great conservative power, which prevents other portions, less fortunately constituted, from rushing into conflict. In this tendency to conflict in the North between labor and capital, which is constantly on the increase, the weight of the South has and will ever be found on the Conservative side; against the aggression of one or the other side, which ever may tend to disturb the equilibrium of our political system. This is our natural position, the salutary influence of which has thus far preserved, and will long continue to preserve, our free institutions, if we should be left undisturbed. Such are the institutions which these deluded madmen are stirring heaven and earth to destroy, and which we are called on to defend by the highest and most solemn obligations that can be imposed on us as men and patriots.

Mr. KING said that his feelings on this subject were well understood, and his position so well known, that no man could mistake it. He had not, therefore, taken any part in the discussion on the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina. He had confined himself to a silent vote. He regretted that he found himself compelled by the remarks of the Senator (Mr. CALHOUN) to say a very few words in justification of the vote he proposed to give on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky. He would enter into no discussion with regard to the condition of the two races; nor would he inquire whether any or what advantage had resulted from the position they occupy towards each other. It was sufficient for him to take the institution of slavery as it was; as it existed before the formation of the Constitution, and as it was recognised and guaranteed by it. There, said Mr. K. let it rest. Let us alone; we want no protection; we are every way competent to protect ourselves. We deprecate the agitation of this question from no personal fear. They of the South could and would protect themselves. Their only fear was for the Union. That might be destroyed by this continued intermeddling with rights secured by the Constitution of our country. Beyond this, he repeated, they had no fear. We are told, said Mr. K. by the Senator from South Carolina, that should we vote for the amendment offered to this resolution we should yield a vital principle. To prove the incorrectness of this assertion had alone induced him to trouble the Senate with a single remark. Then, sir, what do we yield? We yield the peculiar phraseology employed by the Senator, nothing more; in every other particular, the amendment is identically the same with the original resolution. Examine and compare them, said Mr. K. Does the original resolution prohibit the reception of petitions on the subject of slavery in this body? No, sir: there is not one word of prohibition. Does it present any resistance to abolition in this District on constitutional grounds? It does not. It declares that all interference with slavery in this District would be a violation of public faith implied in the cession of Virginia and Maryland. That it would excite alarm and apprehension, and produce dangerous consequences in the States where slavery exists. The amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky declares the same.

Mr. K. read the amendment offered by Mr. CLAY, and appealed to the Senator from South Carolina whether it would not be better to adopt that, than, by adhering to the original resolution, lose the votes of some gentlemen who were willing to go with them, but objected to the harshness of its language. Why should we, asked Mr. K. drive from us gentlemen who were prepared to go with us, for the sake only of using strong expressions? He regretted, Mr. K. said, to have been drawn into this discussion. He had voted for the resolutions that passed, throughout, and had been sorry to see some of his friends vote against them, because he believed that they carried out the true principles of our Government. With respect to the resolution then before them, he was desirous so to act as to induce his Northern friends to vote with the South; and this he did not wish to bring about by the abandonment of any great principle, but by such modifications of language as would render it acceptable to them. Should the adoption of these resolutions fail of the effect intended; should these miserable, deluded men, increase their numbers, and be able to connect themselves with party politics, and produce results adverse to the interests of the section of country from whence he came, all he could say was, that although he should deeply deplore it, he was prepared to resist them with as much firmness as the Senator from South Carolina, or any man living.

Mr. CLAY said that what had fallen from the Senator from Alabama, (Mr. KING) while it had been heard by him with great pleasure, on account of its sound good sense and truth, had, at the same time, greatly superseded the necessity of his saying much of what otherwise it had been his intention to have said. He would, however, make a few brief remarks in reply to Mr. CALHOUN'S objections. That gentleman repeatedly urges all the ground is given up—all is sacrificed—concessions are made, &c. and he urges against the resolution now before the Senate that he (Mr. CLAY) waives the rights of the South! But how can this be? Have we not (said Mr. C.) already passed the first four of the gentleman's resolutions? Have we not by them asserted, instead of abandoning, these rights? If I have abandoned them, he (Mr. CALHOUN) has abandoned them; for I have only voted for these resolutions, whereas he has framed them. If I have made concessions, he has made more for this concession. If I have given up the right of petition, he has done so too; for he has not once mentioned that point in all his four lengthy resolutions; and, therefore, if I am wrong, he is more in the wrong; for hitherto I have only followed him in voting for his resolutions. If I am charged with waiving the constitutional ground, the charge bears more strongly against himself, for he has waived it throughout; he has not touched upon it; and, more than that, expressly said, in a speech reported by himself, that he should not go upon that ground in order that he might obtain all the votes of those who only differed on constitutional grounds. All, therefore, that the gentleman urges against me, tells with greater force against himself; for all that I have omitted, he set out from the first with declaring it to be his intention to omit He has omitted it; he has omitted the right of petition; he has omitted the constitutional ground; and yet he goes against this resolution for no other reason than because of this same omission! The object Mr. CLAY had in view was to allay excitement, and to avoid creating enemies to the South, by driving our friends into opposition to us, by any sort of violence or unreasonable exactions; in a word, not to render them opponents of the institutions of the South, by forcing them to abandon their principles. Mr. C. wished to leave them ground to stand upon; he did not wish to take it from under their feet, and thus force them into an involuntary opposition to the institution of slavery, which, it appeared to him, was the tendency of the contrary course.

For this reason Mr. C. was in favor of doing nothing which would violate the principles of those who, though they were willing to support Southern institutions, could not be brought to give up what they deemed to be high constitutional rights. Therefore, he (Mr. C.) was in favor of receiving petitions, of referring them, of acting upon them, and thereby quashing them and this agitation forever. This was the course of Washington when Dr. Franklin presented a petition for the abolition of slavery; it was received, it was referred, it was acted on, and what was the consequence? The consequence was, that the whole subject slept a dead sleep, and was not awakened up until the Missouri question brought with it all the agitations of that period. Some men by exciting too much often lose every thing. Mr. C. hoped that the South might be saved from such false friends, who often drive by violence their firmest supporters to become their opponents, and by intemperate zeal go the way to endanger those who but for them would be safe; without whose zeal they would lose nothing, but by its intemperance and violence often lose all.

Mr. SEVIER expressed his wish, that as the Indians had slaves, and slavery was therefore one of their domestic institutions, a clause might be introduced to guaranty the perpetuity of slavery among the Indian tribes.

Mr. NILES then offered an amendment to the resolution which he supported by reasons in its favor.

Mr. ALLEN said he was fully satisfied that the object of both Senators who had brought forward these resolutions was virtually the same and identical. He agreed with them both in the object of presenting to the friends of the Union in non-slaveholding States a common ground and foundation on which they might stand firm and united in resisting the dangerous efforts of the spirit of abolition. In viewing the original resolution, and comparing it with the substitute now proposed by Mr. CLAY, he felt himself bound to declare that the object in view appeared to him most ably met by the original resolution of the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.) This resolution was, in his view, a specific, direct, and tangible proposition. On the contrary, the substitute of Mr. CLAY, though indeed substantially the same, appeared to him (Mr. A) to cover too much ground, to be spread over too wide a surface, to be, in a word, historical and argumentative, rather than a condensed expression of a clear and definite proposition. In his judgment, therefore, the substitute now offered was objectionable; because, from the reasons he had given, it was more calculated to give rise to cavil, doubt, and controversy, than to answer the object which both professedly had in view. On this ground, and for no other reason, he should vote in favor of the original resolution. The substitute was too multifarious and embraced too many different topics; it involved many different questions, leading to a variety of issues. In thus speaking, he (Mr. A) did not wish to be understood as dissenting from the general doctrines contained in the substitute of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY.) He (Mr. A.) concurred in the object, while he differed only in the form. It was very essential for those who come from the free States to be placed on such a foundation as to be able to defend themselves from attacks at home on this irritating subject, and to do this, the simplest and least involved proposition appeared to him to be preferable. Such, in his view, was the original proposition, and, therefore, it should still receive his vote.

Mr. CLAY called for the yeas and nays on his amendment, as modified, which were ordered.

The question was taken on Mr. CLAY'S amendment or substitue, and it was adopted, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Niles, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, and Williams—19.

NAYS—Messrs Allen, Benton, Black, Calhoun, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Walker, Wright, and Young—18.

The question then occurring on the amendment, as amended.

Mr. BUCHANAN inquired if the question was divisible.

The VICE PRESIDENT replied that, according to Parliamentary rules, the question at its present stage was not divisible.

Mr. STRANGE said that, having entered his protest against the introduction of these resolutions, it had been his intention to remain silent during the further progress of the discussion, and he should not have broken in upon that purpose, but for the situation in which he now felt himself placed compelling him to trouble the Senate with a few remarks. He had already assigned his reasons for opposition to the consideration of these resolutions; but, as their consideration had been decided upon, as we had passed the Rubicon, no one was more desirous than he that the battle should be fought out to the best advantage. The only advantage which he supposed any one hoped for from the discussion of this subject was, that a strong moral impression would thereby be made in our favor in the non-slaveholding States. The course which things had taken in this debate had convinced him that the confidence he had hitherto reposed in our Northern friends was not ill founded: they had stood by us upon every important vote, with a manly firmness and a patriotic devotion to the cause of the Union, which satisfied him there was, in truth, but little cause for apprehending any decided action on the part of the Abolitionists. But that had not been the ground on which he had opposed the discussion of these resolutions. It was, that discussion itself was calculated to do mischief; and in that opinion the experience of the last few days had fully confirmed him. The present discussion had, he believed, done mischief; and the most likely method of counteracting that mischief was by making, in the result, a strong expression of opinion with much unanimity. The apprehension that many of our friends would not go with us upon the fifth resolution in its original terms, had induced him to vote for the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) as modified by the Senator from Connecticut, (Mr. NILES.) For himself, he greatly preferred the original resolution, if for no other reason, for its condensation of substance and terseness of style. The advantage of a resolution so constructed had been fully and happily expressed by the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Allen;) but, fearing they could not make so imposing a show upon it as upon the substitute, he had voted for it. He had, in fact, feared an actual defeat. But the result of the vote upon the adoption of the amendment, being 19 to 18, had satisfied him that, in point of numbers, they could do quite or nearly as well upon the original resolution, and, in point of expression, much better; and he therefore moved a reconsideration of the vote for the adoption of the amendment.

After some remarks from Mr. NILES,

Mr. CALHOUN said he had no doubt that the adoption of Mr. CLAY's resolution originated in a great measure from a desire to get a very strong vote. He thought he saw it at the time; and now the result showed that he was not mistaken. But Mr. C. now hoped that those Senators who had heretofore voted for his resolutions, would continue to give them their support in adhering to the fifth one, unless they found some objection to the phraseology, which, he repeated, he was willing to alter. This resolution was drawn up to meet the Vermont resolutions, which went on the ground that slavery ought to be abolished in the District of Columbia, because it was immoral and sinful. His resolutions met those of Vermont on these grounds; and unless gentlemen intended to meet them on other grounds, they must continue to vote with him. All he asked of the Senate was to say yea or nay. Will you meet the Vermont resolutions? And if you do not, let our institutions be constantly open to such attacks, on the grounds that they are sinful and immoral.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama would not have troubled the Senate with any observations, had it not been for the dilemma in which he found himself (along with others of his friends) placed. The vote he just gave, was given for an object which had entirely failed. He had hoped, when voting for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, that they should have had almost an unanimous vote, and its moral influence; but having had a majority of one only, the object sought for had not been obtained. He himself preferred the original resolution; and he was glad that the reconsideration ordered on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, allowed him an opportunity of correcting the error into which he had fallen. While up, he must say that he saw no right in the Senate of the United States to compromise this question. The resolution of the Senator from South Carolina was couched, to be sure, in strong language, but not stronger than the occasion warranted. He, for his part, did not object to its phraseology: he thought it very suitable to the case it was intended to meet. He too wished to see gentlemen march up to the question presented by the Vermont resolutions, and give their votes, yea or nay, whether the institutions of any of these States were open to attack, on the ground that they were immoral and sinful. He had voted for the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, and hoped, in so doing, to have an unanimous vote; but failing in that hope, he was glad to see the question presented on the original resolution, which he at first preferred; and he indulged the hope that a strong vote would be given on it.

Mr. PRESTON repeated that he did not expect much from any or all of the resolutions; but he thought Mr. CLAY's more practical and strong, and regarded it as more proper that the minority should come over to the majority, than the majority go to the minority. He trusted they would so come over, though he did not see any great difference between the two propositions.

Mr. STRANGE, in reply, said he fully concurred with the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PRESTON,) that in all compromises the minority should yield to the majority; but there would probably be some difference between him and the Senator in the application of the rule to the present case. Which is the minority and which the majority on the present question? I (said Mr. S.) happen to have the cards in my own hand; and if all others adhere to their original vote, on whichever side I vote will be the majority. The question, then, returns upon us as an original one: which, upon the whole, was preferable—the original resolution, or the proposed substitute. For the reasons already stated, he was decidedly in favor of the original resolution. The effect of the adoption of this resolution upon the right of petition had been brought into question, as he thought, very unnecessarily; but, while he was up, he would make a remark or two upon that subject. He had, on a former occasion, expressed the opinion that the right to petition did not imply necessarily the obligation to receive, and he would not now repeat the reasons then stated for that opinion; but there was another view of this subject, bearing upon petitions from persons non-resident in the District of Columbia for the abolition of slavery within it, which he would take the liberty of presenting. The right to petition is correlative to the power of legislation upon the rights of the petitioner. Now, Congress is a Legislature in two senses. Over the whole Union it has the power of legislation upon all subjects on which that power is given by the Constitution, and within the District of Columbia a local legislative authority, similar to that exercised by the State Legislatures within their respective limits. Let it, then, be conceded, for the sake of the argument, that the right to petition includes the obligation to receive and consider; it is a non sequitur that Congress is bound to receive and consider a petition from a non-resident of the District of Columbia to abolish slavery within it. For example, let it be conceded that the Legislature of Virginia would be bound to receive and consider a petition from a citizen of Virginia for the abolition of slavery in the State of Virginia—does it follow that the Legislature of Virginia would be bound to receive and consider a petition from a citizen of Maryland upon the same subject? Surely not. With no more propriety, then, can a citizen of one of the States call upon Congress to receive and consider a petition upon a subject on which, if Congress acts at all, she must act by virtue of her power to exercise her functions as a local Legislature; for no one pretends that were it not for her power to exercise local legislation over this District, Congress could, in the widest stretch of her constitutional powers, abolish slavery within it. It follows, therefore, that the sacred right of petition, allowing it its widest scope, can never be involved in the proposal to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia until some inhabitant of the District becomes a petitioner. With these remarks, I shall conclude by expressing a hope that the vote adopting the amendment for the original resolution will be reversed.

The question on Mr. STRANGE's motion to reconsider the vote on adopting Mr. CLAY's substitute being taken, it was carried. So Mr. CLAY's resolution then came up as an original question.

Mr. HUBBARD deemed it irrelevant to act with reference to the Vermont resolutions, when they were not before the Senate. He made objections to the propositions both of Mr. CLAY and Mr. CALHOUN, and expressed his design, if Mr. CLAY's should fail, then to offer a substitute of his own for that of Mr. CALHOUN.

Mr. CALHOUN said he understood the Senator did not contest the principle of the resolutions.

Mr. HUBBARD. Not at all.

Mr. CALHOUN had supposed the phraseology acceptable, but he was ready to modify.

Mr. KING suggested that the Senator from New Hampshire could modify or alter either the resolution of Mr. CLAY or of Mr. CALHOUN: he hoped he would do so to one or the other, and then give it his vote.

Mr. HUBBARD said he objected to the latter part of Mr. CLAY's amendment, though the first met his approbation; and, if disconnected, he would have voted for it. But, according to the rules of the Senate, a proposition to strike out and insert could not be amended.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he did not intend to make any remarks upon the present occasion, further than to state, that the first part of the amendment which had been proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, as modified by the Senator from Connecticut, (Mr. NILES,) in regard to slavery in the District of Columbia, met his decided approbation. It placed the question upon its true principles—principles which he felt confident would be sustained by a great majority of the people of that State which he had, in part, the honor to represent. We will not abolish slavery in this District, because it was originally a slaveholding territory, and the surrounding States by which it was ceded are still slaveholding States; and because it would establish in the midst of them a place of refuge for their fugitive slaves; it would be destructive of the rights and security of their citizens, and would erect a citadel from whence to scatter the seeds of servile insurrection throughout their borders. Now he wished a distinct vote to be taken upon that portion of the amendment which related exclusively to the District of Columbia, and he supposed this could only be obtained by striking out all that portion of the amendment which related to Florida and the Indian country. In making this motion, he desired to be distinctly understood. He did not wish to prevent a direct vote on this second portion of the resolution. It could be offered afterwards as a substantive resolution. All he desired was to detach that portion of the amendment which related to this District from what followed; and thus obtain the strongest possible vote in its favor. Mr. B concluded by moving to strike out the second part of the resolution.

Mr. SEVIER called for the yeas and nays on the question. He was perfectly satisfied with the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, and regretted that the Senator from South Carolina had not consented to receive it. As for the second part of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, which was proposed to be stricken out, he was in favor of it, and should therefore vote against the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The question was then taken on Mr. BUCHANAN's motion, and it was carried—ayes 24, noes 13.

Mr. KING of Alabama to prevent any difficulty upon this subject, asked the Senator from Pennsylvania if he would agree, in case his motion should prevail, to offer the second part of the resolution as a distinct resolution. To which

Mr. BUCHANAN replied certainly. He could have no objection to place it in the same situation in which he had found it; without, however, thereby pledging himself to support all the principles which it contained.

Mr. WEBSTER said he could not concur in this resolution. I do not know (said he) any matter of fact, or any ground of argument, on which this affirmation of plighted faith can be sustained. I see nothing by which Congress has tied up its hands, either directly or indirectly, so as to put its clear constitutional power beyond the exercise of its own discretion. I have carefully examined the acts of cession by the States, the act of Congress, the proceedings and history of the times, and I find nothing to lead me to doubt that it was the intention of all parties to leave this, like other subjects belonging to the legislation for the ceded territory, entirely to the discretion and wisdom of Congress. The words of the Constitution are clear and plain. None could be clearer or plainer. Congress, by that instrument, has power to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the ceded territory, in all cases whatsoever. The acts of cession contain no limitation, condition, or qualification whatever, except that, out of abundant caution, there is inserted a proviso that nothing in the acts contained should be construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil so as to affect the rights of individuals therein, otherwise than as such individuals might themselves transfer their right of soil to the United States. The acts of cession declare that the tract of country "is for ever ceded and relinquished to Congress and to the Government of the United States, in full and absolute right and exclusive jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside therein, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution of the United States."

Now, that section to which reference is thus expressly made in these deeds of cession, declares that Congress shall have power "to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such District, not exceeding ten miles square, as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States."

Nothing, therefore, as it seems to me, can be clearer than that the States making the cession expected Congress to exercise over the District precisely that power, and neither more nor less, which the Constitution had conferred upon it. I do not know how the provision, or the intention, either of the Constitution in granting the power, or of the States in making the cession, could be expressed in a manner more absolutely free from all doubt or ambiguity.

I see, therefore, nothing in the act of cession, and nothing in the Constitution, and nothing in the history of this transaction, and nothing in any other transaction, implying any limitation upon the authority of Congress.

If the assertion contained in this resolution be true, a very strange result, as it seems to me, must follow. The resolution affirms that the faith of Congress is pledged indefinitely. It makes no limitation of time or circumstance. If this be so, then it is an obligation that binds for ever, as much as if it were one of the prohibitions of the Constitution itself. And at all times hereafter, even when in the course of their history, availing themselves of events, or changing their views of policy, the States themselves should make provisions for the emancipation of their slaves, in this District, nevertheless, the existing state of things could not be changed. It does really seem to me, that if this resolution, in its terms, be true, though slavery in every other part of the world should be abolished, yet in the metropolis of this great Republic it is established in perpetuity. This appears to me the result of the doctrine of plighted faith, as stated in the resolution.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that in his opinion, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) had not placed the question upon its true grounds. He had entirely mistaken the meaning of the resolution, if he (Mr. B.) understood it correctly. He would ask, did any human being suppose that the States of Virginia and Maryland would have ever thought of ceding this District to the United States, if they had imagined that Congress would convert those ten miles square, in the very heart of their territory, into an asylum for their fugitive slaves, and a spot from whence the peace and safety of both were to be constantly endangered? They never would have made the cession, had any such idea existed. It is true that no express faith was pledged in the cession, because no such apprehension was then entertained. If there had been, does any man doubt but that they would have insisted upon an express stipulation against such an alarming danger? If (said Mr. B.) I freely grant to you a valuable possession, could you, as an honorable and honest man, think you had a right to wrest this grant from its original purpose, and convert it into an instrument of my destruction? If you know that the gift never would have been made by me, had I supposed you were capable of using it in such a manner, you are under the strongest moral obligation not to pervert it to such a purpose. It is true you may have the constitutional power to abolish slavery in this District; but would it not be a violation of implied faith, under all the circumstances, to exercise this power? I think it would, I feel that it would, and therefore shall vote that it would.

Again, said Mr. B. no inference can be drawn from the language of the resolution, that its friends intend that slavery shall exist in the District, after it has been abolished in the surrounding States. In thus supposing, the Senator has misapprehended the terms of the resolution. Abolish slavery in Virginia and Maryland, (said Mr. B.) and it will no longer, it can no longer, exist in this District. The people of these States had been making rapid strides towards the accomplishment of this object, until they were arrested in their career by the abolition excitement, and the proceedings of the abolition societies. This resolution presented the very point of the question on which he was willing to stand or to fall. It contemplated the existence of slavery here, so long as it should continue to exist in the surrounding States; but not a day longer. It contained the very principle for which he had always contended, that slavery here and slavery there must share the same fate. He thus understood the resolution, and with this understanding he had given it his support.

Mr. WEBSTER. The words of the resolution will speak for themselves. They require no comment. They express an unlimited plighted faith. The honorable member will so see, if he will look at those words. The gentleman asks whether those who made the cession could have expected that Congress would ever have exercised such a power? To this, I answer that I see no reason to doubt that the parties to the cession were as willing to leave this as to leave other powers to the discretion of Congress. I see not the slightest evidence of any especial fear, or any especial care, or concern, on the part of the ceding States, in regard to this particular part of the jurisdiction ceded to Congress. And, I think, I can ask on the other side, a very important question for the consideration of the gentleman himself, and for that of the Senate and the country; and that is, would Congress have accepted the cession with any such restraint upon its constitutional power, either express or understood to be implied? I think not. Looking back to the state of things then existing, and especially to what Congress had done so recently before, when it accepted the cession of the Northwestern Territory, I entertain no doubt whatever that Congress would have refused the cession if offered with any condition or understanding that its constitutional authority to exercise exclusive legislation over the District in all cases whatsoever should be abridged.

The Senate will observe that I am speaking solely to the point of plighted faith. Upon other parts of the resolution, and upon many other things connected with it, I have said nothing. I only resist the imposition, at this time, of new obligations, or a new prohibition, not to be found, as I think, either in the Constitution or any act of Government. I have said nothing on the expediency of abolition, immediate or gradual, or the reasons which ought to weigh with Congress should that question be proposed. I can well conceive, I think, what would be a natural and fair mode of reasoning on such an occasion.

When it is said, for instance, by way of argument, that Congress, although it have the power, ought not to take a lead in the business of Abolition, considering that the interest which the United States have in the whole subject is vastly less than that which the States have in it, I can understand the propriety and force of the observation. It is, as far as it goes, a pertinent and appropriate argument, and I shall always be ready to give it the full weight belonging to it. When it is argued that, in a case so vital to the States, the States themselves should be allowed to maintain their own policy, and that the Government of the United States ought not to do any thing which shall, directly or indirectly, shake or disturb that policy, this is a line of policy which I can understand; for I have always not only admitted, but insisted, that slavery, within the States, is a subject belonging absolutely and exclusively to the States themselves.

But the present is not an attempt to exhibit any such course of reasoning as this. The attempt is to set up a pledge of the public faith to do the same office, as a constitutional prohibition, in terms, would do; that is, to set up a direct bar, precluding all exercise of the discretion of Congress over the subject. It has been often said, in this debate, and I believe it is true, that a decided majority of the Senate do believe that Congress has a clear constitutional power over slavery in this District. But while this constitutional right is admitted, it is at the same moment attempted to be effectually counteracted, overthrown, and done away with by the affirmation of plighted faith, as asserted in the resolution before us.

Now, I have already said I know nothing to support this affirmation Neither in the acts of cession, nor in the act of Congress accepting the District, nor in any other document, history, publication, or transaction, do I know a single fact or suggestion, supporting this proposition, or tending to support it. Nor has any gentleman, so far as I know, pointed out, or attempted to point out, any such fact, document, transaction, or other evidence. All is left to the general and repeated statement, that such a condition must have been intended by the States. Of all this I see no proof whatever. I see no evidence of any desire on the part of the States thus to limit the power of Congress, or thus to require a pledge against its exercise. And, indeed, if this were made out, the intention of Congress, as well as that of the States, must be inquired into. Nothing short of a clear and manifest intention of both parties, proved by proper evidence, can amount to plighted faith. The expectation, or intent, of one party, if excited, founded on something not provided for nor hinted at in the transaction itself, cannot plight the faith of the other party.

In short, I am altogether unable to see any ground for supposing that either party to the cession had any mental reservation, any unexpressed expectation, or relied on any implied, but unmentioned and unsuggested pledge, whatever. By the Constitution, if a district should be ceded to it for the seat of Government, Congress was to have a right, in express terms, to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever. The cession was made and accepted, in pursuance of this power. Both parties knew well what they were doing. Both parties knew that by the cession the States surrendered all jurisdiction, and Congress acquired all jurisdiction; and this is the whole transaction.

As to any provision in the acts of cession stipulating for the security of property, there is none, except only what I have already observed—this condition, that no right of individuals in the soil should be construed to be transferred, but only the jurisdiction. But no doubt all rights of property ought to be duly respected by Congress, and all other legislatures.

And since the subject of compensation to the owners of emancipated slaves has been referred to, I take occasion to say, that Congress, if it should think that a wise, just, and politic legislation for this District required them to make compensation for slaves emancipated here, they have the same constitutional authority to make such compensation as to make grants for roads and bridges, almshouses, penitentiaries, and other similar objects in the District. A general and absolute power of legislation carries with it all the necessary and just incidents belonging to such legislation.

Mr. CLAY said he entirely concurred with Mr. BUCHANAN, and he must express his astonishment that Mr. WEBSTER did not view the matter in the same light. He believed with Mr. B. that if those States could have imagined that while slavery existed with them it would be ended here, they never would have made the cession. Mr. C. would put it in another shape. Suppose Pennsylvania had ceded a portion of her soil as a site for the Government, then he would ask, if, when Pennsylvania was a non-slaveholding State, it would not be deemed a breach of faith to introduce slavery into the midst of her soil? So in this District it would be a breach of faith to abolish, while the ceding States retained that institution. Besides, when the cession was made, there was an express reservation of the right of property, and therefore this kind of property, being included, was, as a matter of public faith, to be preserved. When the state of things alluded to under which the cession was made shall cease, then the force of the faith implied will also cease.

The argument that this power might be abused, is not available to limit and nullify the power.

Mr. WEBSTER. The honorable member from Kentucky asks the Senate to suppose the opposite case: to suppose that the seat of Government had been fixed in a free State, Pennsylvania for example; and that Congress had attempted to establish slavery in a district over which, as here, it had thus exclusive legislation. He asks whether, in that case, Congress could establish slavery in such a place? This mode of changing the question does not, I think, vary this argument; and I answer at once, that however improbable or improper such an act might be, yet if the power were universal, absolute, and without restriction, it might unquestionably be so exercised. No limitation being expressed or intimated in the grant itself, or any other proceeding of the parties, none could be implied.

And in the other cases, of forts, arsenals, &c. if Congress has exclusive and absolute legislative power, it must, of course, have the power, if it could be supposed to be guilty of such a folly, whether proposed to be exercised in a district within a free State, to establish slavery, or in a district in a slave State to abolish or regulate it; yet, if it be a district over which Congress has, as it has in this District, unlimited power of legislation, it seems to me that whatever would stay the exercise of this power, in either case, must be drawn from discretion, from reasons of justice and true policy, from those high conisderations which ought to influence Congress in questions of such extreme delicacy and importance; and to all these considerations I am willing, and always shall be willing, I trust, to give full weight. But I cannot, in conscience, say that the power, so clearly conferred on Congress by the Constitution, as a power to be exercised, like others, in its own discretion, is immediately taken away again by an implied faith that it shall not be exercised at all.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he should succeed in one object he had in view when he introduced these resolutions—to ascertain the sense of the Senate on the subject of abolition, and how far it was disposed to take ground against it. They embraced two leading propositions that he had hoped to carry out—that neither a State, nor its citizens, had a right to interfere with the peculiar institutions of the other States; and that this Government, as a common agent of the States, has no right, in any of its acts, either in this District or elsewhere, to discriminate between the domestic institutions of the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States, by favoring one, and opposing the other, on any ground whatever. Whatever may be the private feelings of those vested with public authority, they are bound, in their official character, to regard all as equally under the protection of the Constitution, and equally unexceptionable. To act on the opposite principle, of suppressing one, and advancing the other, must necessarily end in the most deadly and fatal conflict between the parts of this Union.

These were the elevated and strong grounds assumed in the resolutions, and he regretted that they should have been departed from in this resolution as amended. Thus regarded, he should vote for it with much reluctance. The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. NILES) had removed many of the objections he had to that offered by the Senator from Kentucky, to which it would have been impossible for him to give his assent; and, even as it stood, he should vote for it only on the ground of preserving harmony and union among those whom he believed to be opposed to the Abolitionists, as far as he could without an entire sacrifice of principles.

Mr. CUTHBERT said it seemed that the Senator from Massachusetts found it difficult to understand the question. The question, to be correctly understood, depended much on the sound sense or moral sense of the individual. Now it might be well imagined that an individual might be without that moral sense, and therefore the question was unintelligible to him.

The question was then again taken on the first branch of Mr. CLAY's substitute, and carried as follows: ayes 36, noes 9.

Mr. SEVIER now called upon Mr. BUCHANAN to move the remainder of the resolution relating to the guaranty of slavery in the Territories and among the Indian nations.

Mr. BUCHANAN pledged himself to do so on the morrow; and then,

On motion of Mr. PRESTON,

The Senate adjourned.

REMARKS OF MR. SMITH,
OF INDIANA,
IN SENATE, THURSDAY, JAN. 25, 1838.

When the bill granting the right of pre-emption to actual settlers on public lands was under consideration in the Senate on Thursday, the 25th instant--

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, moved to amend the bill so as to exclude from its operation all lands where the Indian treaty by which they were ceded had not been ratified six months prior to the first day of December last. In moving this amendment, Mr. S. said, the peculiar position which he found himself occupying seemed to require that he should fully explain the object of the amendment, and the facts connected with its operation, should it be adopted. The Senate had already noticed that himself and colleague differed widely in their views of the propriety of this amendment, and he was compelled candidly to admit that it would have afforded him great pleasure had it so happened that himself and colleague could have concurred in their views, and acted in concert on this question. He had the consolation, however, to believe that the difference between them was one of principle, and that each was entitled to the same credit for honesty of purpose; each supposed he was faithfully discharging his duty. He was aware that his colleague had been long a member of this body, and that he had been for years intimately acquainted with the object and policy of the pre-emption laws; and he (Mr. S.) willingly admitted, that could his mind have been influenced to believe that the amendment was not called for by sound policy, the opinion of his colleague would have had great weight with him.

Mr. S. said he wished to place this question in its true light before the Senate and the country, that he might be judged of by the merits of the proposition, and the reasons he offered in support of it. That the Senate might understand the question, he would state the facts upon which it rested. The amendment, if adopted, will exclude from the operation of the law, amongst other lands, the lands ceded to the Government by the Miami treaty, which was ratified by the Senate at its extra session in September last, subject to the approval of the President, and the sanction of some Indians who had not signed the amendment to the treaty. The sanction of these Indians and the approval of the President had been obtained in October, as he understood, though he had not seen the treaty. These lands comprise about 215,000 acres, lying in the very heart of the State of Indiana, on the Wabash river, and on the line of the Wabash and Erie canal. They were Indian reserves, surrounded by a dense population, and a highly improved country, and it may fearlessly be asserted that the State does not contain a better body of land. These lands he wished to exclude from the operation of the bill. He was well apprized that it was an invidious task to oppose pre-emption rights when there was even a shadow of claim. He presumed that some at least of those whom his amendment would exclude were his personal and political friends, and that they might take it as very unkind in him to move this matter to their prejudice. He had little doubt but that his colleague was correct in characterizing some of them as poor men, and he had towards them no other feelings than those of personal kindness. He could well appreciate the feelings and motives that actuated his colleague to contend for them, and insist that they should be included in the operations of the bill; for himself, however, he had but one course to pursue: his duty to his State and the Government was paramount. He could not be controlled in the discharge of that duty by considerations of poverty or riches; whether the applicants for the services he owed all, were rich or poor, could make no difference. He could recognise no such distinctions in the discharge of his public duties; he would mete out even-handed justice to all; he would show partiality to none; he went for the whole.

Me (Mr. S.) would ask the indulgence of the Senate while he attempted to state the merits of the claim of the persons on these lands to a pre-emption, and the reasons that had brought his mind to the conclusion that these lands ought not to be included in the pre-emption bill at this time. It will be seen by the public documents that, some years ago, a grant of lands was made to the State of Indiana by the Government of alternate sections five miles wide on each side of a canal from Lake Erie, to unite the waters of the lake with the waters of the Mississippi, on the Wabash, by uninterrupted navigation. He only spoke from memory of the terms of the grant. This canal was originally located as far down the Wabash as Lafayette, and there stopped for the time being; the lands were located to that point, agreeably to the act of Congress, but it was subsequently ascertained by the authorities of the State in charge of that matter, that, in order to secure the uninterrupted and unobstructed navigation of the Wabash, it was absolutely necessary to extend the line of the work down the Wabash to Terre Haute; this has been done, and the State now claims the lands under the original act; the claim has been presented to the proper Department by the board of internal improvement of the State, accompanied with a most conclusive and able argument in favor of the claim. The State has no doubt whatever on the question; she believes herself justly and legally entitled to the land, and she cannot doubt but that such must be the decision of the Department. A similar question has been decided by the late Commissioner of the General Land Office, in favor of Ohio. The decision of this important matter to the State is expectedly daily. Should the State not be mistaken in this matter, as the lands on the line of the extension of this work have been sold by the Government, the State will be entitled to select other lands in lieu of them, and he (Mr. S.) wished to keep the lands covered by the amendment excluded from the operations of the bill, that they may be subjected to the claim of the State, of the whole State; that they may be applied to that work, and to the relief of the people from the additional burden of its construction. But if in all this the State should fail, it would be recollected by the Senate that he (Mr. S.) had a few days since introduced a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, instructing that committee to inquire into the expediency of granting a pre-emption to these lands to the State of Indiana to aid her in her works of internal improvement. His colleague had also introduced and referred to the same committee petitions from these settlers, praying for pre-emptions. These questions were now pending before the committee undecided, and he was unwilling to prejudice the decision of these questions by any action on this bill. He hoped, when the question came to be fully considered, should the State not be entitled to these lands under the canal law, (the law granting lands to the canal, to which he had adverted,) that the benefit of these lands will be suffered, on moderate terms, under a pre-emption, to go to the State to aid her in her works of internal improvement. The General Government, it is very true, will not realize more than the minimum price of $1 25 per acre for these lands should she sell them in the ordinary way, while the State might realize double or treble that sum, upon terms to aid her in the payment of her canal debt. Thus, while the General Government would lose nothing, the State of Indiana would receive from $500,000 to $1,000,000, a clear benefit from the pre-emption, to assist her in paying her internal improvement debt, the benefit of which would inure alike to all the citizens of the State, those who claim these pre-emptions as well as others.

He (Mr. S.) would next inquire whether, under the circumstances of this case, the persons who are upon these lands have any special claim to the favor of the Government, or rather whether they have even the claims of ordinary pre-emptors. He had already said that these lands lie in the heart of the State, on the line of one of her principal public works; that they are of the most valuable lands in the States; that they are not frontier lands, but are surrounded by a dense population and a highly improved country; that they were Indian reservations of lands, reserved in the original sales by the Miamies; that the treaty was ratified by the Senate in September last, and was only approved in October. It remained for him to state, further, that, after the treaty was approved, he had received a letter from a gentleman at Peru, nearly adjoining some of these lands, inquiring whether it was proble that pre-emptions would be granted to settlers on them; that he had answered the letter, informing the writer that he (Mr. S.) was clearly of opinion that the people ought not to locate on these lands with the expectation of obtaining pre-emptions. He felt fully justified, at the time, in giving his opinion as he did. But, if he had misled any by that opinion, so as to induce them to forego advantages of location, which the Government shall sanction by this bill, he regretted it, as all ought to have had an equal chance to avail themselves of the benefits of the location. He thought then, and he still thinks, his opinion was founded in correct policy. He had, however, understood that almost the whole of the best of these lands had been located as soon as the settlers could remove from their homes in their vicinity, and select the choice tracts. This bill will secure them in these locations by pre emptions. Does the claim come sustained by the reasons that may be urged in favor of our pre-emption system? The arguments in favor of that system were—that the pre-emptors were pioneers; that they improved the public lands in advance of the settlements; that they guarded the frontiers, and risked their lives to defend the settlements against savage aggressions; that they caused the surrounding public lands to become valuable. None of these reasons operate in favor of the settlers whom he wished to exclude from the operation of the bill. They are not pioneers; they are not frontier settlers, risking their lives in the defence of the settlements; they are not adding to the value of the surrounding public lands, for there are but few lands there unsold. They did not take possession of those lands innocently and ignorantly, believing in the implied faith of the Government that they should have a pre-emption to them; but, on the contrary, they were advised, as he fully believed, that a pre-emption need not be expected. They must have known that the State claimed additional lands to construct the extension of the Wabash and Erie Canal, and that these lands would be a most desirable selection. Under all these circumstances, he had in vain looked for even a plausible pretext for this claim on the part of these settlers. His colleague thought otherwise: the generosity of his nature, and the warm feelings of his heart for his neighbors, seem to have satisfied his judgment that they ought to be included; that the rights and interests of the State and the Government ought to be held subordinate to the claims of these settlers. He (Mr. S.) could not bring his mind to that conclusion. He was opposed to concluding the interests of the State until she could be heard in this matter. The claims of the settlers in the mean time will be only postponed, to be decided whenever the whole matter can be fairly examined; and should the State not be able to substantiate her claim, and should Congress not feel disposed to grant her the pre-emption right to these lands, the claim of the cultivators will not be at all weakened by the length of time they have occupied, or the extent of their improvements, and a subsequent pre-emption law will give them all the benefits they anticipate from this bill. He (Mr. S.) had made up his mind to vote for the bill, notwithstanding at this day he doubted the policy of these pre-emption laws to selected spots of the public lands; he had felt himself, however, bound by what he believed to be the understanding of these frontier settlers in the implied faith of the Government, growing out of previous laws on the subject; and he should vote for this bill under that view of the subject, if the amendment was adopted; otherwise, however reluctantly he might feel compelled to vote against the bill, his duty to his State and her interests would induce him to do so.

REMARKS OF MR. GLASCOCK, OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, January 24, 1838—On the bill making a partial appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1838.

Mr. GLASCOCK rose and said—

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The great latitude which this debate has taken, the wide range of discussion in which gentlemen have indulged, prompt me not only in justice to myself, but to that section of country which I in part represent, to address the committee, and ask to be heard in reply. No one can regret more than myself that so many questions wholly unconnected with the one at issue, should have been presented to us; but as they are so presented, for one, I am not disposed to evade them, and shall proceed to meet and to discuss them with that calmness and deliberation which their importance requires.

This debate opened, as usual, with strong objections to the appropriations sought to be obtained by the bill, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WISE,) who, in unqualified and unmeasured terms, has made charges most serious in their character against the Government, as to its policy towards the Indians generally. The object of these charges, is to fix upon the Government the odium of all the disasters and fatal consequences growing out of the Florida war, even to the extent of charging upon it cruelty, inhumanity, perfidy, and oppression, with a violation of our treaties themselves.

Sir, need I tell the gentleman that these are charges which can never be established; but, on the contrary, a reference to the treaties, and to the course and policy pursued by the Government under them, furnish abundant evidence wholly to disprove such charges. If the gentleman had examined the treaties with the Florida Indians, and given the subject that attention which he generally gives to others, I am satisfied he would himself have come to the conclusion that many of his remarks were uncalled for, and unwarranted by the facts connected with, and growing out of, these treaties.

It is far from my wish, on the present occasion, to dwell at large upon these treaties; but, sir, a brief reference to them is made important, and rendered necessary, in justice to the Government and to the gentlemen who made them, if not to the whole country, from the general allegation that they were obtained through fraud and injustice.

The first treaty to which I beg leave to call the attention of the committee, is the treaty made at Camp Moultrie in the year 1823. By this treaty it will be seen that these Indians had the right to purchase and obtain 5,000,000 acres of land in the peninsula of Florida, and under it their boundaries were fixed and established. Let it also be borne in mind that this treaty was entered into with them even after they had been defeated, conquered and subdued by General Jackson, in his Seminole campaign of 1818—a campaign remarkable for the events which occurred, and which forms an important era in the history of this Government.

Some years after this, these Indians, from their indolence and other causes, were reduced to almost starvation. Appropriations were promptly made for their support and maintenance. Yes, sir, and from what I have heard and seen, I truly fear, with more willingness and unanimity than appropriations will be made to reimburse our own citizens for losses sustained by the conflagration of their dwellings, and the destruction of their property by these very Indians, for whom so much sympathy has been enlisted, and who are said to be so cruelly oppressed and persecuted by our people. Under this treaty, and after these appropriations, they remained for a while tranquil and composed; but as the white population of the Territory rapidly increased, many of their chiefs and warriors became discontented, and of their own free will evinced and made known their disposition to treat for a country west of the Mississippi, which ultimately led to the treaty at Payne's Landing in May, 1832. Under one of the provisions of that treaty, a condition precedent is inserted, by which some of their confidential chiefs, accompanied by their own agent, Major Fagan, and their interpreter, Abraham, were to be permitted to visit the country allotted them, at the expense of the United States; and if they should be pleased with it, and could make satisfactory arrangements with the Creeks, the treaty was then to be ratified and carried into effect. Here the committee will at once see, and it must carry conviction home to the minds of all, that it was not consummated and completed for the action of the Senate until this condition precedent should have been performed. So soon, however, as these confidential chiefs visited the country, which they did early in 1833, and reported most favorably, the treaty of Fort Gibson was entered into on the 28th March, 1833, fully confirmatory of the treaty at Payne's Landing, and which was solemnly ratified by the Senate on the 12th day of April, 1834; and, if I am informed correctly, with little or no opposition.

The cause of the delay, therefore, between the date of the treaties and their ratification, can but prove satisfactory, and thus takes from the gentlemen the ground assumed by them, that the delay in the ratification vitiated and rendered them void. Independent, however, of these treaties, thus ratified and becoming the paramount law of the land, as late as April, 1835, by an agreement entered into by the commanding general (Clinch) with sixteen of their chiefs and sub-chiefs, the treaties were fully recognised and acknowledged in all their provisions and stipulations, and the time for the removal of the Indians extended.

This, sir, is but a short though faithful sketch of the principal provisions of the treaties, and is presented to the committee with the view of enabling them to form a proper estimate how far they have been obtained through fraud and treachery, and how far they have been, as is alleged, shamefully violated by any act of the Government. Sir, if the members of this committee would but take the trouble to examine for themselves the several treaties with these Indians, and the whole history of the proceedings connected with them, I hazard nothing in saying, that I believe the most violent partisan would come to the irresistible conclusion, that no tribe or nation of Indians has ever been treated with more liberality, lenity, or humanity, than these located within the Territory of Florida, notwithstanding they have caused so much effusion of blood, and the exhaustion of so much of our treasure. Still, with all these facts before us; with a perfect knowledge that the Indians themselves commenced the war upon us, by the attack and massacre of the gallant Dade and his whole command; with the simultaneous attack, and the base and cowardly murder of General Thompson, a brave, high-minded, and honorable citizen of my own State, and for years a highly respected member of this body, esteemed and beloved by all who knew him; still I repeat, with all these facts before us, and with the knowledge that the commencement of hostilities by the Indians violated their treaties with us under the laws of nations, and lost them all claims to our protection, we find them ably represented and defended on this floor: we hear extolled as a hero, the assassin Oceola, by whose ruthless and treacherous hand fell the lamented Thompson, a victim to the fatal instrument of death, which, from his confidence in him, he had previously presented to him. This, too, after the murderer had signed the treaty, and brought in many of his people for removal. Yes, sir, this Oceola is here held up to public admiration, as a warrior worthy of imitation and applause; whilst many of our own gallant officers are handed over to public indignation and scorn, as violating the sacred flag of truce, and proving perfidious and treacherous in having made Oceola prisoner and sent him to Fort Moultrie.

But, sir, I tell the gentlemen this will not answer their purpose. I tell them that when his treacherous murders and massacres are made known to the American people, the stain which they attach to his character can never be removed either by his eulogists here or his biographers hereafter. Let it not be understood that I doubt the bravery of that treacherous chief. It is probable that he is desperately brave, and so are many murderers and assassins, many of whom have made a sacrifice of their lives by acts of daring and desperation in resisting the civil authorities, rather than yield and submit to the penalties which the violated laws of the land affix to their crimes. So, sir, with your Oceola; for who that hears me can doubt that both by the laws of God and man, his life was justly forfeited, and that he himself expected its forfeiture if ever captured by our army I have never doubted. To the clemency of General Jesup is he chiefly indebted that such a fate was not awarded him—a fate which would inevitably have befallen him, had he been turned over to the proper authorities of Florida. I can but here remark, what I honestly believe, that the great clemency and humanity which have been extended to these Indians by our Government and our officers, on several occasions, proved injurious to a portion of our own citizens.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) has boldly declared that he would prefer their hammocks being restored to them, rather than make the appropriation now asked. Such a sentiment, thus uttered, I freely admit, greatly amazed me, as well as the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. EVERETT) to buy our peace.

To give up the contest at this time, to withdraw our troops, and restore to the enemy their possessions, without the accomplishment of a single object on our part, after the loss of so many valuable lives, and the expenditure of millions of dollars, would be an acknowledgment of our inability to subdue them—would encourage further depredations and massacres on the frontiers—would inevitably bring disgrace upon our arms—greatly affect our national character, and seriously impair our national honor.

I entirely mistake the characters and feelings of the people, if such a proceeding would not call forth their just censure and condemnation; but I look for no such result. I look with confidence to a vigorous prosecution of the war, and if the necessary support be given to the Government, to its speedy and successful termination.

The talented delegate from Florida, (Mr. DOWNING,) in his able defence of his constituents from charges supposed to be made against them, as well as in his fearless and liberal vindication of the Administration from the assaults of the Opposition, found it necessary to allude and refer to certain letters which he had received, accusing the Cherokee delegation, which had been employed to visit the Seminoles, and endeavor to reconcile them and bring them to terms, with having proved treacherous, and actually persuaded them if they would hold out this winter, Congress would refuse to make further appropriations, by which means the war would close, and they be permitted to remain. How far the charges will be established, I am unprepared to say. They are not new to me: I have heard them before; and it is now understood that General Jesup himself believes them true. For myself, I wish it may be otherwise. I should be gratified to see these men honorably exculpated; for I rejoice in the misfortunes or disgrace of no one. But I must observe, and leave others to make the application, that there is a remarkable coincidence in the alleged conduct of the Cherokees, and the course of some gentlemen on this floor, and at this time. The delegate from Florida has been warned and admonished by the gentleman from Virginia not to make such charges against these Indians on such proof, and feelingly told what cruel injustice would be done, if they proved unfounded, as he presumed them to be. Shall I not be pardoned by the gentleman, then, and justified by this committee, in prompting and admonishing him to be guarded in his attacks upon the departments of the Government, and many valuable officers of our army, without the necessary proof to justify his allegations. Let him and others profit by this; and I feel assured many unpleasant altercations would be avoided, personal difficulties rarely occur, and the character and dignity of this body be greatly restored.

I shall now proceed, sir, to reply to some of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BIDDLE,) who, as is customary with him, has been lavish in his abuse of the Administration, and to enable him the better to effect his purpose, has been driven to the necessity of resorting to subjects foreign to the true issue, and wholly unconnected with the one before us. He has thought proper, and I have no doubt to the astonishment of many, to allude to the celebrated letter from Gen. Jesup to the Editor of the Globe, marked private, shown to Gen. Jackson, as requested, and ordered to be published. This, sir, has furnished him a fruitful theme, of which he has availed himself, to pour forth his bitter feelings against the Administration, and in unqualified terms to denounce Gen. Jesup, and become the eulogist of Gen. Scott.

Sir, I should despise myself, were I to attempt to detract from the well earned fame and reputation of that gallant officer, and would greatly prefer to add, rather than pluck one laurel from his brow. I was pleased and delighted at the eloquent allusions to his valorous deeds on the plains of Chippewa, and at the battle of Niagara; but I was mortified that he should have passed over in silence the distinguished services of General Jesup on the same battle fields, and which, in justice to that gallant officer, I cannot permit to pass unnoticed.

May I not be pardoned, then, for again referring to the battle of Chippewa, in order to present him at the head of his regiment, and in the language of his historian, "when pressed in front and flank, giving orders to his men to support arms, and advance under the most galling fire, by which means he gained a more secure position, and returning the fire, put the enemy to flight." This cool and deliberate movement would have done honor to the oldest veterans, and for coolness and intrepidity, if equalled, was never surpassed in battle.

But behold him again, sir, at the battle of Niagara; see him, as there described, again at the head of his regiment, turning the flank of the enemy, after encountering the greatest difficulties, and at the same moment taking advantage of the darkness of the night, throwing himself in the rear of their reserve, and surprising one detachment after another, made prisoners of so many of their officers and men as greatly impeded his progress. I can but here remark, in the beautiful language of the historian, that though the laws of war would have justified him in putting them to death, "the laurel, in his opinion, was most glorious when entwined by the hand of mercy."

But I stop not here. After disposing of his prisoners, we find him in the darkness of the night feeling his way to the place where the hottest of the fire was kept up on the brigade to which he belonged, and, with the same coolness and intrepidity which previously marked his conduct, drawing up his regiment on the line of a fence on the Queenstown road, in the rear of a party of British infantry, when suddenly and unexpectedly he poured in upon them a galling fire, which compelled them to break and fly; and, in the language of his commanding officer, Gen. Brown, "showed himself to his own army in a blaze of fire."

I here pause, believing that his fame and reputation is safe in the custody of history and his country, and will never suffer in comparison with, with any of the officers who distinguished themselves in these memorable battles. Who, sir, can listen to a recital of such noble deeds, and not feel justly excited at the charges which have been uttered against him? He stands accused here not only with perfidy, but with writing the letter to the Globe, with a view to his own interest, by displacing Gen. Scott from his command, that he himself might receive it; and further, the gentleman says of him, that he was the instrument by which a blow was aimed, from behind, at Gen Scott, that struck from his arm his sword!

I have ever regretted the publication of that letter, and the difficulties produced between Generals Scott and Jesup, and greatly fear it will terminate in no good to themselves or their country But, as to the letter itself, I am inclined to think it contained nothing that would not have been made known to General Scott himself, if he had consulted General Jesup as to his plan of operations.

But how vulnerable is the gentleman from Pennsylvania—how open to retort, in speaking of the blow aimed at General Scott from behind! Has he not himself this day aimed a blow from behind at the character, honor, and reputation of General Jesup? Is not the blow aimed too at a time when he is periling his life in the service of his country, and, under the greatest disadvantages, struggling to restore peace and tranquillity to the people of a suffering Territory; and this, too, at a time when he cannot be heard in his defence, and in vindication of all that he holds most dear? Whenever that opportunity shall be afforded him, I have no fears of the result. I anticipate a full explanation and a triumphant vindication of his whole conduct.

I will here remark that my acquaintance with General Jesup is but slight, having been in company with him but once; and I have done for him no more than I would do for others of the army who might be assailed as he has been, without proof, without being present, and without an opportunity of being heard in their own behalf. If on the present occasion, however, my humble efforts in his defence shall avert the blow which has been aimed at him from behind, I feel a consciousness that I shall never have cause to regret it.

A few passing remarks may be deemed necessary at this time, in reply to the charges of fraud against some of the agents of the Government, in the numerous contracts entered into by them. Letters have been introduced and read here for effect, which have been eagerly seized upon by some for the purpose of censuring the Government, and holding it responsible for all the alleged acts of its agents. There are cases, I admit, civil in their character, in which principals are of course held liable for the acts of their agents; but no principle is better settled, none more universally recognised, than that principals are not responsible for the criminal acts of their agents.

But why, it has been justly asked, have not the names of these agents, together with the ex parte proof furnished the gentlemen, been handed over to the proper Departments, that an investigation, with the necessary inquiries, might be made into the whole matter? This, it must be admitted, is the true course to be adopted; and if it be done, and the charges are established, I hesitate not to say they will be immediately and promptly discharged. I have no knowledge who these agents are, nor is it important I should have; but it seems to me to be due both to the Government and themselves, that their names should be made known, their conduct inquired into, and they heard in their defence. The agents have a right to demand this. It is a right secured, and which, I trust, will never be denied, to the most humble citizen. If their names are ever made public, and they are honorable men, I feel assured such a demand will be made. But even if their guilt should be established, on an investigation, no censure can, with propriety, attach to the Administration for their unauthorized acts; for if it did, in such a case, and under such circumstances, no Administration could ever be sustained.

I pass from this subject, which I view as of but little importance compared to the one I now approach—one, sir, that pained me to hear introduced, and I could but express to my friends around me the great mortification I felt when it was done. I mean the question of Abolition. At no former period have my feelings been more excited than at the attack upon us by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BIDDLE,) who has gravely asserted that if the question was ever brought to a head, the fault rested on our own shoulders, and we were responsible for all the consequences growing out of it. Such a charge I repel, in the same spirit and with the same feeling with which it was made. I pronounce it illiberal and unjust; and tell the gentleman if that question be ever brought to a head, it will be traced to some of his own friends on this floor, who are presenting, whenever an opportunity offers, the most aggravating petitions, and writing circulars throughout the North, calling upon the people to hold meetings, with a view of keeping up the excitement, and for party purposes. I emphatically tell him, too, that all these meetings, all these incendiary proceedings, have their origin with a large portion of that party to which he himself is attached, and on the success of which I now proclaim to this assembly, and to those who hear me, measurably depend all the hopes of the Abolitionists. The veil, sir, is torn from them; it can be no longer disguised from the country that they have gone over, in a body, to the Federalists and Northern United States Bank men, and in the formation of such a trio, they look for a triumph, and the ultimate consummation of their iniquitous and unholy purposes.

The record of the votes in this body, on every question touching this subject of agitation and disunion, I am proud to say, show where the danger to the Union and the integrity of the Constitution lies, and to what source, and to what party, we are to look for an independent and patriotic purpose in supporting those guarantees of the Constitution on which the permanence and the peace of the Union depend.

These remarks, it is true, are strong, and they are uttered with feelings the most ardent. But, sir, I find a full justification for them in what has been said by the gentlemen in this debate, as well as from like suggestions and imputations on the South, which are contained in the leading publications of the Abolitionists that have been so frequently and so insultingly sent to me.

But, thank God! the people are awaking from their slumbers, and becoming aroused to their interest and their dangers. Already do we behold the Republicans in every quarter of the Union once more uniting, and unfurling their banners with the great principles of '98 and '99 inscribed upon them, with a fixed determination to maintain and defend them, and thereby preserve the Constitution in its original purity, and perpetuate the Union of this great Confederacy. The greatest pride and pleasure of my political life will be to be found in such ranks and under such banners, struggling and contending to secure the permanency of such principles.

I shall proceed now, Mr. Chairman, briefly to consider the question before us, which is the appropriation of one million of dollars to defray the expenses incurred to prosecute the war in Florida; and it will be seen, sir, by an examination of the documents, which have been laid on our tables, that it is asked by the Government to defray, principally expenses which have already occured, and pay off drafts now under protest.

It seems to me, that a moment's reflection should induce gentlemen to withdraw the objections which have been urged. Do they consider, or have they reflected, on the consequences which must ensue, if this appropriation is withheld? Are they unapprized that a large portion of it is absolutely necessary to pay off many of the officers and soldiers, who with so much patriotism volunteered their services for the protection of the Territory, and who have undergone so many toils and hardships; and that the little pittance to which they are entitled, is all essential to enable them to return to their families and their homes, and prevent their being placed in the miserable condition of asking the charity of their friends?—a condition well calculated to humble the pride of soldiers, and justly urge them to complain of the injustice of their Government.

May I not further remind the committee that a part of this appropriation will also be applied to the payment of the representatives, and the widows and orphans, of those who bravely fell in battle, and are now entombed in the wilds of Florida? Shall we, then, with all these facts before us, reject this bill? I cannot believe it; our own character and honor are too deeply involved in the issue to authorize such a belief. If I am mistaken, however; if my anticipations are not realized, and the money is withheld and our troops withdrawn, the sooner it is known the better, in order that the citizens of the Territory may take the timely precaution, to ward off, as far as possible, some of the fatal consequences which would follow such a policy.

We are told by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that he cannot vote for this appropriation, without showing to what use it is to be applied; "that the main artery of the Treasury has been bleeding for a long time, and it only required a few gallons more to complete its exhaustion."

It is true the Treasury has been freely bled; its arteries have been opened, and its exhaustion almost complete. This is as it should be. Its blood has been poured out for the preservation of the honor of the Government; and I am willing, and shall rejoice to see the last drop exhausted, if it be necessary to close the arteries and stop the further effusion of the blood of our own citizens, and restore peace and security to an agitated and suffering people.

These are considerations of the highest and first importance; and in the estimation of their value I am not prepared to make the calculation in dollars and cents, but am ready to afford all the facilities required by the Government, and arm it with the necessary power to enforce your violated treaties, and reduce to submission a merciless and lawless foe. To effect these important objects, and restore peace, the Government is particularly anxious. Furnish the means, and, my life on it, all will be accomplished! Such a course will be approved by a brave and generous people, and duly appreciated by those who are so deeply and immediately interested in the result.

In conclusion I will only say, so far as our national honor is concerned, and about which much has been said, that I have no fears of its suffering whilst it remains in the custody of those to whom it is now confided; and as to the distinguished individual who at this time presides over the Department of War, the history of his whole public life furnishes sufficient evidence to show that it ever has been, and still is, identified with the interest, the glory, and honor of his country.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

REMARKS OF MR. HAYNES, OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, January 31, 1838—On the Mississippi Election.

Mr. HAYNES said that he had risen yesterday to address himself briefly to the House, after the claimant (Mr. Prentiss) had taken the floor, but that gentleman, not knowing it was his desire to speak, did not yield to him; that he had offered to give him an opportunity to speak this morning, but anxious as he was that the question should be taken as early as practicable, he declined the offer, reserving to himself the right to speak if the discussion should be protracted. An attempt to bring the debate to a close by the previous question having failed, he now rose to give his views to the House as succinctly as possible. That there need not be any apprehension that he was about to inflict a long-winded speech upon the patience of the House. It was not his habit to do so. But as he had taken some part in the discussion of the question at the extra session of Congress, justice to himself required that he should again express his views upon it. When the subject was then under consideration, he brought to it the exercise of his understanding and his judgment, as free from the extraneous influence of party feeling as it was possible for him to have done; and as all the reflection he had since been able to give it had but strengthened and confirmed the convictions which he then entertained, it was peculiarly proper that he should once more express them. He said, in language familiar to every member of the legal profession, that the whole merits of the question might be compressed within a nut shell. The only facts which entered into it, at all pertinent to a just decision, were, did the Governor issue his writ of election, and were the sitting members returned by a majority of the votes of the people of Mississippi acting in pursuance of it. Could it be necessary to adduce proof of the existence of facts so well known and admitted? Most certainly it could not. Having then stated all the facts which he considered pertinent and material to the issue, he would try them by the provisions of the Constitution, under which elections of this House were to be conducted. And before doing so, he would observe, that much of the difficulty under which some gentlemen seemed to labor in applying that clause of the Constitution which confers upon the States the power to fix "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives," had arisen from not taking, in connection with it, the clause which confers upon Congress the power, "by law, [to] make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators;" and that which provides, "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." When all these clauses are collated with each other, there is the most perfect harmony between them. In a Government constituted like ours, of separate and equal sovereignties, resting upon the will of the people, it was especially fit and proper that the power should be conferred upon them to fix the "times, places, and manner," of choosing their Senators and Representatives in the Federal Legislature. But for the preservation of the Government instituted by the Federal Convention, it was as proper that Congress itself should possess a final and supervisory power upon the subject. To provide against every possible and conceivable contingency, a further power was conferred upon the Governors of the respective States to order vacancies in their representation to be filled. Thus, taking these clauses in connection, there was not only no conflict, but the most perfect harmony between them. It was unnecessary to go into the various subtleties with which the House had been entertained upon the subject of vacancy, or what does, or what does not, constitute such vacancy as is contemplated in the Constitution, or the various modes in which it may "happen."

He should not trouble the House or himself with hair-splitting, philological distinctions, drawn either from authority of members of this House, or by lexicographers, about the meaning of the word "happen," or whether, or not, the term "representation" was taken in one restricted sense or another. He should look to the question alone in its broad constitutional aspect. To enable the House properly to estimate the meaning and intent of the Federal Convention in the clauses of the Constitution bearing upon the subject now before it, it was necessary to revert to the history of that instrument. It was adopted by the Convention in 1789, and reported, by its order, to the Congress of the Confederation, to be submitted by that body to the States for their ratification. Having been ratified by the requisite number of States, the respective ratifications were returned to Congress that it might take order for putting the new Government into operation. By the Constitution the Presidential term was fixed at four, the Senatorial at six, and the Representative at two, years,

It then only remained for the old Congress to fix the day when these respective terms should commence, to fix with equal certainty their respective terminations. Congress did pass an ordinance that Presidential electors should be chosen on the first Wednesday in January, and should meet and give their votes on the first Wednesday in February, 1789, and that the new Government should commence its operations on the first Wednesday, which was the fourth day of March, 1789. It is, then, from the fourth of March, 1789 the respective terms of four years for the President and Vice President, of six years for the Senators, and of two years for the Representatives, were, under the Constitution, made to commence running. But to enable us to arrive at a clear and just conclusion, it is necessary to consider that, in instituting this House, with which part of the Constitution alone are we now concerned, the convention instituted a perpetual office? Will any one attempt to deny it? As it cannot be denied, even in this day of latitudinarian construction, he did not believe that any one would attempt to deny it. What then was the undeniable inference from the establishment of the perpetuity of the representative office? That it implies, and nothing can gainsay or resist the implication, perpetual succession. Can argument be necessary to sustain such a position? Not unless it can be first shown that, in framing the Federal Constitution, our fathers did not intend to institute a perpetual Government. This brings us to the important, and in this case the vital, consideration, what constitutes a vacancy in the meaning of the Constitution? To this there seemed, to his mind, to be but one possible or practicable answer: that as the framers of the Constitution instituted a perpetual Government, of which perpetual succession was an inevitable element, that whenever such succession shall be broken, no matter by what means such breach of succession may "happen," there is a vacancy.

It was not in the vain reliance on his own logical powers, but the unanswerable argument contained in the Constitution itself, that he asserted, with a confidence that nothing could shake, that the position he had taken was impregnable. If he was correct, and that he was so he had not the slightest doubt, he might assert, as he did fearlessly assert, that there was a vacancy "in the representation" of the State of Mississippi when the Governor issued his writ of election in June, 1837. If he was disposed to make nice and cavilling distinctions, he might call the attention of the House to the remarkable coincidence between the terms of the Constitution and the condition of Mississippi at the time the Governor of that State issued his writ of election.

The Constitution requires the Governor to issue a writ of election when a vacancy shall exist in "the representation" of a State. What is the representation of a State? The whole number of members to which such State may be entitled in this House, and not any single representative from such State, unless a State is entitled to but a single representative. The phrase "representation from any State," is as broad and comprehensive here as the term House applied to this body. There was, then, a state of circumstances in Mississippi most apt and fitting to call into exercise the power of her Governor to order an election to fill "vacancies" in her "representation" at the time his writ was issued for that purpose. But we have been told that the Constitution has conferred upon the States the power to fix "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives," and that the right and duty of the Governor to order the vacancy in question to be filled, conflicts with, and overturns, the power they conferred upon the States. That the "times, places and manner of holding elections" having been given to the States, subject only to the supervision of Congress, would be rendered entirely nugatory, if a State having postponed an election beyond the commencement of the representative term, the Governor might declare a vacancy, and order an election to fill it. And to sustain this argument, we have referred to the debates of the several State conventions, by which the Constitution was ratified. There is more than one answer to this. The first is, that these discussions turned upon the proper distribution of power between the States and the Union upon this subject; upon what ought to be the measure of jurisdiction of the one and of the other in regard to Congressional elections. The question of the powers conferred upon, and the duties required of, the Governors of the States to cause vacancies to be filled, did not enter into the discussion, the more especially as the latter was also a power conferred upon the respective States. The second, and to my mind conclusive, answer is, that the whole discussion had reference to the period at which the Senatorial and Representative terms should respectively commence. The commencement of those terms, as I have shown, was not fixed until after the discussions to which I have adverted, and were then made to commence on the 4th day of March, 1789. In this view of the subject, (and he believed it was the correct one,) there can be no violation of the power vested in the States in construing the Constitution as he had construed it, and, instead of conflict between its provisions, the most perfect harmony exists. If the Legislatures of the several States have failed to exercise their constitutional powers according to the intent and meaning of the instrument conferring them, he would not construe the instrument in such a manner to cover their omission as to defeat the great purposes of its framers. If he had shown that the Constitution instituted a perpetual Government; that perpetual succession is its indispensable element; that the representative term of two years commenced on the 4th of March, 1789, and closes biennially at the corresponding period with its commencement, (and he confidently believed he had done so,) who will be bold enough to deny that a vacancy existed in the "representation" of the State of Mississippi when the election was ordered by the Governor to fill that vacancy in June, 1837?

He would add one word more upon this branch of the subject. Every one must admit that the representative term is for two years, no more and no less, and that it first commenced running on the 4th of March, 1789. What, then, is the consequence of the doctrine that a State may postpone her Congressional election, at pleasure, to any day beyond the commencement of that term? That, in reality, the term, intended by the Constitution to cover just two years, may be contracted to any and every fraction of that period. If such a construction should prevail, not only would the perpetuity of succession be destroyed, but the perpetuity of the Government in one of its most essential branches, also, as designed by the framers of the Constitution. He might further illustrate his argument, by adverting to the fact, that the Presidential office has not only been always considered as perpetual, but perpetuity of succession has been preserved in it. It is no answer to say that the necessity of the case has made it so, and that such constant necessity does not exist in regard to the two Houses of Congress. Those two branches of the Government are as essential, he would add, more essential, than the Executive; and to make the Government, what it was intended to be, perpetual, it is necessary that similar perpetuity of succession should be preserved them.

We have heard much said of the limitation in the writ of election issued by the Governor of Mississippi, requiring the vacancy to be filled for the extra session alone. To arrive at a just decision upon it, it is necessary to recur for a moment to the period of the representative term. That term, as we have shown, is for two years. What power does the Constitution confer upon the Governor in relation to it? The power to cause "vacancies" to be filled. As the term is for two years, it follows as an unavoidable consequence that a vacancy happening must run through the remainder of it. What is the power of the Governor on the subject? As just stated, it is to cause "vacancies" to be filled, and goes not one step further. The Constitution itself, in fixing the term, fixes necessarily the extent of the vacancy. The only question within the cognisance of the Governor is, does a vacancy exist? It is easy to illustrate this by a well established principle, applying to all tribunals whatever. That a judgment upon a matter within the jurisdiction of such tribunal shall not be vitiated by its going farther, and attempting to adjudicate another question foreign to, and beyond, its jurisdiction. The Governor of Mississippi had constitutional jurisdiction of the question of vacancy or no vacancy; but in going beyond it, and endeavoring to decide the term for which that vacancy should run, his decision that there was a vacancy cannot be vitiated by it.

Pressed by the anxiety of the House to take the question, although he had little more than stated the argument which governed his own conclusion, that the sitting members are most clearly entitled to their seats, he was done.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

DEFERRED DEBATE.

IN SENATE, WEDNESDAY, January 11, 1838.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions submitted by Mr. CALHOUN on the 27th December, in relation to domestic slavery, the question being on the second branch of Mr. CLAY's substitute to the fifth resolution, which had been struck out yesterday, and reinstated on Mr. BUCHANAN's motion, as follows:

Resolved, That it would be highly inexpedient to abolish slavery in Florida, the only Territory of the United States in which it now exists, because of the serious alarm and just apprehensions which would be thereby excited in the States sustaining that domestic institution; because the people of that Territory have not asked it to be done, and, when admitted as a State into the Union, will be exclusively entitled to decide that question for themselves; and, also, because it would be in violation of a solemn compromise, made at a memorable and critical period in the history of this country, by which, while slavery was prohibited north, it was admitted south of the line of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude; and, also, against the treaty stipulation with Spain of 22d February, 1819, which guaranties the right of property.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that, in pursuance of the pledge given by him last evening, he felt himself bound to bring forward the second branch of Mr. CLAY's amendment, which had been struck out on his motion, and to leave it as he found it. He had therefore done so, but he did not thereby mean to say that he was in favor of every part of the resolution. He had simply restored it to the place where it was, and he left it to its friends, or rather to the parents of the bantling, the Senators from Kentucky and Alabama.

Mr. CLAY said that at the desire of the Senator from Arkansas, (Mr. SEVIER,) he had introduced two different subjects into this resolution, one relating to the treaty of 1819, the other respecting slavery among the Indian tribes. He confessed, however, that he could not perceive any reasonable ground for introducing the latter topic. He did not for himself deem it to be expedient that we should trouble ourselves about the domestic institutions of the poor Indians, and volunteer in this particular to preserve their rights.

Mr. C. would only say, that he heartily wished the rights of these unfortunate beings had been regarded with equal zeal in other matters, and that they had been as much protected where they wanted protection, as in this case, in which it might be probable they desired it not. They certainly had few slaves, if any; if, however, they were slaveholders, no one yet had thought of abolishing it among them. The Abolitionists had not, as far as he knew, addressed to them any petitions on the subject.

Mr. C. therefore thought that that portion of the resolution which related to slavery among the Indian tribes had better be altogether omitted. His object by the resolution was, to embody in one view, as far as possible, every consideration which ought to be regarded as of sufficient force and validity to oppose any interference on the part of Congress with the subject of slavery, and whatever would not be generally assented to as a valid and undisputed ground for non-interference, he had wished not to introduce; not that he himself did not take higher ground, but for the sake of avoiding discussion and controversy on the part of those who did not.

Mr. C. could not indeed conceive why any gentleman should seek to create excitement by introducing matters on which it was well known there existed great variety of opinion, and which would consequently create division.

It was his object to allay excitement—to promote union and unanimity, by omitting all topics of collateral controversy, and embodying together all such arguments and considerations as the country would generally assent to. In doing so, he began with making a sacrifice of his own views and feelings for the sake of obtaining harmony and peace. It appeared to him, that to mix up many controverted topics with one single subject of controversy, was in fact to multiply opponents against that single point, and to raise up enemies where otherwise it would have none. Could it be possible that the frinds of a measure would sincerely wish, by violence and pugnacity, to create and multiply enemies to their own cause? Was this friendship to the cause and rights of the South? Such, however, appeared to Mr. C. to be the very effect and consequence of that ultraism which in some quarters was exhibited on this subject. With a view, therefore, in accordance with the disposition he had expressed, to strip the question as much as possible of all incentives to irritation and provocatives to opposition and enmity, he would move to strike out that portion which related to slavery among the Indian tribes, and also all that portion of the resolution which touched upon the question of the Spanish treaty of 1819.

Mr. SEVIER expressed his concurrence with Mr. CLAY as to the inutility of inserting so much as related to the Spanish treaty of 1819. Mr. S. had looked into that treaty since last evening, and found to his great astonishment that it did not contain any guaranty of "private property," and therefore its effects as to the guaranty of slavery was nugatory. And yet those words had been inserted in the treaty of 1803, of which this treaty was in all its other parts and language almost a liberal transcript.

As to the question of slavery among the Indians, Mr. S. hoped that they would be protected in their rights. Some of them were great slaveholders, and had as many as a hundred negroes. He wished, therefore, to include them, to cover all the ground, and to stop the "gait" of the Abolitionists in this quarter also. The Abolitionists, it is true, had hitherto overlooked them; but there were as many as twenty tribes in his neighborhood, (Arkansas,) and he was anxious that this clause should not be stricken out, but that the poor Indians should be protected in their rights.

Mr. CLAY said that he had himself been under the same impression as to the treaty of 1819, and had thought that the guaranty referred to had been inserted in the treaty of 1819. He found, however, that he was mistaken, and those particular words had been omitted, while in every other respect the treaty of 1803 had been almost literally copied. The omission, however, could not have been by design, as the treaty was made in the administration of Mr. Monroe, when all his Cabinet was composed of gentlemen from the slaveholding States, who would not have assented to any omissions on this subject.

As to what concerned the Indians, however, he (Mr. C.) must persevere in his motion to strike out that part of the resolution; and he did not think that Mr. SEVIER would think it necessary to introduce a new topic of excitement, by bringing into dispute the subject of slavery among the Indian tribes.

Mr. C. said that, by the compromise act, the existence of slavery had been limited in its extent, so as not to be permitted north beyond a certain line of latitude; and he thought that there were no Indian tribes who had slaves beyond that line which the act had fixed upon as its boundary.

Mr. SEVIER replied, and said that the Cherokees who were slaveholders, and had been removed across the Mississippi, had gone north of that line, and had carried their slaves with them. Also, some counties of Missouri had been lately extended beyond that line, so that now slavery was planted beyond the boundary line within which the compromise act had confined it. This circumstance had been assented to at a former session, and the Senator from Vermont himself, (Mr. SWIFT,) as a member of the Indian Committee, had not objected to it.

Mr. SWIFT was understood to say that he had never directly assented to this thing. It had been only touched upon incidentally, and he had never had an opportunity of giving his negative to the question.

It was then by consent determined that that part of the resolution relating to the treaty of 1819 should be stricken out.

The question as to striking out the portion of the resolution relating to slavery among the Indian tribes, was then taken, and Mr. SEVIER having called for the yeas and nays, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Williams, and Young—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Walker, and White—10.

Mr. KING proposed that so much of the resolution as made mention of the compromise act should be stricken out.

Mr. CLAY expressed his readiness to assent to this modification, and it was stricken out accordingly.

The resolution having been then read as modified, Mr. HUBBARD called for the yeas and nays; which were accordingly ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the yeas and nays having been ordered, he wished to state why he could not vote for the resolution as amended.

The main reason assigned in the resolution as it now stands, why slavery should not be abolished in Florida, was that it would be highly inexpedient. He regarded the reason as wholly fallacious, and that it would be of not the slightest force in staying the tide of Abolition. We must bear in mind, that the two points towards which the Abolitionists are directing their attacks, were this District and the Territories. These they considered our weak points; and they were sanguine in the belief, and that not without reason, if they can effect their objects there, the main difficulty in their way would be surmounted. With this knowledge, our policy ought to be to strengthen and fortify those points most effectually. Now, sir, the main barrier which the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) proposes to throw around the Territories in this amendment is, that it is inexpedient to abolish slavery in Florida. Will this oppose any obstacle to the assaults of the foe? Let us see how it will operate. An Abolition petition to abolish slavery in the Territories is presented to an individual in the non-slaveholding States for his signature. He is opposed to the object, and refuses to sign. He is asked his objections. He answers, in the language of this amendment, that, in his opinion, it is highly inexpedient. He then is asked, Do you not consider slavery a political evil? Do you not consider it immoral? Do you not consider it sinful? He answers, Yes, for such will be the answer of nine in ten in the non-slaveholding States. Now mark the reply. He is next asked, How can you justify yourself in refusing to put down what you acknowledge to be immoral, sinful, and a great political evil, on the ground that it is inexpedient? The question is overwhelming, and the petition is signed and a convert made. To stay its progress, far higher grounds must be taken; grounds as high as those assumed by these deluded madmen, and which will show them that, while they are acting in the name of morals and religion, they are violating plighted faith, and subverting the entire fabric of our political system; and, as such, are guilty of violating the most solemn obligations, political, moral, and religious.

Mr. C. next objected, that he disliked the designation of the particular Territory of Florida. The Abolitionists ask to abolish slavery in the Territories; and we reply, that it is inexpedient to abolish it in Florida, assigning for a reason, that it was our only Territory in which slavery existed. They make a general demand, extending to all Territories that now are, or may be hereafter, created; and we meet this broad and sweeping prayer with the modest answer, that it is inexpedient to abolish it in Florida. In giving this diffident response, are we afraid of offending, or are we indisposed to commit ourselves, as to Territories hereafter to be created?

He regarded the grounds assumed in the resolution, as amended, worse than useless. They are calculated not to repel, but to attract attacks.

He was glad that the portion of the amendment which referred to the Missouri compromise had been struck out. He was not a member of Congress when that compromise was made, but it is due to candor to state, that his impressions were in its favor; but it is equally due to it to say, that with his present experience, and knowledge of the spirit which then, for the first time, began to disclose itself, that he had entirely changed his opinion. He now believed that it was a dangerous measure, and that it has done much to rouse into action the present spirit. Had it then been met with uncompromising opposition, such as a then distinguished and sagacious member from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) now no more, opposed to it, abolition might have been crushed for ever in its birth. He then thought of Mr. RANDOLPH, as, he doubts not, many think of him now, who have not fully looked into this subject, that he was too unyielding, too uncompromising, too impracticable; but he had been taught his error, and took pleasure in acknowledging it.

With these views (said Mr. C.) he could not vote for the resolution as it stood, and they were greatly strengthened, when he contrasted it with his fifth resolution, which has been struck out to insert this. That resolution declares that any attempt, by any State or States, or their citizens, or any act or measure of Congress, to abolish slavery in this District, or the Territories, on the ground that it was immoral, or sinful, or otherwise obnoxious, was a dangerous attack on the domestic institutions of all the States. Now (said Mr. C.) what have we done? what have Southern Senators done? Struck down the strong barriers which placed this District and the Territories under the same high constitutional protection with the States themselves, and which made an assault on them an assault on all the slaveholding States, and have erected in their place the most feeble of all barriers, that of mere inexpediency. Why was this done? Was it because the resolution struck out asserted any thing false in fact or principle? No one pretended to say so. No: it is time to speak out; to tell the truth; it was because there was more dread of wounding the feelings of the Abolitionists than the people of the slaveholding States. They are more intent on our destruction that we for our own safety. They mark and punish, by withholding their votes, and throwing them in the opposite scale, all who dare oppose them; while a feeling of indifference and inattention prevails on the part of the people of the slaveholding States.

Thus regarding the resolution as it stands, he was placed in a position which he did not often occupy. He could not vote for it, for the reasons he has stated; and he would not vote against it, for reasons which must be apparent to all; and he was of course constrained not to vote at all.

Mr. NORVELL spoke briefly against Mr. CLAY's second substitute, as now modified.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he was very sorry that the Senator from South Carolina could not reconcile his judgment to vote for the resolution now under consideration. He thought the declaration in the resolution, that abolition was inexpedient, was not strong enough, and that higher grounds ought to be assumed. But what higher grounds? Was any one prepared to say that the naked power of abolition did not exist? Mr. C. spoke of the naked power, and not of its exercise, but the abstract question of the existence of the power. Now, though it did not exist in relation to the States, on the mere question of abstract power, Mr. C. thought the Senator from South Carolina would not declare that it would be unconstitutional for Congress to abolish slavery in the District or Territories. The power, like many others, was not to be exercised, on high considerations, amounting in the District to the plighted faith of the Government, during the existence of a state of things which put a restriction on the exercise of the power; but when that state of things should no longer exist, the power might be exercised. So as to Florida: the power existed, but, for high considerations, was not to be exercised.

The Senator objects because Florida alone is embraced by the resolution. We have stricken out the Indians, regarding them as perfectly safe. And what other Territory than Florida is there in which slavery exists? I framed the resolution as it is, because there is no other such Territory. There are many who send petitions here that appear to be ignorant of this fact, that there is but one such Territory. I wanted them to know that there is but one. If the Senator from South Carolina will point out any other Territory in which slavery exists, I will add it to the resolution; but I am opposed to leaping over beyond what is necessary. And I wish also to announce to the whole world that all this noise about slavery in the Territories of the United States, relates only to Florida, where the circumstances in favor of the existence of slavery are stronger than any where else in the country.

Then the Senator thinks the tone of the resolution is not strong enough. Perhaps he would say that, as slavery is represented as a moral evil, as sinful, we ought to take the opposite ground, and maintain that slavery is not sinful, but in conformity with religion; and he thus maintain the one side, and they the other. And then, he says, the Abolitionists will present a number of questions, which he enumerated. Sir, suppose you should declare slavery accords with the Declaration of Independence, and that it is consistent with every high and holy principle, would it make any converts? Sir, I want to do nothing to aggravate this spirit at the North, and to increase the Abolitionists. I want to prevent the residue of the North from going over to join them. There lies our danger, and there, also, are we to look for safety. The Senator's resolutions are all sound; but there will nothing be gained by them of safety to the cause, or of permanency to the Union. These are great objections. It is well that our language should be firm, maintaining our rights; but let us avoid exasperating and irritating language.

The Senator speaks of the compromise on the Missouri question, and refers to the course of a distinguished member from Virginia, who was present on that memorable occasion. There were two compromises: the first was, that when the bill passed, authorizing the State to form a separate Government for itself, for admission into the Union. It was then that 36° 30′ was fixed as the line of separation. But after the State was admitted into the Union, she introduced a clause into her Constitution, by which free persons of color were not to remain within Missouri. There was the great point of difficulty which shook the Union with more alarm than any thing I have seen, from that day to this. It was that compromise for which I understood the Senator he would not now have voted.

[Mr. CALHOUN was understood to assent.]

No one (said Mr. CLAY) was anxious to have slavery exist north of that line, except in Missouri. With the second question came the great struggle; and I should not refer to the part taken by Mr. Randolph, whose death I sincerely deplored, if it had not been referred to by the Senator. But I feel compelled to say that at the second compromise, in which nothing was sacrificed by the slaveholding States, and in which a mere matter of form was conceded to the free States, which admitted them a ground to stand on at home, the course of that distinguished member from Virginia came nearer hazarding the Union than any other event in our history. He was opposed to all compromises; and I recollect that when the second compromise was under discussion, I was in the chair, and another member from Virginia fainted under the influence of the fumes of the lamps. He was taken to a back seat, and I went to see how he was; but observing that his case was not dangerous, and that he would soon recover, on my return to the Speaker's chair I met the gentleman from Virginia, who, not having spoken with me before, said, "How do you do, sir; I wish you would go with me to Kentucky." I understood him, and that he proposed in this manner a separation of the Southern delegation, retiring from Congress, and leaving the North in possession of the Government. I replied, "Not now; but I will see you to-morrow morning." In the morning I spent an hour with him, in which he urged me to make no compromise, even provided gentlemen would grant us every thing we wanted, in return for giving the North ground to stand on. We parted, promising to be friends in future; and to the end of the session he never spoke to me again. The two words [dough (doe) faces] with which that gentleman rated and taunted our Northern friends, did more injury than any two words I have ever known. Sir, I hope no similar course will be pursued by any one at the present day, in respect to any portion of the delegation of the country. And, sir, I tell the Senator, that I think if he would deal more calmly with all parts of the Union, and say to them that the South are animated to a man on this subject, and would vindicate their rights; if he would turn to the quarter where the blaze is, and endeavor to extinguish the flame, and not to aggravate it; if he would unite with us, to bring the whole country together as in one band of brethren in the same public vessel, I think the result would be more happy.

Mr. CALHOUN replied that the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) must know that he referred to the compromise alluded to in the amendment, which limited the boundary of the slaveholding States in the West to thirty-six degrees thirty minutes. He made no allusion, nor expressed any opinion on the second compromise, on which the Senator dwelt so long; nor was it necessary on the present occasion to do so; nor did he intend to approve of the language used by Mr. RANDOLPH on the occasion to which the Senator referred; for nothing would be more injust than to apply it on the present occasion. He believed that most of the Senators from the non-slaveholding States had gone as far as they could consistently with their opinion of what was due to the feelings and temper of those they represented. He asked them not to go further. His object was to see how far they believed they might safely advance, on constitutional grounds, in taking a stand against agitators.

The first four resolutions were well sustained, although they took the highest constitutional ground; but on the fifth, which involved the same principles with the preceding, he regretted to say, there has been a giving away. The constitutional ground is abandoned, and that of mere inexpediency substituted. But in this he saw no change of opinion on the part of those Senators from the non-slaveholding States, who had so firmly stood by him on the first four resolutions. He attributed it wholly to a deference to their constituents, and it was that which so deeply impressed him with the diseased state of the public sentiment in that section, and the extent of the danger to which the country is exposed.

The Senator from Kentucky asserted that my fifth resolution abandoned the constitutional ground as to this District and the Territories, and asks if there is any one who denies the right of Congress to abolish slavery here, or in the Territories. Yes, (said Mr. C.) he denied it, and also that the fifth resolution abandoned the constitutional ground, as asserted by the Senator. So far from that, it placed the protection of slave property here under precisely the same constitutional guaranty, that the first four placed it in the States. In a word, it placed slavery here, and in the Territories, under the shield of all the slaveholding States, where alone it can be safely placed, and that on principles which he held to be impregnable. The first four resolutions taken together, asserted the broad principle of non-interference by a State, or States, or their citizens, with the domestic institutions of other States; and that this great principle of non-interference, is particularly applicable to the institution of domestic slavery as it exists in the South. These have been voted by large majorities, and are therefore fully established, as far as they can be by the vote of this body. The Senator from Kentucky will not then deny this great constitutional principle of non-interference, which lies at the bottom of our political institutions.

Now, sir, what did my fifth resolution, which has been struck out to make room for the Senator's amendment, assert? It declares that the attempt of any State, or States, or their citizens, or any act of this Government, to abolish slavery in this District, or the Territories, or the Government, that it is sinful, immoral, or otherwise obnoxious, is a dangerous attack on the domestic institutions of all the slaveholding States. Will the Senator deny this? Will he deny that the abolition of slavery here, or in the Territories, or an attempt to abolish it, with the avowed object of effecting its abolition in the States, is a dangerous attack on the domestic institutions of slavery in all the slaveholding States—a dangerous intermeddling with those institutions within the meaning of the first four resolutions, and, consequently, in violation of the fundamental principles of the Constitution, and subversive of the entire fabric of our political institutions! The next great constitutional principle on which he relied, is that of equality between the States, and non-discrimination on the part of this Government between the States, in reference to their domestic institutions, which applies to the legislation over this District and the Territories, as well as to the States themselves. To suppress the domestic institution of slavery in this District, or in Territories where it may exist, would be directly contrary to the equality between the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States as members of the Union, and injurious and insulting to the former, and a palpable violation of one of the great fundamental principles of our system. He held it as incontrovertible, that no member of this body, whatever may be his private opinions as to the character of the domestic institutions of any of the States, had, acting in his official character, any right whatever to discriminate between that of one section and another, to the prejudice of either, in reference to their peculiar institutions. All are to be equally regarded and respected. The opposite course would destroy all equality between the different members of the Confederacy, would sow the seeds of discord, and, in the end, destroy the Union itself.

These two great principles, non-interference and non-discrimination, are, as he has often said, the basis of his resolutions; and they comprehended all, District and Territories, as well as the States themselves. These were broad, and deeply seated in the Constitution, and no member has ventured to deny them. Our salvation depended on preserving them inviolate. These, he would repeat, were the high constitutional grounds assumed in his fifth resolution, which had been surrendered for inexpediency! The Senator from Kentucky tells us, if should meet the Abolitionists on these grounds we must come to a direct issue. That is what he desired. He sought a plain and direct issue on constitutional principles, not with them, but in this body; and such an issue was the only safe and solid ground on which the Senators even from the non-slaveholding States can meet Abolition at home. The Senator from Michigan (Mr. NORVELL) has boldly and nobly told you that it is the only ground on which he can meet it, and that if you should substitute inexpediency for the Constitution, you would compel him to go against the resolution. The Senator is right. The Constitution, no interference, no discrimination. These are the grounds on which the battle may be safely fought. You must tell these deluded fanatics you have no right to intermeddle in any form or shape, and that while you accuse others of sin and immorality, you yourselves are guilty of both in such intermeddling. Inexpediency! Think of the folly of attempting to resist the powerful impulses that urge them on to the work of destruction with so feeble a word! You might as well think of extinguishing a conflagration that mounted to the clouds, by throwing a bucket of water on it. Expediency, concession, compromise! Away with such weakness and folly. Right, justice, plighted faith, and the Constitution: these, and these only, can be relied on to avert conflict. These have been surrendered for inexpediency!

He was not satisfied with the explanation which the Senator from Kentucky gave, why the amendment should be limited to Florida. He says, that many of these fanatics are so ignorant, that they are not aware of the fact, that Florida is the only slaveholding Territory. If such be the case, how idle would be the whole scheme of the Senator to meet them with arguments! But, as badly as he thought of them, he did not think the Senator had done them justise. They were indeed blind and deluded in their warfare on our institutions; but on all other subjects, many of them were as intelligent as the rest of the community, and know as well as he and the Senator how many Territories we had, and that Florida was the only one with a slave population. On this point they knew perfectly what they were about; and in praying that slavery might be abolished in the Territories, they intended to establish a general principle, not only that it should be abolished in Florida, where it exists, but that hereafter no Territory should be created in which it should not be prohibited. This was clearly their intention; and when the Senator limits it to Florida, he declines to meet this broad issue, and virtually surrenders the whole ground, except Florida, to the Abolitionists. One of his leading objects, as he has often said, in moving these resolutions, was to ask the Senate to define its position, in order that his constituents and the world might know what ground this body intends to occupy. He asked none to vote against his judgment or inclination, but to say distinctly by his vote what he intends. If it be intended, then, to surrender all constitutional grounds as to the Territories, and places their protection on the ground of inexpediency, and to surrender all Territories hereafter to be created, without even the poor protection of this feeble word, vote for the resolution as amended. As to himself, he would give no such vote. He never would consent to place our rights on such frail foundation. He stood on the Constitution—on the great principles of non-interference and non-discrimination, and he never would surrender them, and put the question on mere inexpediency. He would leave those who took different views to decide on the resolution as amended as they might think proper. He would take no part in it, one way or another.

Mr. CLAY here modified his amendment, on the suggestion of Mr. HUBBARD; the most important part of which modification related to the implied breach of faith, by abolition, with citizens who, with their slaves, settle in the United States Territories.

Mr. CALHOUN said he believed the Senator from New Hampshire was willing to go as far as he possibly could in this course. But Mr. C. had set out in this discussion with the determination to yield or recognise neither the right of interference, or of discrimination. But this amendment would yield it, or, at best, it did not assert the contrary right. Mr. C. would neither oppose it nor vote for it; perhaps it was the strongest that could be had, and if so, let it pass. What Mr. C. wanted was, that the Government, the common agent of the States, should define their position, and that the Northern States should be declared to have no right to look into or judge of Southern institutions, or to legislate in relation to them on any ground.

After some remarks from Messrs. WALKER and CALHOUN,

Mr. RIVES, after some remarks, moved to strike out the proposed amendment after the word "Resolved," and insert the following as a substitute:

"That any interference with the subject of slavery in the Territories of the United States, in which it may exist, is inhibited by all the considerations in regard to the rights and interests of the inhabitants of the said Territories, the security of the slaveholding States, and the danger of the Union, which are mentioned in the preceding resolution as forbidding any interference with, or action on, the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia; and for the further reason that the people of the Territories, when admitted into the Union, as States, will be exclusively entitled to decide the question of the existence of slavery, within their respective limits, for themselves."

Mr. CALHOUN said that the Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) appeared not to be pleased with his determination not to vote for the resolution as it now stood amended. He (Mr. CALHOUN) complained of no Senator's course, and none had a right to complain of his. We are acting on a great and dangerous subject, one which will long agitate this country, and have a decided influence on its future destiny. He, for one, was determined throughout to occupy the ground which his judgment and conscience dictated; and he expected and desired others to do the same. At the outset, he stated that he was prepared to modify his resolutions, so as to make them acceptable, as far as he could, without sacrificing the principles on which they rested. These were, as he had frequently stated, non-interference and non-discrimination, which, in his opinion, could not be abandoned, at any point, without a sacrifice of the rights and safety of the South; and, under this impression, he had constantly resisted every attempt to induce him to surrender them.

The Senator seemed to think that he had not, in his fifth resolution, taken constitutional ground. He thought differently; that he had taken the highest and strongest constitutional ground in declaring that interference with slavery in this District, or the Territories, was a direct (yes, he would repeat an epithet he had yielded to reconcile the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. CRITTENDEN,) and dangerous attack on the domestic institutions of all the States; as direct and as dangerous as an interference with slavery in one, would be an interference in all the other slaveholding States; thus placing slavery here, and in the Territories, under the same constitutional protection as in the States themselves. He would have added the additional ground, which the Senator had so well explained, and in which he entirely concurred, but he knew that the sense of the body had already been tested in relation to it, and that we of the South were in a minority on it; and his object was to place it on constitutional grounds, still higher and stronger, if possible, and on which he had hoped there would be greater unanimity. As to voting for a resolution placing the question on the ground of inexpediency, the Senators from Virginia and Mississippi must excuse him. He believed it would be fallacious and dangerous, and neither his judgment nor sense of duty would permit him to give it his vote. If we place the question there, we will be overpowered. The whole North, with little exception, would be united against us, and we would be voted down in both Houses, in less than two years; and that on a ground which would not justify the South in taking the remedy into her own hands.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia was much better than the resolution as it stood amended. Though it surrendered much, (the only strong and tenable grounds, in his opinion) yet it abandoned the feeble ground of inexpediency, and rested the question on something like a principle. With a slight modification, adding a single letter to the resolution, so as to make it plural instead of singular, and to refer to the resolutions already adopted, it would, in a great measure, make it conform to the fifth as he had originally presented it. He hoped the Senator would make the modification. Thus modified, he would willingly give it his vote; and he trusted that the Senators from the non-slaveholding States who had supported his first four resolutions, would give it theirs also.

Mr. PRESTON, after briefly criticising the several amendments, said that he thought them all objectionable in many respects. Indeed, from the first, he had not concealed the repugnance he felt at bringing the South, in this manner, to trial before an incompetent tribunal, by any mere resolutions and abstractions of any kind. He still continued of this opinion, and deprecated the agitating course which had been pursued. His position was to deny the jurisdiction—to declare the subject was coram non judice, and not to stand here and be insulted by agitation and discussion of his undoubted rights. Therefore, he utterly disclaimed the course of dragging the South before the Senate by resolutions and abstractions.

As to these amendments, if adopted, they would weaken the effect of the resolution. He thought that resolution, as it stood yesterday, was stronger than it now is, with these amendments. Mr. P. earnestly invoked the Senate to put an end to these discussions. What benefit could accrue from such endless discussions? How was this a way to meet the Vermont resolutions? Gentlemen might resolve and resolve, and still go on resolving and resolving; but what, he would ask, was the effect of such a course? Its only effect was to create agitation, and open a wider door for the Abolitionists here, and throughout the country. Discussion (said Mr. P.) sets us down; it weakens our cause: we want action, and not discussion. It was a difference merely of tweedle dum and tweedle dee, which was contended for in the verbiage and mere phraseology on which debates were started; but while gentlemen were amusing themselves in this manner about the difference between a few letters and words, the outrage upon the South was carried on all the while by the very discussion. Therefore, Mr. P. deeply regretted the introduction of thts matter from the first.

I can see precisely, Mr. P. said, that the gentlemen have very kind feelings towards us. I am grateful for it, and would not disturb the harmony between us, or withhold from them due gratitude and respect. I am disposed to vote the way they suggest, and have concluded to go with them; and the consideration is not passed by that they may conquer for us at the North. I am not disposed to adopt any offensive armor, nor yet to preach up the great principles of moderation. But the South are properly to avail themselves of defensive armor; and when these borderers know that they are linked and bound together, and ready for action whenever assaulted, this frowning attitude is the very best that can be taken, and the only possible means of making a secure defeuce. They can protect themselves; and what I here wish to do is to save the Union, and maintain the peace of the country, by keeping the agitators out of these halls. Sir, if you will only do your duty here, we will keep out the borderers, and we do not want your help for that purpose. Protect us within the walls of the Capitol: out of it, we will protect ourselves; and we ask you only to let us alone.

The modification proposed by the Senator from Virginia links in the same destiny the Territories and the States, because it declared that to touch slavery in the District or the Territories would disturb and endanger the Union in the same manner as to touch it in the slaveholding States. It first aimed at preserving the Union, and then the integrity and rights of the States.

After some remarks from Mr. NILES, Mr. WALKER submitted a modification, which was accepted by Messrs. CLAY and HUBBARD, to strike out the words "ought not," and to insert that any attempt of Congress to abolish slavery in any of the Territories would create serious alarm and just apprehension in the States, sustaining that domestic institution, &c.

The question was then taken on Mr. RIVES'S amendment, and decided in the negative—yeas 10, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Lumpkin, Preston, Rives, Roane, Sevier, Tipton, and White—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Walker, Webster, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

The question then recurring on Mr. CLAY'S substitute as amended.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to amend it by inserting the words "dangerous attack upon the States in which slavery exists."

Mr. BUCHANAN thought the debate had now become exceedingly dull. It had almost worn itself out, and was now dragging its dull length along. He would not, however, suffer it to close without making a few observations, in consequence of what had repeatedly fallen from the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.)

It had been often said, in the course of this debate, that these resolutions were intended as a platform on which we of the North, who were disposed to sustain the constitutional rights of the South, might stand, and defend ourselves against the attacks of the Abolitionists. Now, for his part, he disclaimed the idea of having any such platform erected for him. We can sustain ourselves better without it. "The blood of Douglas can protect itself." All we desire upon this question is, "hands off." We know best how to fight our own battles.

These resolutions had emanated from the South; and he most fervently hoped that they might do some good in tranquillizing and soothing the feelings of the people there, and in convincing them that they had numerous friends in the North, who would stand by them in any emergency. He protested, however, against the idea that they were passed for the benefit of the North.

Some commiseration (said Mr. B.) has been expressed for our situation. It has been said that our intentions were very good, and that we would be willing to go further, if we dared to do so. Now, he protested against any such inference. He had always gone as far as his sense of right and justice dictated, and if there had not been an Abolitionist in existence, he would have gone no further. We wanted no platform on which to stand, save the Constitution of our country. What fanatic had there ever been in the North so mad as to assert that we had any right to attack slavery in the States where it exists? That principle had been settled by the first Congress; and that principle, so long as he held a seat in the Senate, he should maintain to the death. Now, could any resolutions pass here which would make the case stronger? No, sir: we stand upon the Constitution alone; but we are always willing to vote for any measures within its pale, which will satisfy the South that we are ever ready to maintain principles so long and so well established. These (said he) have been the motives of my conduct throughout upon these resolutions. They are a Southern, and not a Northern, measure; intended for the benefit of the South, rather than the North. In the portion of the Union from which he came, we deprecate agitation and excitement from this source; and he, therefore, most devoutly trusted that this protracted debate was now about to terminate.

We adopted one resolution yesterday, in regard to slavery in the District of Columbia, which may have a good effect in the North. Opinions which are united there against any interference with slavery in the States, are not so unanimous in regard to this District. That resolution places the subject on its true principles, and will strike the common sense of all impartial men as just and expedient. It asserts the proposition that when Congress accepted the cession, there was an implied faith pledged to the ceding States that we should not convert that act of their kindness into an instrument of their destruction; and that whilst slavery existed in them, it should not be abolished within these ten miles square in the midst of their territories. The avowal of this distinct principle by the Senate, for which he had always contended, might be productive of beneficial effects in the Northern States.

One word more. The second part of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky had been offered by him (Mr. B.) as a distinct proposition this morning. He had pledged himself yesterday to bring it forward in this shape, provided the Senate would then strike it out of the amendment, and take a separate vote on the remaining portion of it, which related exclusively to the District of Columbia. This had been done; and thus the resolution had, strangely enough, become the child of his adoption, though not of his affections. After it had been amended by striking from it the Indian territory, and modified and remodified in such a manner as to suit the views of the partnership concern between the Senators from New Hampshire and Kentucky, (Messrs. HUBBARD and CLAY) he (Mr. B.) would have cheerfully given it his support. He was, therefore, much astonished and disappointed when these two Senators, apparently without the slightest regard for their own offspring, consented to abandon it without a struggle. He greatly preferred it to the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. WALKER) which they had accepted, and which was now before the Senate. The truth was, that the resolution which he had offered this morning, to redeem his promise, had undergone so many modifications and mistifications to make it conform to the views of every body who desired any change, that no man who was acquainted with its original features could imagine how it had been transformed into the resolution now before the Senate. But so it was. We once had a Senator from New Hampshire, (Mr. HILL,) who was made of sterner stuff than to have yielded up his resolution to the solicitations of gentlemen, as the present Senator from that State had done. And here as he had alluded to that Senator without having previously intended it, he would take occasion to say of him, that he was a man of strong and determined character, and was a good lover as well as a good hater. Mr. B. had never met on that floor a Senator who possessed more extensive and minute political information in regard to our domestic affairs, and however much he may have been traduced, there was no man, in the Senate, at the present day, who loved his country better. He well recollected the time when that Senator had formed a coalition with the Senator from Kentucky, and they had fought the battle together without yielding a single inch. It is true that but a small force was rallied under their united banner. He (Mr. B.) was almost their only follower; but they never thought of surrendering. He could have wished that the new coalition between the present Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Kentucky had been animated by the same spirit. At the instance of many gentlemen, the resolution had been changed, rechanged, and modified, until he had become tired of the process. He had determined for himself to quit setting to every new partner that might offer. He would now consent to take the last edition of the resolution, as it had come from the hands of the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. WALKER) but he would not, for one, agree to any other changes. Much as he desired to gratify the South, he was not disposed to go any further. He should, therefore, vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.)

Mr. CALHOUN said, that the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania were of a character that he could not permit then to pass in silence. He understood the Senator to say that he (Mr. BUCHANAN) has been actuated solely by the desire to sooth and tranquillize the feelings of the South, or, in other words, in pity of her weakness and fears. [Mr. B. shook his head.] Mr. C. said he would be glad to understand what the Senator did mean.

Was he, then, said Mr. C. to understand the Senator that all he said about soothing and tranquillizing the feelings of the South, originated in a belief that these resolutions were intended for that purpose by the mover? If so, he would tell him that he was grossly mistaken. She needed not this, nor any other measure, to tranquillize her. She was calm and collected, and instead of being agitated, was too indifferent. She had no fears for herself. She was full of resources, and would, he trusted, be prepared to meet the crisis, whenever forced on her by the injustice, or insults, of the other portion of the Union. No: these resolutions originated in far different motives—from a sincere desire to prevent, if possible, the shock to which the present current of events was rapidly leading, and which, if not prevented, would bring to the ground the institutions of the country. He was anxious, before it was too late, to present some common constitutional ground on which the reflecting and patriotic, of every quarter of the Union, might rally, to arrest the approaching catastrophe, and avert what the North was at least as much interested to do as the South. A platform for that purpose (if the Senator preferred the word) was indispensable, if it be thought worth while to oppose the coming disasters. It was these higher considerations, which embraced the peace, quiet, and the safety of the whole country, and not the object that the Senator seemed to suppose, that induced him to introduce these resolutions. If the common interests of all be thought not to be involved in the question, tell us so, and we will take care of ourselves. We ask neither pity nor protection.

But the Senator exclaimed, speaking in relation to the two sections of the country, hands off! The North says, hands off, to the South! The Senator, in the name of his constituents, says, hands off to me, in the name of mine, when he knows that a large portion of them are daily and hourly, in violation of the Constitution, and the most solemnly plighted faith, aiming a most deadly blow, not simply at our peace and prosperity, but at our very existence as a people! When did the South ever place her hand on the North? When did she ever interfere with her peculiar institutions? When did she ever aim a blow at her peace and security? When did she ever demand more than naked, sheer justice of the Union? Never! never! And can we reverse these questions, and have the same response from the North? With what propriety or justice, then, can the Senator proclaim, hands off to us—the aggressor to the aggressed?

He must express his regret, that the Senator should be surprised into so hasty a course of remarks. He had habitually indicated, on this dangerous question, correct feelings, and was one of the last from whom he would have anticipated such remarks as fell from him; and he felt assured that, in making them, he had not done justice to his liberal feelings on the subject.

Mr. BUCHANAN was very sorry that the Senator from South Carolina had misunderstood his remarks. He trusted and believed that his course upon this subject, from the first day he had taken his seat in the Senate until the present moment, had been such as to place him above all suspicion. He could not believe that any other Senator had fallen into the same mistake. The ardor of the gentleman's feelings upon this subject must have blinded his judgment.

What he (Mr. B.) had said, and what he meant to say, was, that it had been repeatedly asserted by the gentleman himself, and by others, in the course of this debate, that these resolutions were intended as a platform for the friends of the South in the Northern States, on which they might stand and defend themselves against the assaults of the Abolitionists; and that we of the North would have gone further than we had done, to protect the rights of the South, had it not been from a dread of public opinion at home. He had also stated that some commiseration, on this account, had been expressed for our situation. Now, the Senator had entirely misapprehended the nature of this remark. The commiseration which I said had been expressed by himself and others for our condition in the North, he understood directly the reverse of what my words imported, and had construed them into an expression of pity and commiseration, on my part, for the condition of the people of the South. Such an idea as that of applying the term pity to that gallant people, had never entered my mind. They are far above it. I know them too well, and respect them too highly, to have ever thought of applying to them any such term. I am fully sensible that they are able and willing to defend their own rights, without assistance from any other quarter. Pity for the South! I utterly disclaim having uttered any such sentiment.

He, Mr. B. did not blame the Senator from South Carolina for having introduced those resolutions. Certainly not. Had he not voted for them, one and all, except that which related to the District of Columbia; and instead of that one, he had voted for another on the same subject, which he solemnly believed would be productive of greater good? Now what he had disclaimed, and what he meant to disclaim, was that these resolutions were intended for the benefit of the friends of the Union in the North. They had not been brought forward by the North, but by the South: and hence it was fair to infer that their purpose was to satisfy and tranquillize public opinion in that portion of the Union. He had voted for them, with pleasure, under this belief; and he trusted that our friends in the South would now be convinced that we were ready to stand by them in the assertion and maintenance of all their constitutional rights over their slaves.

Mr. B. said that these resolutions could not aid him at home. There the battle had been already fought, and what part he had taken in it two years ago, was well known to every man in the country who had thought his humble career worthy of any observation. He was fully convinced that the protracted discussion of the abolition question here at this time could do the friends of the Union in the North little, if any good; he wished he were convinced that it would do them no harm. This was the great centre of agitation. When it was commenced here, its baneful influence must spread over the whole Union. Deeply impressed with the belief, he had for two years, when abolition memorials were presented, uniformly voted in favor of such a disposition of them as would prevent useless and dangerous discussion upon this theatre. He hoped he could not now be misunderstood by the Senator from South Carolina.

After some remarks from Messrs. HUBBARD and WALKER,

Mr. CALHOUN said, that in compliance with the urgent wishes of his friends, rather than with his own judgment, he would consent to vote for the resolution as amended. It had undergone important modifications, making it out stronger than at first, but yet it was still very feeble, and not at all suited to the occasion.

On taking the question to agree to the resolution as modified in the following form:

Resolved, That any attempt of Congress to abolish slavery in any Territory of the United States, in which it exists, would create serious alarm and just apprehension in the States sustaining that domestic institution; would be a violation of good faith towards the inhabitants of any such Territory who have been permitted to settle with, and hold slaves therein; because the people of any such Territory have not asked for the abolition of slavery therein; and because, when any such Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State, the people thereof will be entitled to decide that question exclusively for themselves.

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 35, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Tumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roan, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Davis, Knight, McKean, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Swift, and Webster—9.

So the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

REMARKS OF MR. BYNUM, OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, January 24, 1838—On the bill making a partial appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1838.

Mr. BYNUM rose and said he felt it a duty which he owed to the House, the country, and particularly to that party to which he had the honor to belong, to offer some response to the remarks of the honorable gentlemen who had addressed the House in opposition to the bill which was then submitted for the consideration of the committee. He had heretofore been perfectly silent on every subject that had any relation to the prosecution of the different campaigns in Florida, by this and the former Administration; but since the remarks of an honorable gentleman who sat on his left (Mr. BELL, of Tennessee) he felt as though he might be justly considered derelict in his duty here, and shrinking from responsibility, to suffer longer such remarks to pass unnoticed.

That honorable member, in opposing this bill, as he understood him, in an air of triumph asked the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) if he was not ashamed to be under the necessity of getting men belonging to an opposite party (alluding to Gen. THOMPSON and Mr. DOWNING) to defend the measures of the Administration?

This way, said Mr. B. that gentlemen had of putting such questions, could be retorted in a most caustic and cutting manner to that gentleman, if gentlemen should feel disposed to apply it on that occasion, as the shame might be found to exist in another quarter; but he would disdain to bandy epithets there or elsewhere with that gentleman, as being unparliamentary, unargumentative, and implying nothing. He would, however, as far as his feeble abilities permitted, proceed to notice the character of the opposition to the present bill.

Had he not, said Mr. B. in the course of his life, had an opportunity to turn occasionally over the mouldering pages of history, and listened to the stories of tradition, he would have been surprised, astonished, if not astounded, at the extraordinary opposition to the present bill before the committee, and should have read and have listened to those stories to but little profit, had not those lessons taught him to know something of the rancor and disastrous effects of a factious party spirit, that could see nothing good but what emanated from its own party's pollutions. He felt humiliated, too, at the reflection, as it went far, very far, to realize the anticipations, and verify the predictions, of the enemies of all free Democratic Republican Governments that ever existed, and as it would be hailed as a signal triumph by the friends of monarchical, arbitrary, and despotic Governments throughout the world, who had either written or spoken on the subject.

Sir, (said Mr. B.) we are only about to travel the road, chalked out by the history of former Republics, setting at defiance alike the lessons of experience and the plainest dictates of common sense. In cherishing this foolish rancor of party spirit, we are too apt to lose sight of that paramount interest, the public good. Such had been the fatal baleful rock upon which he believed every former Republic had been wrecked. It was by steering clear of those, that we could with any degree of certainty calculate upon the perpetuation and preservation of our own free institutions. There were few men in or out of that House, more devoted to party than he was; but as much as he professed to love his party, he could not for a moment cease to love his country better, nor could he for a moment support any party that permitted itself directly or indirectly to be thrown into conflict with the best interests of the country.

Sir, what were the objections to free Democratic Republics, urged with so much force and plausibility by the advocates of despotisms and monarchies throughout the old world? Had they not ever been levelled against the inefficiency of their Executive department, particularly and eminently so in times of war? Have they not proven this defect in all popular Governments, whether ancient or modern, by a multitude of examples quoted from both eras; and what was the attempt then made by the honorable gentlemen, who had opposed the passage of the bill with so much vehemence, but to realize by a most powerful demonstration the prognostications of the enemies of all free Democratic Governments, by crippling the arm of the Executive department in withholding the supplies necessary to the subsistence of our valiant little armies, now fighting the battles of their country, amidst every deprivation and want incident to savage warfare, amidst forests and deserts hitherto unknown to civilized man. It was to re-enact the very scene that had been the cause of the subversion of all ancient republics, and brought popular Governments into disrepute, to carry out the principle that the Opposition now propose to effect by the rejection of the bill on your table. We had boasted much of our experience of the causes of the failures of ancient democracies, and of the intelligence of the age, to justify us in the belief that we could continue to preserve our present form of Government. But were we not about to follow the very examples that had proven so fatal to all similar Governments? He thought unquestionably we were, and this, too, by permitting the Legislative to interfere with and usurp the Executive department, and to cripple its efficiency.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BIDDLE) had protested that he would not vote a dollar for the prosecution of the War in Florida, until sufficient evidence was produced to him that it was necessary; and another gentleman had spoken of the recall of our troops, or a part of them. Sir, is this not tampering too much with the Executive branch of this Government? Is it not an attempt to usurp the power that belongs exclusively to that department, given it by the Constitution? He warned gentlemen, in their blind party zeal, not to forget what appropriately belonged to the department to which they themselves were attached. It was a flagrant violation of the Constitution and a usurpation of the rights of the Executive, as well as of the people, to be continually interfering with the rights and duties of that department. Perhaps there was no maxim of a free constitutional Government established with a greater unanimity of sentiment by the lovers of constitutional freedom throughout the world, than that the Executive, Judicial, and Legislative Departments of Government should be kept perfectly separate and distinct, equally free and independent of each other, while all should bear their equal proportion of responsibility to the great body of the people; and for the Legislative to take one atom of responsibility from the Executive, would destroy that beauty and symmetry, upon which the safety of the whole fabric of our Government was so pre-eminently dependent; and he would assure gentlemen, that whenever they did succeed in battering down that department, would fall with it the liberties of this nation, great as it was, and greater, as it might be. If any there had taken such a stand, he would ask him to re-examine his position and hasten to retrace his steps.

Mr. B. said that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BIDDLE) has distinguished himself most signally by his attacks at this and the preceding sessions on the Executive, and had been most reckless, he thought, in his unmeasured denunciations. He had dragged into that discussion, with what propriety he (Mr. B.) was not then able to see, the illustrious name of General Jackson, our venerable ex-President, and had assailed in most violent terms the conduct of that veteran statesman and soldier. He would have thought the peculiar situation in which that gentleman stood towards Gen. Jackson, as a matter of delicacy, should have restrained him particularly from an attack on his reputation; but it did not. Nothing, it seemed, could stay the uplifted arm of that gentleman against the reputation of the mighty conqueror of our savage foe and illustrious Hero of Orleans. Sir, (said he) let me tell that honorable gentleman, with all possible deference, that his attack upon the reputation of Gen. Jackson is like darting broom straws against a wall of adamant. The fame of Gen. Jackson will be the theme of history in every country where civilized man is known, and will be cherished with the liveliest emotions by every friend of freedom throughout the world, when that gentleman's and mine shall have been eternally forgotten, and sunk into the shades of oblivion.

Sir, he would say to that gentleman, far better for him to cease such attacks, for in making them, he would always be found "biting a file." The fame of one so illustrious could not be affected by the traduction of any one here: it was in the safe keeping of the Democracy of his country, and enshrined in the hearts of freemen.

The gentleman had seen fit to lug in, too, in connection with Gen. Jackson, the names of Generals Scott and Jesup, and had attempted a comparison of their merits; and had at once arraigned, tried, and convicted General Jesup, with what propriety he had not yet been able to see. He had, said Mr. B. no personal acquaintance with either Scott or Jesup, and to them was perfectly indifferent. For the conduct of General Jesup, upon which the honorable gentleman had dwelt with such emphasis, he had no apologies to make. He thought when the letter was written, as he did now, that it came in a questionable shape. He had seen a letter, however, from General Jesup, in which he thought he had acted with some magnanimity, and had made an atonement for much of the offensiveness of that letter.

But so far as Gen. Jackson's conduct was concerned in relation to that matter, however, he stood there ready to defend every particle of it. Never had he in any part of his life, in his Mr. B's opinion, acted with more propriety than on that occasion. It was well known there and elsewhere, that the most unfounded rumors had reached here, and responded to, and circulated with eagerness, by this very Opposition, prejudicial and condemnatory of the course that General Scott had pursued in Florida; in fact, it had been carried so high in the South, that he had understood in some part of Florida General Scott had actually been burnt in effigy, or offered some other indignity, perhaps at or near Tallahassee; and he believed that presses of the Opposition and the Whig party had already began to denounce his campaign on that floor, about which the memorable letter had been written by General Jesup to Mr. Blair, with a request that it be shown to the President, which at once gave to the charge a responsible name, with time, place, and date. He would not again speak of the propriety of that letter; but the President had deemed it his duty to act then on the subject, and to place in command another, until an investigation had taken place. In doing that, he said, Gen. Jackson had sustained his high character for promptitude and efficiency, and it would have been unworthy of the high character he bore, both as a statesman and soldier, to have done otherwise, and if there was blame to be attached any where, it was partly to this House, to the public, and to general Jesup, and not a particle to General Jackson.

Mr. B. said he himself had no faith in those tea-party Generals, that lounged and hung about the courts of Washington. He thought they had become (if he could be allowed the expression) effeminated and enervated by dancing attendance at the Washington coteries, with sword and epaulette. He believed it an imposition upon the Government to keep them here, and would go as far as any man in correcting this evil. Such men were not fit for service; but upon that subject he hoped to say more at another time.

I will go as far as any man in erasing from the rolls of your army the names of your coterie and ball-room chieftains.

Something had been said about raising a committee to investigate the abuses of the Florida campaigns; and he once had entertained some idea of voting for such a proposition; but, upon mature reflection, he had become perfectly satisfied that the whole scheme, for the present at least, was suicidal; would be pregnant with the most disastrous consequences, both to the army and the public interests. What, (said he,) upon the field of battle, amidst the reeking of blood and stamp of the war horse, to stop to inquire after abuse and failures. No, sir, no, sir: it will breed distrust in your camp, unnerve the arm of your stoutest soldier, and paralyze every effort of your generals; lead to doubt and defeat, and finally to that very disgrace that gentlemen had discoursed of so learnedly and volubly. Let the war be ended, conquer your enemy, and he would then and there, in his place, pledge himself to go with any man, or with any party, in ferreting out abuses—as far as he who would dare go farthest; but until then, he should view any attempt of the kind unwise, impolitic, and fraught with the most disastrous consequences. The wisest of men had said—it was written in holy writ, he believed—that "there was a time for all things;" and never did a proverb more strictly apply to any occasion than that did to the present. It was that kind of suicidal policy that had overthrown great Carthage, Afric's imperial city, when basking in the sunshine of her high prosperity, and competing for empire with her great rival. It was that kind of policy that had humbled Carthage, and prostrated her at the feet of her imperial mistress, the Republic of Rome. Who does not recollect, that when her conquering general was marching on, and in the very act of laying hands on the gates of Rome, he was arrested by the fell demon of party spirit, and recalled to Africa by the schisms of party, and the influence of faction, for which misdeed Carthage had been long buried beneath the ruins inflicted by her conqueror's arms, and the name of Carthaginian liberty had long since been erased from the history of the world.

Yes, sir, the great Hannibal and his army, he feared, had been recalled from Rome, when, in the act of humbling that haughty Republic, by the same spirit which had prompted the attempt to recall our armies from Florida. How near the ultimate consequences might prove the same, history and time alone would declare. The policy, in his judgment, was damning—the idea preposterous. The Seminole Indians must be humbled, conquered, brought in subjection, or we invite a fruitful harvest of Indian wars. Let no man think for a moment otherwise; and when our victories are proclaimed, and not until then, let us think of investigations. Then let us cashier and impeach the timid and imbecile, but reward with laurels the brow of the gallant and the brave.

He had been utterly astonished and confounded at the sentiments of honorable gentlemen expressed on that occasion, that we should now make peace with the Indians, and pay them a boon, a tribute, to move away, to cease to harass and murder the people of Florida and our frontiers. Such sentiments were too revolting. When would ever such a craven policy be adopted by the brave and free men of this nation? Never. Never, in God's name, let it be said that this proud and mighty nation should be so humbled, and by a handfull of savages, as to buy their peace. The mighty genius of liberty shrunk at the idea, and our patriotism stood rebuked by the spirit of our fathers and the god of our freedom. Sir, had that Roman example been lost sight of in the scramble and heat of party spirit? Had we already forgot that when Brennus of old, with his Goths, were at the gates of Rome, demanding tribute, and the cowardly poltroons of the city were in the very act of weighing out to them their gold, and when that gold was even exhausted, and the cry rung through the crowd, what shall we do for more to throw in the scale to make the weight; when the cry reached the ears of old Camillus, he, with godlike mien, hobbled forth, with his sword in one hand, and his crutch in the other, and when arriving at the place, threw into the lighter, empty scale, the sword of his youth, and swore that, in the hands of the valiant, it was of more weight than all the gold of Europe. A spectacle so sublime penetrated each Roman bosom; flushed with such patriotic devotion, every citizen and soldier flew to their sabres, and with the fury of desperation fell on their Gothic besiegers with vengeance and death, and ceased not their havoc until every barbarian had been driven from the remotest confines of their territory.

Honorable gentlemen had dwelt with peculiar delight upon individual cases of defalcations and failures. The illiberality and injustice of attaching them to the Administration, had been most triumphantly responded to by the honorable delegate from Florida, (Mr. DOWNING.) It was as unjust as it was impracticable, to attempt to hold the Administration responsible for every individual failure or defalcation. The Government, from the very nature of things, was compelled to trust to its officers; and whether they proved delinquent or cowardly, the fault could not properly attach to the Government.

But it had been tauntingly asked, and he thought, too, with rather an air of triumph, by both the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BIDDLE,) and the honorable gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. EVERETT,) why should this war be carried on? Mr. B. would answer, for every reason of sacred honor, necessity, and self-protection above all. Sir, said he, with what grace, with what policy, could we now withdraw our army from Florida? What are our obligations to protect the exposed inhabitants of that Territory? Surely all that is sacred, and is calculated to influence the action of men or nations, should prompt us to a speedy and determined resolution not only to defend, but rescue that Territory at every hazard, and at any price, from the blood-stained hands of these unrelenting savages. Gentlemen surely could not be in earnest to talk of peace, until these bloody, perfidious, treacherous devils were whipped into measures. Do they not know that a failure in punishing and humbling these Seminoles, however fierce they may be, or at whatever price, whether of blood or treasure, would multiply, to an unfortunate number, the Indian wars on our south and southwestern frontiers?

Sir, it would be only holding out to them an additional price to engage in them. Can any gentleman who thus contends, not foresee that such a course would be pregnant with the most disastrous events that have ever befallen this nation? Would not every tribe, however diminutive and contemptible we might heretofore have viewed them, be induced to follow the example of the Seminoles, and wage war immediately on our defenceless frontiers for tribute.

Let gentlemen pause and reflect well before they give utterance to such an idea. Let them hasten to review the false position that they are about to occupy. Let them for a moment cease their party strife, and devote but a single glance on the interest of their mother country, on which they were about to inflict this parricidal wound. Sir, the blindness of party prejudice is no apology for the sacrifice of the public good. Wounds inflicted by party rancor on a suffering country, can never be sanctioned by the voice of a disinterested patriotism. The best interests of our country, by the adoption of such a course, would not only be sacrificed, but the most indelible stain inflicted on our national honor. The very proposition, to him, was humiliating indeed, and well calculated to wound the feelings of every high-minded American. It was a proposition to desert our own soil, and surrender it up to the Seminoles—a pitiful, contemptible band of savages; leaving the whole settlement of Florida exposed to the mercy of the savages; and when had they shown mercy to a white man? The whole scheme of the opposition to the appropriation for the prosecution of that war, was fraught with the most serious and alarming mischiefs, in whatever light we might be disposed to view it.

Sir, one gentleman had gone so far as to recommend an appropriation of some three or four millions of dollars to give them to leave off fighting, and to move away, thus paying them a tribute by a most disgraceful purchase of a peace; a proposition so monstrous, that every true American should revolt at it, as a foul stigma thrown at his country's honor. From what party, he would ask, had such sentiments been avowed there? Thanks to his God, it had come not from any member of the Democratic party, with whom he acted on that floor; and he should feel humbled, if not degraded and disgraced—yes, "disgraced," (something to which, presently, he would reply,) had any member of a party to which he belonged held forth such language in the councils of the nation? What, sir, pay tribute for peace? When was such a sentiment avowed here; and from whence had it come? Had gentlemen forgotten the language that had been held and consecrated by the gallant, the wise, and the brave, almost of every nation that could boast of its independence? Had they forgotten the moral of the single expression, "Millions for defence, but not one cent for tribute?" He would recommend, with profound deference, its moral to the consideration and solution of certain honorable gentlemen of that House. Such an adage could never lose its weight with an astute, brave people, until their entire sense of self-respect and sagacity were obliterated by the blindness of party rancor. Such sentiments, recommendatory of the payment of tribute, or of the purchase of peace, could not but be branded with reprobation by the brave, patriotic people of all America. He believed that they would put their mark on them at once, when and wherever they were expressed, unless by bribery and corruption they were willing to sell their patriotism to a moneyed monster, that was alike indifferent to honor, patriotism, and to liberty.

Much had been said about the disgrace of the country, in relation to the conduct of the Government towards the Indians, and other foreign nations. Upon that subject, there was a wide difference of opinion between himself and the honorable members who had preceded him on that occasion. He hoped never to live to witness the disgrace of his country, and should always be found contributing his humble mite to rescue it from so foul a calamity; and if perchance such a thing should ever happen, he should be exceedingly reluctant to publish it, and hold it up in all its infamy to the gaze and sneers of the world. Much more reluctant would he ever be to pronounce that disgrace, until it had been most clearly and indubitably established upon his country; and to be constantly doing so on this floor, on every occasion, he feared might subject him, but too justly, to the suspicion of sensible men, that he desired to effect the very object, if not bent upon it, that he professed to proclaim to the world with reprobation. A thing which he hoped no man on that floor or off of it, was so debased and degraded as to do, that had one drop of American blood in his veins. Nor would he ever by party spirit, or vindictive recklessness, suffer a suspicion so foul to rest upon his conduct and motives there. No, sir, (said Mr. B.) no party malice, nor disappointment of political promotion, shall ever make me so far forget what is due to my country as an American and a citizen, over whom she has extended her broad banner of protection. He had said that he differed widely in relation to the disgrace of the country. It had long been his settled and deliberate opinion, that if the country had been at all disgraced, it had been done there, and by gentlemen who held seats on that floor. Did not the very course that had been pursued by honorable gentlemen on that floor, lead to the accomplishment of the very thing they professed to deprecate? Were not the tirades and bitter denunciations of the Government in the most indecent and ruthless style, which were daily witnessed there, calculated to bring about the very disgrace which gentlemen seemed so much to dread? To him nothing appeared more apparent. But again, as to its effects. Could a more suicidal course be pursued, or one more destructive to the best interests of the country? Was no such indiscriminate and unqualified censure as was witnessed upon almost every subject here, particularly calculated to affect our favorable negotiations with foreign powers, when they heard and saw that every step that the Government was about to take, and demand that it made, was denounced by a large party in its own country? What had the administration of the Government done in the last six or eight years that had not been denounced by that party in advance? Is such a course here not well calculated to increase the demands of other nations on our own, and make them more reluctant to yield to those that our people may have against them? The affirmation of these interrogatories were too palpable to require demonstration, and none would deny them, whose eyes were not seared by the vindictiveness of party influence.

We were now engaged in a bloody war with a tribe of savages. Was not the course pursued here in relation to that war well calculated to protract it? Were not the eulogies pronounced on their warriors here, and sympathies expressed, well calculated to exalt them in their own estimation, and make them more repugnant to peace, while they were winning such "golden opinions" even from an enemy? Are they not daily justified here for murdering our people, pillaging our towns, and laying waste the finest portions of the frontiers of Florida? Sir, when quelled and subdued, can any thing be better calculated to instigate them to a recommencement and renewal of these bloody scenes, or more eminently calculated to render them discontented? He would entreat gentlemen to pause and reflect a little more upon the consequences of their mad, indiscreet, and destructive course here. He hoped there were none so base as to be willing to inflict so deadly a wound on their country, to affect a party that differed with them often merely in opinion. It was such a course, in his humble judgment, that was well calculated to bring down that disgrace on the country which gentlemen seemed so solicitous in promulgating to the world, had already been effected.

Much had been said about the failure of the Florida campaigns, which no doubt had been owing to a combination of causes, which had been triumphantly replied to by the honorable delegate from Florida in a most eloquent manner. He had shown the few short months which it was necessary for our armies to operate in, and that we, in that short time, had not only to whip the Indians, but that we had to run them down, and hunt them up, amid the most impenetrable forests, everglades, morasses, and savannas; through which it was almost impossible for any living animal to pass. It was entirely unlike meeting an enemy in an open field, and deciding the contest by a single battle; and that such an enemy could be overcome only by our perseverance and enduring much. At the commencement of that war, there was not a general or soldier that knew any thing of the true geography of that country, which had no doubt greatly retarded its progress, and presented one of the greatest impediments to our army; and amid all these embarrassing circumstances, the gentleman from Pennsylvania could see no excuse for the protraction of this war, nor would he vote a dollar to carry it on, until he could see the evidence of its necessity. That honorable gentleman's seeing, had put him in mind of the old adage of the horse's drinking: "A boy might lead a horse to water, but it would take a hundred men to make him drink."

Now, both the Secretary of War and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, had presented the evidence to the honorable gentleman, of the necessity of that appropriation, but he (Mr. B.) poubted exceedingly, whether the two hundred and forty-two members of that House could make him see it. Sir, he said, there is another adage equally applicable to the honorable gentleman's case, and which he knew the honorable gentleman anticipated. "None was so blind, as he that would not see." Here he would leave the gentleman to stand alone, in the glory of his own vote, against the appropriation to defend his country from the barbarity of a most fierce and savage foe.

An allusion had been made to the manner in which this country had treated the Indians as a conquered race. The policy of this Administration had been identically that which had been pursued by former Administrations, and which had been with the approbation of an overwhelming majority of the American people. He denied the charge of this Government ever having acted with cruelty or injustice towards the Indians as a conquered people. The earliest histories of the world furnish abundant instances of one nation conquering another. It was the triumph of civilization over savage barbarism, and he would there challenge gentlemen, yes even the honorable gentleman from Vermont (Mr. EVERETT,) with all his characteristic sympathies for the tawny race, to point to a single instance where a conquered nation had been treated with more justice and humanity, than the Indians in North America had been, and particularly by this Government.

He stood there ever ready to defend with his feeble abilities, not only his country and its democratic institutions; but particularly the humane and politic course which it had pursued throughout with the different Indian tribes of this country.

The patience and lenity with which they had ever been treated by this Government, stood without a parallel in the history of the conquest of nations; and it was with sore regret that he witnessed there, so often, his country and his Government arraigned for its cruelty, injustice, and perfidy; towards not only the savages, but in relation to its conduct with almost every other nation with which it had had any kind of transaction.

Sir, said he, this presents to my mind an awful and ominous foreboding; one upon which the heart of the patriot sickened to reflect. He held in his hand a paper which he would exhibit for the information of that House and the country at large, and which contained in it a volume of comment. It went to show the proneness of a certain party who called themselves Whigs—(true, there were some honorable exceptions)—to be found always in opposition to their country in times of war and peril, and an instinctive opposition to every Democratic popular administration of this Government.

1st. He would begin with the second war in 1812, with Great Britain. Never was an administration more violently denounced than was the truly Democratic administration of Mr. Madison. Every measure, nearly, then, as now, that had any relation to the prosecution of that war, was denounced in most unmeasured terms; and every officer, from the President down, was denounced, either for his ignorance or corruption. These enemies of the Democracy then, as now, failed to convince the people that their Government was either so ignorant or corrupt.

2d. When, but a few years since, our foreign relations were interrupted with France, and a war was threatened us with that powerful nation, where did you, sir, find the energies of that same party, who had just assumed the name of Whig, directed? Who that were here then, that are here now, have forgotten the bitter denunciations thundered forth in this hall against our then President and his Democratic Administration, which they placed in the wrong in every particular? Sir, these bitter sounds of condemnation have scarcely yet ceased to re-echo in the crevices of your Capitol; and, sir, from what party came they? Not from that old Democratic Republican party, that has stood by and sustained this country in every emergency. At that very time, when an honorable Senator of that party was on his feet, pouring his vials of wrath on the head of General Jackson for his weak and insulting conduct to Louis Philippe, and laboring to place every act of that illustrious man in the wrong, a messenger arrived in the Senate chamber to announce the news that Louis Philippe was satisfied with the conduct of the American President, and that the claims of our people on that Government would be promptly met and paid.

3d. The next war which threatened this nation, has been with Mexico. Where, again, have you found the energies of that party directed? In favor of their country? No, sir: no. Already has our Government been denounced in advance, both on this floor and in another part of this capitol, for its conduct towards Mexico, and in the presence of their Ministers and people here. And from what party does this denunciation come? Not, thank God, from the Democratic party; but it is levelled against them by the same party that has ever opposed and taken sides with every country to abuse them, and to depreciate our free, popular institutions in the eyes of the world.

4th. Our wars with the Indians. What party (from what motive he would not say) had espoused the cause of the savage against civilized man? Who had ever heard more bitter denunciations, and unmeasured censure, let loose upon any party, or any Administration, than had been for nearly two entire days reverberating in that hall against the Democratic party and its Republican Administration? Who had ever witnessed greater efforts there to degrade, by comparison, the prowess of our own arms with that of a base, perfidious, savage foe? Yes, sir; and in the presence of the chiefs of their kindred tribes, pæans of applause had been sung to the valiant Seminoles, while the deeds of our brave soldiers had been passed unheeded and forgotten.

5th. But a few days since, we received the most unwelcome news from our northwestern frontiers; and a prospect of war had there been enkindled with our old veteran and renowned enemy, Great Britain; and how had that news been received in that House? Had any man present forgotten? Was not our own Government immediately denounced? Was not an attempt immediately made on that floor to place her in the wrong? The sounds of the condemnation of this Government had hardly ceased to thrill through his ears. The most powerful eloquence was exhibited on the occasion, to which he had listened with the liveliest interest; and he regretted, painfully regretted, that it was not in defence of his Government, in which it was sometimes represented as endeavoring, through weakness and folly, to plunge this country into an unnecessary war with Great Britain, and then as crouching and cowardly cringing before her power.

Sir, by what party, he would again ask, had such a course been pursued here? Not by the Democratic party. They had been found where they had ever been, standing by, battling for, and defending the conduct of their own nation and people, while their opponents here were taking ground against their own Government, and its conduct on every occasion. Was there nothing in all this more than mere accident? Why should so many accidents happen with such uniformity? Gentlemen should pause and reflect, and consult their patriotism. "As much as they love Cæsar, they should love Rome more."

6th. Again, this Government was but yesterday involved in a war, yes a war, fierce and unrelenting, and decidedly one more dangerous to the liberties of the people of this country, than either that with the Indians, Great Britain, or Mexico, or all three combined. It was the more dangerous, because the attacks of the enemy were by stealth; it never showed itself in an open field of combat—it was wont to lay its insiduous seiges in the dark, and expected like the anaconda or boa constrictor, by softly coiling itself around the whole body politic as its victim, infusing its influence in every community, by its corruption and bribery, aiming to embrace in its immense folds our whole Republican empire, and with its universal gripe of death, paralyze the action of Government, and leave the last remnant of human liberty lying strangled and prostrated for ever by its fatal embrace. Sir, he would say, it was a war in no common-place word, with a more than monster—the United States Bank. [Here the chairman (Mr. CONNOR) interrupted Mr. B. and said that the Bank of the United States was not the subject before the House for discussion.]

Mr. B. thanked the chairman of the committee for the intimation that he was getting out of order, which he had been induced to do in pursuit of his game, and following the example of the gentleman to whom he was then replying, and he had made the allusion to the bank, and its war upon the country, merely as a particular example of the course that had been and was then pursued by the opposite party, who had chosen to denominate themselves Whigs, and to show most clearly their consistency in being always found on that side that had warred most valiantly against their own Government, and the dearest liberties and rights of a free people; but upon that subject, as he had been interrupted for the present, he would forbear further to speak.

7th The Abolitionists were now making war upon the country, and by their unhallowed movements are threatening almost an immediate dissolution of the Union, which might end perhaps in a most foul and bloody revolution. One gentleman had said that the Abolitionists were divided amongst the Democrats and the Whig parties. This he denied, and had evidence to show. [Here the Chair again interrupted Mr. B. and said that he had stopped the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the discussion of abolition, and it was out of order to discuss it then.]

Mr. B. said he would bow with great deference to the decision of the honorable Chairman, and begged pardon if he had followed those who had preceded him in that debate until he had gotten out of order; but that it was impossible to reply to remarks made by honorable gentlemen out of order, without getting out of order himself. He hoped he was the last man in that House, or out of it, that would, knowingly, infract any rule of that House. He was only going on to show, and to prove, beyond the power of contradiction, that that gentleman and his party were identified with the Abolitionists, and that they were, wherever they existed, making war against the Democracy, in conjunction with the Whig party, and that the triumph of the one was the triumph of the other; and this, he would show, was particularly and emphatically the case to the North and to the West; but, as he had been cut off in his remarks upon that subject by the interference of the Chairman, he would let it pass for the present.

Mr. B. said he hoped he had now shown successively that, in seven most prominent instances, which would stand conspicuous in the future pages of the history of our country, that party so violently opposed to the Democracy of the country had been both consistent and persevering in their opposition to their Government, whenever it was found that peril and danger had threatened her, even amid the calamities of war. He was not prepared to say that those who had, or who did at this time, administer this Government, were the ablest that had ever graced their stations: by no means; but he would make bold to say, at least, of them, that the President, the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, of the Department of War, the Navy, and Postmaster General, and Attorney General, were all and each of them men of more than ordinary abilities, and of respectable talents, and who had often, while members of this and the opposite body, proved equal, when thrown in contact, in every respect, to the leaders of the Opposition; nor had he as yet ever heard of a dishonest or dishonorable act committed by a single member of the Cabinet. If, then, such were the facts, which he presumed none there had the boldness to deny, could it be otherwise than most strange and incomparably marvellous that these men, and every predecessor of their party, should, in every instance, as above alluded to, be found in the wrong, and sacrificing their country's best and dearest interests? Would it not be rational to suppose that, by accident merely, they might, in some one instance, on those important occasions, have been found in the right by the immaculate spirits of the Opposition? —"for a fool sometimes is right by accident, and the wicked man sometimes doeth a good deed." What an unfortunate party! What an unfortunate Government is that which has never been in the right, even by accident, but ever cruel, ever unjust and wicked; always weak, in the wrong, and corrupt. So say the enemies of this Administration, and so speak the Whig party of their Government, whenever peril and danger stare her mostly in the face. Now, Mr. Chairman, in all good conscience, do they not attempt to prove too much? I have shown that the fool is sometimes right, if by accident, and that the wicked sometimes do a good act; but this Republican Administration, and the preceding ones, under our Republican Democratic Presidents, selected for their wisdom and integrity by the people themselves, being more unfortunate than the history of the world or the wisdom of man can account for, have scarcely in a single instance been found to commit a single good or wise act in the sight of their opponents. Sir, I say this proves too much, and shows the entire fallacy of the whole foundation of this stupendous superstructure of Whigish opposition. If the Republican Administrations have always been in the wrong, ignorant and corrupt, why has this mighty nation continued so long to prosper and flourish, with strides more rapid and gigantic than has hitherto been known to the history of man; under the especial auspices, too, of these weak, corrupt, degraded Democratic Republican Presidents and their administrations. Sir, if the reverse of this be correct, and their course correct, then the Whigs and the Aristocracy are right; but the fact that this Government does continue yet to exist, free, untrammelled, and secure in its independence, realizing a prosperity hitherto unknown to the world, affords the most conclusive evidence of the falsification of our enemies, whether at home or abroad, and stamps the brand of falsehood upon the thousand charges against the competence and virtue of our Democratic Republican Administration and its officers, emanating so often from the foul and corrupting source of party malignancy and disappointed ambition. Yes, sir, how could the Democratic Administrations have thus existed so long, if one hundredth, one thousandth part of the charges of Federalism, Aristocracy, and Whigery, had been true. Thus he had shown that the Opposition had attempted to prove too much; as, if all they had attempted to prove was true, they had proved an impossibility, and the utter impracticability of the existence of this Government.

He thought he had shown how wanton and unauthorized were many of the charges against this Administration and its preceding one, and how utterly reckless had been the course of many of those opposed to it, not only in the present, but in divers other instances. Mr. B. said he had not been forced to speak thus plainly, but that a crisis had arrived, when every man should speak out, and the people of the country should hear the truth, and the whole truth, in relation to the opposition that was carrying on against themselves and their country. It was only necessary for them to know the facts and the real truth in relation to the administration of the Government, and each party would receive their due reward at their corrective hands. He had now concluded the most that he had to say upon the subject then before the committee. He then only had to entreat the very honorable gentlemen who had made such opposition to the measure before the House and called upon the friends of the Administration to come up and defend its acts, to stand firm in their own opposition to those measures, and to show their opposition, and test their sincerity, by recording their names against the passage of the bill then the subject of discussion, and not to continue that lowest of practices which had been pursued so often there, of opposing for days, and weeks measures of the Administration, and when the vote was about to be taken, to abandon their seats, or refuse to vote against measures that they had so long and bitterly denounced and contemned; a practice that had gained ground by its often repetition in that House for the last three or four years, and one which could not be tolerated by either the reason or good sense of the intelligent people of this country. It was due to the parties which composed that House; it was due to the people and the nation at large, that the yeas and nays should be taken on that bill so soon as it got into the House, that the people might see abroad who were willing to record their names, and who they were that had opposed in this manner nearly every measure of the Government. He called upon the Democratic members of the House, particularly, who he confessed heretofore had been but too backward in asserting the rights of the people in that body. He hoped the yeas and nays would be moved for as soon as the bill reached that House. It was all that he asked that each member should be made to endorse his vote upon that subject, and upon every other where a difference of opinion might exist between the two contending parties there. He would not trespass longer upon the patient attention of the House, which he had already intruded on much longer than he had contemplated when he rose, and thanked it unfeignedly for its indulgence.

NOTE.—The paper to which allusion was made in the above remarks as containing evidence to establish the identity of the Abolitionists with the Whig party is the following account of the proceedings of the Abolition Society in the State of New York, and the course pursued towards them by the Whig party there, the publication of which had been anticipated by the Globe, which, nevertheless, is not deemed improper to annex to the above remarks, as a more clear illustration of the views, and demonstration of the facts, set forth in the remarks to which the attention of the whole Democracy, and particulary that composed of the people of the South, is most respectfully invited, as taken from the Emancipator, one of the particular organs of the Abolition Society. The proceeding took place a little before the New York elections last fall, and are as follows:

"ROME, October 16, 1837.

"DEAR SIR: Having learned that your political friends have done you the honor to place your name before the electors of the county of Oneida, as a candidate for the office of ——, and there being, as is believed, near two thousand electors in this county who have espoused the great and eternal principles of the Declaration of our Independence, by which it is asserted that all men are created free and equal, with certain inalienable rights, amongst which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and believing that these rights are violated in the case of the American slave, and that the free colored people of this State do not possess those rights to which they are entitled, upon every principle of eternal and equal justice: The object, therefore, of this communication, is to learn from you whether you can answer, and how, the following questions, which are to be put to the various candidates who are nominated for an election to that office. Upon the answers which you may return to the seven questions herewith propounded, or your refusal to answer the same, will depend whether you can receive the votes of the gentlemen called Abolitionists or not, as is believed.

"THE QUESTIONS.

1. "Do you believe that petitions to Congress on slavery and the slave trade ought to be received, read, and respectfully considered by the Representatives of the people?

2. "Are you opposed to the annexation of Texas to the United States?

3. "Are you in favor of the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia?

4. "Are you in favor of Congress exercising all the constitutional power it possesses, to abolish the internal slave trade between the States, and in the Territories where slavery exists?

5. "Are you in favor of extending a jury trial to all persons in this State before they shall be deprived of liberty, whether those persons be fugitive slaves or others?

6. "Are you in favor of extending the elective franchise to the colored man the same as to the white?

7. "Are you in favor of the repeal of all laws in this State which make a distinction among its inhabitants on account of color?"

The answers of candidates, or their refusal to answer, will be distributed in printed handbills throughout the county, previous to the election. As the time to the election is now so short, you will not take it unkind in saying an answer is most respectfully requested to be returned to the subscriber at Rome, within three days from the time of the delivery of this communication to you, or it will be considered as a refusal to answer. The request of this letter proceeds upon this great principle, that the freemen of this country are entitled to know what the opinions of gentlemen are who are candidates for their suffrages, before they are clothed with that important trust.

With sentiments of respect,

I am yours, &c.

A. BLAIR,

President Oneida county, Anti-Slavery Society.

N. B. The above communication is made in pursuance of a general principle adopted by the New York State Anti-Slavery Society.

Here the remarks are adopted of another commentator, as illustrative of the views and objects of the parties:

Here there was an offer, "by authority," of the votes of "2,000 electors" to such candidates as would answer the questions, or who, in other words, would declare themselves to be Abolitionists.

It should here be remarked that the officers to be chosen in the county were a sheriff, clerk, and four members of Assembly; and that there were three distinct and full nominations made of candidates for these offices, viz: one Van Buren, one Conservative, and one called Whig. Of the Van Buren candidates, but one made any answer to the questions; of the Conservative none, of the Whig all; and the following were their answers, as published by order of the Executive Committee of the Oneida county Anti-slavery Society:

1. LYMAN CURTISS, esq. candidate for Sheriff, would have had no objection to give an explict affirmative answer to several of the questions, but from the impression that an appeal had been had been made to his hopes and fears. He did not wish to be subjected to the imputation of interested motives. Several of the questions were comparatively new, and he had not yet formed a definite opinion upon them. He could not, however, with truth, give a negative to either of them. He regarded slavery as an enormous evil, a foul stigma upon us as a nation, and would sincerely rejoice at the success of any constitutional measures to free ourselves from it, and elevate the colored man to his natural station and rights among his fellow men. He considers that "the right of free discussion and petition should never be infringed, but be preserved inviolate."

2. Hon. JAMES DEAN, candidate for County Clerk, says: "I have not the least difficulty in answering each and all the questions affirmatively, except the third. That, too, as it stands, as a general naked proposition, not connected with any reference or allusion to the mode of emancipation, I answer in the same manner." Mr. Dean states, that his "information in respect to the power of Congress in this respect is so unsatisfactory to [himself] that he is not prepared to decide," in respect to that mode of emancipation; but he does desire "that Congress may exercise all the constitutional power it possesses, and that, too, at the earliest suitable opportunity, to put an end to slavery in the District of Columbia."

3. JAMES S. STRANAHAN, esq. candidate for Assembly, says: "To the first five questions on your list, my answers are, Yes—to the last two, No."

4. HENRY HERSEY, Esq. a candidate for Assembly, responds to the first, second, and fifth questions in the affirmative. On the third, he believes Congress possesses power to abolish slavery in the Federal District, but doubts the expediency of its exercise at the present time. On the fourth he thinks "Congress should abolish slavery in the Territories belonging to the United States; but how far it would be wise, or is constitutional to act in relation to slavery or the slave trade in the States, is a question upon which he has doubts. On the sixth he says "I would make no distinction between persons on account of color, in allowing them the privilege of the elective franchise. But I think it may well be doubted whether it would be wise to extend the privilege of voting at our elections to all persons of color who have been long held in bondage, and consequently in ignorance, but who should come into our State to reside, as they would be almost entirely ignorant of our political institutions, and but poorly qualified to exercise the important right of suffrage." On the seventh he says: "I am not sure that I recollect all the laws of this State which make a distinction among its inhabitants on account of color. Some of them might be with propriety repealed, but there are others I think ought not to be. The law exempting colored persons from serving in the militia, I not think ought to be repealed, for I do not believe it would be beneficial to the militia system to require blacks to perform duty in our militia.

5. R. FULLER, Esq. candidate for Assembly, responds an affirmative answer to the 1st, 2d, 4th, 5th, 6th and 7th questions. To the 3d he says: "I consider the existence of slavery in the District of Columbia as a foul blot on the American character, and giving the lie to that often-reiterated boasting that the United States is a land of liberty."

6. FORTUNE C. WHITE, Esq. candidate for member of Assembly, answers the 1st, 2d, and 5th questions in the affirmative. To the 3d and 4th he says: "Yes, so far as the Constitution of the United States and of individual States will justify." To the 6th, "Yes, I prefer the old Constitution, which made no distinction on account of color, to the present one." To the 7th, "Yes, so far as they are opposed to the principles of equal rights."

The meeting in Windham county, Connecticut, held on the 9th of January, 1838, by the Abolitionists, to denounce the votes of our Democratic Republican brethren of the North, clearly establishes the identity of these two parties. As a part of the preamble and resolutions passed at that meeting, reprobating and denouncing General Holt, one of the Democratic Republican members from that State, for his vote on Mr. PATTON's resolution, so eminently calculated to save the Republic from disunion, and perhaps a most bloody revolution; the following extracts are taken from the ceedings:

At an adjourned meeting of the Windham County Anti-Slavery Society, held at Chaplin, Tuesday, January 9, 1838, the following resolutions were unanimously passed:

Whereas, the House of Representatives of the United States, by an unwarrantable assumption of power, contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, and in violation of the rights and liberties of the citizens of these United States, did, on the 21st of December, 1837, pass the following resolution:

"Resolved, That all petitions, memorials and papers touching the abolition of slavery, or the buying, selling or transferring of slaves in any State, District, or Territory of the United States, be laid upon the table without being debated, printed, read, or referred, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon."

And whereas, it appears that three of the delegates from this State, viz: Holt, Phelps, Whittlesey, with forty-eight others from the nominally free States, voted in the affirmative on the passage of said resolution.

Resolved, That our Representative in Congress from this District, Orrin Holt, by his vote in favor of the resolution above quoted, virtually denying us the right of petition, has misrepresented his constituents and proved recreant to the trust reposed in him by those who gave him his seat in Congress.

In addition to this, and a number of other instances of the kind, it is a fact too notorious to be denied, that the Abolitionists have constantly kept up a regular fire and denunciation against the course of our Republican friends here from that quarter, who have boldly stepped forward in defence of the Constitution and the Union, while plaudits of the highest approbation are daily awarded the Whig party, in and out of Congress, by those reckless disturbers of the peace and harmony of our Government.

REMARKS OF MR. CILLEY,
OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, Jan. 23, 1838, in Committee of the Whole, on the bill to make a special appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities.

Mr. WISE commenced the debate, and led off in opposition to the bill, and in a general attack of the Administration. On Mr. WISE resuming his seat, Mr. CILLEY obtained the floor, but yielded it to Mr. DOWNING, the Delegate from Florida, who supported the bill, and ably defended the policy and measures of the Administration, so far as related to the Florida war. Mr. WISE replied to Mr. DOWNING, and renewed his opposition.

Mr. CILLEY then followed and said: I rise, sir, to say but a few words upon the bill now before us; but few will be necessary after the eloquent and just remarks which have fallen from the talented Delegate from Florida. I listened to him with pleasure, while he gave us, from his own personal knowledge, the facts of the case, and the real condition of things as they exist at the seat of the war. He has laid bare the origin of hostilities, which were commenced by the Seminoles without any just provocation on our part, and which have been prosecuted by them in a series of the most cold-blooded murders and butcheries of the whole white population within their reach. So far as the Administration is concerned in this war, he (Mr. DOWNING) has set the whole matter right before the country.

But, sir, I feel impelled to say something when I hear views and sentiments put forth here, and calculated to have effect abroad, the whole drift of which is to hold up my own countrymen in the light of savages, while hostile Indians are extolled as patriots, statesmen, and heroes. Were I a stranger to the history of my own race, and to Indian character, and now, from the representations of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WISE) for the first time, forming my notion of the two people, I might be persuaded to believe that all the virtues which have heretofore adorned civilized man, are now possessed by the Cherokee race, while all that is perfidious, ferocious, and savage, have become concentrated in the descendants of the fairer European. What, sir, do we hear these things said in an American Congress? Are they so? Have we, indeed, changed places? Are we not the true sons of our sires? Is not the Indian still true to the blood of his race?

But the gentleman appeals to the committee, and in tones of sympathetic feeling asks, what is to become of the "poor Indians?" I cannot answer that: God, in his providence, only knows. But, sir, when war rages between us and them, commenced on their part without just cause, and waged in the most relentless mode known to the annals of Indian warfare; when our own defenceless citizens are being slaughtered by them; when your armies are there, in a sickly clime, in pursuit of the lurking Seminole, and struggling with the peculiar natural difficulties of the swamps and hammocks of Florida, which must be encountered and overcome before a successful blow can be struck, and the enemy subdued, if the course of the gentleman from Virginia is to be pursued, and you now stop all supplies, I ask, in the name of patriotism and real humanity, what is to become of our own brethren, the poor whites? It is proposed by the bill before us to provide pay and subsistence for our own troops. You have called them into this service, a field full of labor and peril, but of too little honor, I admit. Yes, sir, however necessary the duty, and however faithfully it be performed, there are no laurels to be won, as when contending in open plains with manly foes. The funds heretofore provided are exhausted; our troops are there, and now is the very season most favorable for their operations, to subjugate the hostile Seminole, and restore peace and quiet to our borders.

But the gentleman would have us halt all at once, cut off all further supplies, and even refuse to pay those who have already rendered service upon the call of the lawful authorities of the country. And for what? Is it to benefit the Indian, or to injure the Administration? Sir, my blood thrills in my veins to hear the conduct of faithless and murderous Indians lauded to the skies, and our sympathies invoked in their behalf, while in the same breath our own Government and its most distinguished citizens are traduced and vilified to the lowest degree. To-day Oceola and the Chief Magistrate of this Union have been lugged together by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) into this debate; and while to the former he yields the homage of his highest respect and admiration, he bestows upon the latter, in comparison with him, the sneer of contempt and ridicule. It was but the other day, in his place here, the same gentleman took occasion to institute a comparison between another favorite Indian brave of his, John Ross, and our distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Forsyth, in which the Cherokee, in his estimation, had the best of it in every point of view.

Is it possible, sir, that partisan feeling and political hostility will force gentlemen such lengths? Will they, in outrage to common sense, smother patriotism, and forget the honor of their country and its common good, in their hasty zeal to cast odium upon their opponents, and to put down an Administration of the people's choice? Will they do violence to the known history and character of races, and subvert all the policy of our people and Government since the first settlement by the whites on this great continent? And for what? To find something to the prejudice of a Democratic Administration, and to induce the people to displace it, and to substitute one based on their new notions. Such a course seems almost incredible; yet our history is not wanting in a case somewhat parallel. Let gentlemen recur to it as illustrating the principles they are becoming identified with, and as a warning where it may lead them. How was it with the leaders of a certain party in a powerful, and, so far as the main body of the people were concerned, I believe patriotic, State of this Union, (Massachusetts,) during the late war with Great Britain, when, encompassed by hostile fleets and armies, our country was pressed hard in battle?

Did not their political opposition to the then existing Democratic Administration, though seeking to veil itself then, as now, under the alleged injustice of the war, and the morality and religion of a Christian community, push them on to enactment, in the higher branch of her State Legislature, of a solemn decree that "it was unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice at the victories" of our brave countrymen, and were then, as now, the leaders of that party opposed to supplies. But, sir, I will do justice to the main body of the people of that State. They were, sir, I fully believe, then, as now, in heart truly patriotic; for, sir, they rested not, much as they admired their splendid and gifted leaders, to whose bitter denunciations of Democratic men and measures they had lent too willing an ear—they rested not until their patriotic sentiments prevailed in that branch where the decree had been registered, and it was expunged from their records. I allude to this in no spirit of unkindness—it is a part of the history of our country, and marks the conduct, if not the principles, of the leaders of a great party contending for power.

As to the Indian character, who is ignorant of it? Who has not heard it described by our fathers, who had to do with them? Who has not read it on every page of our country's history? Their leading traits, their master passions, stand out in bold relief. We must take things as they are. We are a practical people. Our policy adapts itself to facts and circumstances as they are found to exist. What are these traits? In peace, when not drawn out by the excitement of the chase and the slaughter of game, the Indian leads a life of listless indolence, abhorring the drudgery of manual labor, and knowing not the meaning of the word industry. War, a war of extermination, which calls into the most excited action all the baser passions of his nature, seems the element of his keenest enjoyment and glory. His whole soul is then roused into fierce activity. No mercy restrains him. His uniform rule of warfare is to spare neither age, sex, or condition, and to keep no faith with his enemy.

How was it, sir, when hostilities broke out between such a race and our early settlers in New England? No matter how it began: there might be individuals in the wrong on either part. What was done by our fathers, when they found their cattle killed or driven off, their wives and children savagely slaughtered, and their own dwellings razed to the ground by fire? They hunted them to their lodges in the deep wilderness, and pursued them with fire and sword, even to extermination. What would you have had them done? What must we have done, had we been in their places? When in conflict, one or the other race must give place. Our fathers did not choose to. Do we taunt them for it? Does our sense of justice revolt at their choice? Let us in fancy change places with them: enter into their labors, their perils and privations, and suffer what they suffered, and endure what they endured, year in and year out, and then let us see in whose behalf sympathetic appeals are made.

The case of our frontier settlers now, when an Indian war breaks upon them, is similar to the ir then. But this sort of sympathy expressed by the gentleman from Virginia for the tawny red skin, strikes me as too near akin to that set up in some other quarter for a race of still deeper dye. It costs nothing to work up and express a sympathy of this sort; but what particular good is it intended to effect? I might, perhaps, wish, for the sake of suffering humanity, that we had the power and wisdom to remedy "all the ills which flesh is heir to," and that we might not only improve the condition, intellectual, moral, and political, of every one who is not already perfect in all these particulars, but also go a step further, and change the color of the dark races in our country, so that the sympathy felt by some, and the disgust by others, on that account, might give us no trouble hereafter.

The gentleman dwells on the petty details of the war—our reverses, their good fortune, and the few braves that have yet been taken or killed in battle, but mostly on the expenses already incurred. But, I ask, is this not a war, and began, too, by them, and in defiance, too, of their own bona fide treaty, sanctioned by them, and all the branches of this Government, without a dissenting voice? To us, here, sir, as the Representatives of the American people, this is the great and momentous question: Is there a war? For, sir, in the language of patriotism, our country is our common mother; and when and while blows are aimed at her, when she is attacked and bleeding from the wounds of an enemy, who of her sons will not fly to her defence, and to the succor of those who are defending her, and that, too, without stopping to count the exact cost, or learn the precise origin of the quarrel? Let not our country suffer. End the war first: then if there was any fault any where, point it out and apply the proper remedy. But can gentlemen in this war find a single fault at the door of the Administration? The Delegate from Florida set the whole matter right, and says he is ready to defend it, on that score, against the world.

The expenses, I admit, are great, and the accounting officers are bound to scrutinize all this matter, and to place the result before us. If our money has been corruptly used or squandered by any officer, let him, at the proper time, and in a proper mode, be tried and punished. All wars are excessively expensive, in both treasures and life.

In the expenses of this Florida war, we must take into consideration the nature of the service, the enemy, the country, the want of provisions and supplies there, and the climate, which suspends all operations during the summer and fall months; and, more than all, the peculiar form of our Government, which, popular and free, is wholly averse to large standing armies; so that when war, the greatest of national calamities, does chance to us, even from the insignificant foe, it finds us almost wholly unprepared, and from necessity compelled to incur extraordinary expense to but little purpose at first. But in a short time the patriotism of the mass of the people, who are attached the more strongly to their Government, as its yoke is easy and its burden light, rallies to the rescue, and overcomes all obstacles. But what, I ask, is the expense of a few millions more or less in getting ready and in making soldiers of citizens, compared with that incurred under other forms of Government in maintaining, in the heart of the country, in times of peace, large standing armies, corrupting the morals of the people, and eating out their substance like a cancer?

The humane policy, also, of our Government, in its steady efforts to preserve the Indian race by removing them out of the limits of the States where the settlements of the whites have approached them on all sides, and to whose laws and usages the Indians cannot be made to submit, to fertile territories beyond the Mississippi, to be theirs exclusively, and in our efforts, too, to restrain different tribes from wars among themselves, has cost the Treasury millions upon millions. It may be a mistaken policy, but is believed, by good and wise men, to be the only one that can preserve the race.

The whole campaign of our commanding general, Jesup, in Florida, has been bitterly arraigned. I concede his humanity to the captives he had made, and his trust in their good faith, has cost us dear. I have often said, and now repeat, that had I been in command in that officer's place at Tampa Bay, and had got my hands upon the murderous Seminole chiefs and warriors, I would have shipped them all off, instanter, on board the vessels then in waiting, and not trusted one of them with an opportunity to escape again to their fastnesses among the swamps. But what is to become of the "poor Indians, if we do not permit them to keep possession of Florida?" asks the gentleman. If they do not lay aside hostilities, submit, and perform on their part a treaty which has already been complied with on our part, I repeat I cannot answer.

So long as they continue to war with us, and in their own peculiar mode, it will be still as it had been for centuries past: they will disappear before the onward progress of the more powerful whites, whose improvements cannot be stayed by any such obstacles. If they shall change their modes of feeling and acting, and become like our own race, tillers of the soil, and lovers of the arts and sciences, and in every respect good, industrious, and quiet citizens, then, indeed, would no one here or elsewhere be in danger of collision with them, or desire to molest them.

As to John Ross, who had so often been vauntingly introduced here and elsewhere as a proof and specimen of what civilization can do in improving the Indian race, I do not know him personally. Curiosity led me to inquire him out, and I was pointed to a white man. He may, by adoption or some mode, have become a chief among Indians; but he is not in blood, no one could mistake, who looks at him. Is this the kind of civilization and improvement of the race we hear so much about? Such men, or mixture of men, may get among the ignorant savages, and rise to great power and influence, and to the control of the affairs and money of the tribe; but in the end they will prove rather a curse than a blessing to the real Indians. Let us not, upon false data, lead ourselves or others into false positions and false sympathies. The ideal must give place to the reality. We must act upon facts, with the eternal truths of nature before our eyes. Speculate and sympathise as you will, the white man will still be true to the inward laws and instincts of his race, and so will the red and the black.

I speak not of individuals, but of masses. I hope gentlemen, whose sensibilities are now so much enlisted in the conditions of the Seminoles and Cherokees, now in Florida and Georgia, will not forget how their own forefathers, whose memories I know they revere, under similar circumstances, in the early settlement of the country, and when they were a frontier people, how they dealt with similar enemies; and I entreat gentlemen, if they have not indeed forgotten these things, to tell me in whose behalf their true sympathy is enlisted? Does it not flow in the broad channel of the common weal of the greatest number of its own race, or does it seek out the narrower one of a wild and untameable race, wasting its influence, and accomplishing no great general results?

Our sense of justice has been appealed to. Let me ask those gentlemen who do this, if they are willing to yield up the fair fields and beautiful sites they now possess and enjoy, to the linea heirs and descendants of the lords of the forest, (if indeed, there be any left,) whom their fathers found there and dispossessed, without the fair consideration, which strict, abstract justice might require. If not, then I say, why cry out against thy white brethren? Were your property, and the lives of your families, exposed, as in this case, to the hostile incursions of Indians, and a war should break out, would you not be under the necessity of tracking them, as did your fathers in by-gone days, through the winter snows, to their wigwams among the hills, and subdue them, cost what it might.

Sir, how has this vast continent, but recently a wilderness, been reclaimed and settled, and filled with a free, hardy, and enterprising people? The two tides of population, the savage and the civilized, have here met. They abhor to mix: their pursuits run not together: the one must give room to the other—the fierce hunter and warrior of the wilderness, to the more gifted, but peace-loving artizan and cultivator of the soil. Would you stay the onward progress of our own race? or would you even attempt to reverse our positions? You could not, if you would. We must take things as they are; and before we so bitterly condemn others, let us reflect how we ourselves, under like circumstances, should probably feel and act.

I ask pardon of the committee for having said so much on this subject. I felt pained to hear in this place gentlemen make such severe, and, as I thought, unmerited denunciations, with an apparent view to some influence abroad, of the settled policy of our own Governmen and race ever since the earliest history of the whites on this continent, and rose to repel them. I commend gentlemen so eager and zealous to attack and put down the Administration, to a prudent husbandry of their resources; and if they expect to displace it on such grounds, I ask them on what principles the people of this country are to expect the new one to be based, if they ever get power to form one on their own notions, and to their own liking? However this may be, I trust there will be patriotic feeling enough in this body to pass this bill, providing for the payment and subsistence of our brave troops, now serving their country in the defence of our suffering frontier.

"RESURRECTION NOTES."

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
FEBRUARY 12, 1838.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred that part of the President's Message which relates to the issuing and re-issuing of the notes of the late Bank of the United States, by the bank recently chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, by and under the same name, have had the same under consideration, and present the following report:

By the act of Congress chartering the Bank of the United States, passed on the 10th of April, 1816, that institution was invested with all the usual privileges of banking corporations; and was especially authorized to issue its bills and notes, not less in amount than five dollars, in the ordinary form of bank notes, signed by its president and cashier. These bills and notes, when payable on demand, were made receivable in all payments to the United States. For the security of these and its other legal obligations, the capital stock was created, amounting to thirty-five millions of dollars. Twenty-eight millions of this were to be raised and paid by individuals, companies, or corporations. The remaining seven millions were paid in by the United States. The affairs of the corporation were to be managed by twenty-five directors, five of whom were to be appointed by the President of the United States. A committee of Congress was authorized to examine into the transactions of the bank; and legal proceedings were to be instituted by the Executive, whenever any of the provisions of the charter were violated. The United States were to receive, half-yearly, a portion of the profits of the institution, corresponding to the portion of the capital they subscribed.

It will thus be seen that, during the existence of the bank, and during the period when its bills and notes were issued under the charter, the United States were deriving a profit from its transactions; that their funds were pledged for the security of those who received and held its notes; and that they were invested (at least so far as the words of the law went) with some control over its management.

By the same law, all the banking powers of the corporation were limited to the 3d of March, 1836, after which day they entirely ceased; although it was authorized for two years subsequent thereto to use its corporate capacity "for the purpose of suits for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of its estate; but not for any other purpose, or in any other manner, whatsoever." The objects of this part of the law are too plain to be misunderstood. The intention of Congress was to preclude, after the 3d March, 1836, every banking transaction—the issue of bills, the discount of notes, the lending of money; in a word, the continuance of all transactions for the profit of the stockholders. Its object was to prevent the bank from incurring, after that day, any additional liability, by which the property either of the United States or individuals invested in the corporation might be directly or indirectly bound, and to require the bank fully to settle its accounts and dispose of its property, to redeem its obligations, pay its debts, and collect its assets before the 3d of March, 1838.

It appears that, on the 18th of February, 1836, the Legislature of Pennsylvania, by an act entitled "An act to repeal the State tax on real estate and personal property, and to continue and extend the improvements of the State by railroads and canals, and to charter a State bank, to be called the United States Bank," incorporated the existing stockholders of the Bank of the United States, (excepting the United States and the Treasurer of the United States) and such other persons as might become stockholders, according to the provisions of that act of the Legislature; previously requiring the same, however, to be accepted by the actual stockholders at a general meeting. On the 19th of February, 1836, a general meeting of these stockholders was held, without, however, any assent, representation, or authority on the part of the United States. At that meeting, resolutions were passed, accepting the charter from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and directing the president of the bank to make that acceptance known to the Governor of the State. At the same meeting, the stockholders thus assembled directed the president and directors of the bank chartered by Congress "to pay, transfer, and deliver to this new institution, all and singular the shares, parts, purparts, interest, and property whatsoever of the stockholders, so incorporated by the State of Pennsylvia, of and in the goods, chattels, moneys, effects, and estate, real and personal of the present Bank of the United States." Of this measure, no notice was given to the Government of the United States; no application was made to, or authority sought from, Congress, although it was notorious that a portion of the effects of the bank, in addition to the sum of seven millions of dollars, belonged exclusively to them; that they were entitled to one-seventh part of the effects to be collected and divided; and that they were liable, in the same proportion, for the proper settlement of the affairs and discharge of the obligations, which were thus summarily taken out of their hands, and placed beyond their control. Though, in words, the direction of these assembled stockholders to their president and directors was to transfer their own shares and parts of the effects, yet, as those effects had never been divided, as no proposition for their division had ever been made, as they consisted of the great and complicated mass of property belonging to such an institution, and, in the nature of things, incapable, without extreme difficulty, of division, it was in fact a sudden and summary transfer of the whole property and effects belonging to the people of the United States, and invested by them in that institution, under carefully devised guards and stipulations, to a State corporation, suddenly created, in whose transactions they had no participation.

As if to remove all doubt of this being the nature and intention of the transfer, the president and directors of the bank chartered by Congress proceeded, on the 2d of March, 1836, the very day before the charter expired, solemnly to resolve, that "all and singular the money, goods, chattels, rights, credits, and personal estate whatsoever owned by, or belonging to, or in the custody of this bank, wheresoever the same may be, together with all evidences and securities for the same, be, and the same hereby are, assigned, transferred, and conveyed to the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania," and they created that institution their trustee, to conduct and wind up the business of the bank.

Thus, in direct violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the act of Congress, which imposed upon the bank chartered by itself the duty of "settling and liquidating the affairs and accounts of the corporation," which had given it two years expressly for that purpose, and which had retained for Congress the power of examining, by its committees, the correctness of its proceedings, and controlling it, if necessary, by a summary judicial process; in violation of this provision, and in manifest infringement of the rights of the people of the United States, whose property was invested in the institution to a large amount, a portion of the stockholders, excluding the United States, giving them no notice, asking no authority from Congress, suddenly assuming with a high hand the management of the whole affair, undertake the solemn farce of passing resolutions to create themselves (incorporated, it is true, by another law, though not under another name) their own trustees; and, having so done, they take possession of ALL the property, and assume the settlement of all the affairs of the institution, relieved, as they suppose, from every responsibility and control to which Congress meant the bank should be subject in winding up its business.

On the 4th of March, 1836, when, in contemplation of the act of Congress, the Bank of the United States should have been commencing the settlement of its affairs, including the large interest of the Government, we find a portion of its stockholders who have cast off the rest, seizing and keeping possession of every particle of the joint property, and assuming the right to manage it, free from the obligations of the charter under which that property was collected, and from the control of those by whom that charter was granted and to whose constituents a very large portion of that property belongs.

It does not appear that, at the time of this transfer, by a portion of the stockholders, of the whole property of the bank to themselves, any inventory or statement of the effects and estate of the institution was made; and no steps whatever were taken for the regular "settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation," as the charter positively required. The whole business was mixed up with that of the new institution. Although the Secretary of the Treasury was desirous and endeavored to obtain a payment or dividend of the property proportionate to the shares belonging to the United States, he was unable to do so. Resort was, of necessity, had to an estimate of the value of the shares, founded on an examination of the general accounts of the old institution. There is, perhaps, no reason to doubt, on the whole, the correctness of this valuation; but it must be admitted that such was not "the settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation," stipulated for by Congress at the time it granted the charter, and which was frustrated by the summary and unauthorized conduct of the individual stockholders, in transferring to themselves all the property of the bank just before the charter expired; and from the time of such transfer, neither keeping its accounts or winding up any of its concerns.

Soon after the estimated valuation of the stock of the bank, thus made, the State institution and trustee came forward, and voluntarily offered to pay the same, by equal instalments, in September, 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840, with six per cent. interest from the time the charter expired. This offer the Secretary of the Treasury was directed, by a joint resolution of Congress, passed on the 3d March, 1837, to accept, taking obligations for its fulfilment; the first of which, it is understood, has been redeemed, and the amount paid into the Treasury.

Thus virtually terminated the affairs of the late Bank of the United States; in a manner very different from that settlement and liquidation which were a part of the obligations of its charter; in a manner very different from that in which the business of a great national institution should have been finally closed. It is true, the individual stockholders have become possessed, by a general sweep, of all the property of the bank; and the United States have exchanged their shares of stock and their claim to dividends for a liquidated sum, secured by the bonds of another corporation. But have these operations relieved either party from their obligations to the community? have they given to those possessed of the property a right to use it, in manifest contradiction to the charter by which it was created? have they given sanction, direct or indirect, to an employment of the corporate privilege and the corporate property, long after the charter has expired, for purposes not only unnecessary to the settlement of its affairs, but calculated to postpone and retard such a settlement? have they absolved Congress from the duty, solemnly imposed upon it, of "examining the proceedings" done under color of that charter? will they justify it in taking no measures to redeem and cancel the obligations of an institution it created? above all, do they furnish it with an excuse for suffering the name, credit, and apparent authority of the United States, to give value to obligations in which they have no longer an interest?

Of all the powers and privileges of banking institutions, that which most widely affects the whole community is the issue of bank notes; the authority by which they are issued, the purposes for which they may be used, the mode in which their ultimate solvency and payment are guaranteed, constitute their character, and give them a greater or less circulation. The notes of the late Bank of the United States were issued under the authority of Congress. They were made receivable from one end of the continent to the other, as equivalent to gold and silver, in the payment of the revenue. The whole community took them with confidence, because a large portion of the capital pledged for their redemption belonged to the United States; because the issue of them was limited to the duration of the charter; and because the conduct of those who issued and circulated them was placed immediately under the supervision of Congress. From these causes, the notes of the late Bank of the United States derived their extensive credit among the people; and this credit, thus derived, imposes upon Congress the corresponding obligation, to take care that no act of omission of theirs shall mislead the community, when these causes of peculiar credit to these notes have ceased to exist.

On the 3d of March, 1836, when the charter of the bank terminated, the bank notes which it had issued amounted to thirty-four millions four hundred and thirty-four thousand two hundred and seventy dollars and sixteen cents. On these it had on hand thirteen millions three hundred and twenty-four thousand nine hundred and seventeen dollars and ninety-three cents. These notes, thus on hand at the expiration of the charter, it was the obvious duty of the bank immediately to cancel; they were obligations originally issued under a charter which had expired; they had been returned into the bank; they formed no part of its property to be collected or divided. Yet on the 2d of April following, the State institution, in its first report to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, declared the amount of its notes issued to be thirty-six millions six hundred and twenty thousand four hundred and twenty dollars and sixteen cents; of which it had then on hand, notes of the Bank of the United States to the amount of sixteen millions seven hundred and ninety-four thousand seven huudred and thirteen dollars and seventy-one cents; thus showing that the directors of the bank chartered by Congress, in transferring "all their money, goods, and chattels" to their trustee, had delivered up the bank notes which ought to have been cancelled, and which were entirely unnecessary for winding up the concerns of the bank, or performing any of the trust duties undertaken by that trustee. The practice thus adopted, of keeping instead of cancelling the notes issued under the authority of the charter from Congress, after that charter had expired, was not confined to those thus improperly delivered by a part of the stockholders to themselves, under the name of a trustee. Nearly two years have since elapsed, and yet in the statement made by the bank to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, on the 5th January, 1838, is this item, "NOTES issued of the LATE BANK and branches ON HAND, $15,800,517 73." Thus when the two years in which the affairs of the bank were to have been settled are nearly expired, when the control (such as it is) that Congress may yet possess is almost at an end, about sixteen millions of dollars, in bank notes which bear the name of the United States, and were actually made under the authority of Congress, which, if put in circulation, will be naturally and reasonably considered by those who take them as guaranteed by Congress, are now in the exclusive possession of a banking institution which has the power to use them when and for what purposes it pleases.

Even if it could be said that these bank notes would not be used for purposes of circulation and currency; even if it were certain that these evidences of the liability of the United States would not be put forth after that liability was at an end; even if the trustee who has obtained possession of them had evinced a determination to cancel them, as the redeemed obligations of a concern which ought to be wound up without delay, still, it is a duty imposed upon Congress, who originally authorized their issue, to see that this is done; to enforce, by law, and not to leave to the discretion or honesty of any individual or corporation, that which the whole American people have a right to look for at their hands.

But is not that duty absolutely forced upon them, when those who have thus obtained possession of these uncancelled notes of an extinct corporation actually use them for purposes of circulation, and, in defiance of the charter, boldly issue them as a lawful currency and for their own individual profit? Yet not only is this the case. They claim the legitimate right so to use and issue them. The trustee who receives and accepts the property of the late bank, under the pledge to redeem its notes, debts, and obligations, unequivocally asserts the right, not merely to refuse to cancel the notes for the redemption of which funds have been conveyed, but actually to pay out these notes as other banks might do who received them in the ordinary transactions of trade. "The Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, has," in the deliberate language of its own directors, "done as other banks have done—paid out the notes of the Bank of the United States;" as if there was the slightest similarity between a bank which receives, by a general transfer, sixteen millions of dollars in bank notes that had been regularly issued and returned to the institution by which they were made, and those banks which receive the notes of one another in the ordinary course of commercial dealing, and pay them out in the same mode: as if there was the least resemblance between the reissue of bank notes by a trustee who had undertaken to redeem those notes, and had received a large and sufficient amount of funds for that object, and the bona fide payment of them by a bank, for the purpose of collecting their amount, and without any interest in them whatever, except as a common medium of exchange. Between such proceedings there is no similarity, nor can the one afford any justification to the other. But is not the course pursued by this institution, which has received these notes for the purpose of redeeming them, and now boldly reissues them, in all respects identical with that of a partner who, having funds of an expired partnership in his hands, for the purpose of settlement, should use and reissue, in violation of all faith, the notes or obligations of his confiding partner? Is it not similar to that of an executor, who voluntarily assumes the duty of winding up the estate of a deceased testator, and yet seizes upon the property confided to him in that trust, and applies it to his personal benefit, and puts into circulation, by himself and his agents, uncancelled notes found among the papers of the testator, which had been fully paid off and discharged?

Previously to the 1st of July, 1837, the monthly statements furnished to, and published by, the Auditor General of Pennsylvania, did not distinguish between the business of the State bank and that of its trustee; between the notes of the late and present bank, issued or in circulation. The information that should thus have been furnished cannot, therefore, be obtained for the long interval between the 3d of March, 1836, and the 1st of July, 1837. On the 1st July, 1837, however, the notes of the late bank, in circulation, were only $7,013,909 43, while on the 1st August, 1837, they amounted to $7,170,658 3ℭ; an excess of issue of the old notes over all that were paid in of upwards of $150,000 in a single month. Again, on the 2d October, 1837, the notes of the late bank in circulation are stated at $6,175,861 05, but on the 1st November following, at $6,522,839 40; which would show a re-issue of notes that ought to have been cancelled, amounting to upwards of $340,000 in less than a month.

Thus it appears, that although Congress expressly enacted, in granting the charter, that the banking privileges of the Bank of the United States should expire on the 3d of March, 1836, yet the most important of those privileges, so far as the community is concerned—the issue of bank notes, made under the provisions of the charter—has continued for twenty months after that period, and probably still continues; that although two years were allowed after the expiration of the charter, "for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of its estate, but not for any other purpose," yet now, when the two years are nearly at an end, there are in existence, and ready to be re-issued, when desired, about $16,000,000 in bank notes, the cancelling of which was one of the first and principal duties of those who were "to settle and liquidate its affairs." No provision was made in the charter for such a state of things. It is, therefore, proper that Congress should at once provide for it by appropriate legislation. Such is its duty, if the principles of the charter which it granted are to be fulfilled. It is no infringement of any privilege actually conferred on any individual or corporation, or intended to be by that charter; and it will at once put an end to the erroneous impression which a want of it will naturally establish, that the faith or the property of the United States continues to be pledged for the security of the bank notes bearing the name of the United States, and originally issued under that pledge. It is due to consistency that the terms and meaning of the charter should be guarded and preserved; it is due to good faith that, when the property of the United States is withdrawn, by the sale of the stock, from liability for the redemption of the notes, they should not stand by and permit them to be issued and circulated among the community, exactly as they were when that property formed a part of the capital by which they were secured; it is due to their legislative functions that the right which they retained, of examining into the proceedings of the bank, and thus virtually promising the community the exercise of a supervisory power, should not, at a moment when it is most needed for the public welfare, be neglected or relinquished, even though their own direct interest has ceased by the bargain they have made.

Nor is it with reference alone to the late or present Bank of the United States that such legislation is necessary. The course adopted by those institutions may be pursued by every other banking institution chartered by Congress. The notes issued in the District of Columbia, under the authority of charters from the United States, may, without greater impropriety, be reissued and circulated after those charters have expired, either by the banks themselves, or by trustees to whom they may transfer them the day before their corporate privileges terminate. That some law should be passed to prevent and obviate such a proceeding, cannot admit of question.

In passing such a law, it is the duty of Congress carefully to avoid any provision which should affect the citizen who holds or receives these notes in the ordinary course of trade, or who passes or transfers them in good faith from hand to hand. It is only those who hold or receive them with the means and for the purpose of redeeming them; who pass and circulate them when they know that they have come into their hands for such a purpose and under such obligations; and who neglect or refuse to cancel them, when they are bound to do so by the intention of the charter under which they were originally made.

Considering this subject, therefore, with reference to those relations of the United States towards the late national bank and to the community which are derived from the charter of that institution, a prompt and efficient interference of Congress is unquestionably demanded. They have derived large profits from the circulation of these notes, for the redemption of which their share of the capital was pledged; and they have now withdrawn that share of the capital from its former liability; they prescribed by the charter that all banking privileges, among which was that of issuing these notes, should terminate at a certain period, and that period is now passed; they reserved to themselves the right, and thus imposed on themselves the duty, of examining that the stipulations of the charter were fulfilled, and to do this the enactment of such a law is now absolutely required.

But there are other considerations bearing directly on the present situation of the commerce and business of the country, and on the respect due from Congress to the laws and policy of the individual States, which ought not to be overlooked. It is a fact that the present Bank of the United States is in actual possession, having them within its own vaults, and under its control, of a fund of bank notes to the amount of about twenty millions of dollars over and above those in circulation, issued, to a certain extent, on the faith of the United States, and bearing a corresponding credit. There appears, at least in many portions of the country, a strong disposition on the part of the banks to resume specie payments; but the uncontrolled possession of this vast amount of paper money will enable the present Bank of the United States, if so disposed, to retard, perhaps to prevent, them from effecting that laudable and desirable object. It holds in its hand, under the apparent sanction of Congress, an immense fund, which it can transport to any part of the country at its pleasure, and purchase the notes of the State banks, to be returned upon them en masse, at the very instant they shall endeavor to resume. What is there to prevent this institution from sending to New Orleans one or two millions of these notes, placing them in the possession of any local bank or its agents, and exchanging them for the notes, of banks preparing to resume, so that they may be used to embarrass and retard their efforts as soon as they are commenced? It cannot be said that this is a proceeding arising from the large capital of the present Bank of the United States, and which is not consequent upon the issue of its old and uncancelled notes. It is the possession of those notes which exempts it from danger in the adoption of such a course. Independent of the additional credit attached to them from being made under a national charter, they are now circulated without the responsibility that attends those issued under the charter of the State; and it is to this cause that may be attributed the remarkable fact, disclosed in the statement of the bank on the 5th January last, that while they had on hand fifteen millions eight hundred thousand five hundred and seventeen dollars and seventy-three cents of the old notes, one million four hundred and three thousand ninety-two dollars at their State bank agencies, and two millions seven hundred and thirty-three thousand nine hundred and ninety dollars in transitu, making altogether no less a sum in their actual possession and under their control than nineteen millions nine hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred and ninety-nine dollars and seventy-three cents of these old notes; when they had, also, in circulation among the community, the further sum of six millions two hundred and twenty thousand four hundred and sixty-seven dollars and seventeen cents of these same old notes; being an aggregate of the notes of the expired corporation, of twenty-six millions one hundred and fifty eight thousand and sixty-six dollars and ninety cents; yet, at the same time, the whole outstanding circulation of their own notes, (exclusive of post notes,) only amounted to five hundred and forty-seven thousand six hundred dollars and forty-five cents, or about the fortieth part of the old notes in their hands and in circulation.

On every note issued under the present State charter of Pennsylvania, the holder has by the State law a summary proceeding, if it is not redeemed on demand; more than this, the bank is bound, in case of refusal, to pay the high interest of 12 per cent.; and if such refusal be continued beyond a stated period, there is a provision for the speedy forfeiture of its charter.

But how is it with these notes of the late bank, of which it has obtained possession? To them none of these penalties of the law of Pennsylvania will apply; it has received them, and promises to redeem them as a mere trustee; and, in case of refusal, the holder, it is presumed, is to be driven to the tedious process of a suit in chancery, or some other form of protracted legal proceeding, to obtain that payment which he could enforce if the note had been issued by a State bank, in the most rapid and compulsory mode. Thus it is, that so long as Congress permits this institution to keep and issue these notes, it gives it the power of circulating a paper currency, free from the restrictions and safeguards which the State that chartered it meant to impose; it enables it to control the efforts of other banks for the resumption of specie payments; and leaves the citizen who takes or circulates these notes without any speedy protection and redress.

But again: This voluntary trustee of the National Bank received its new charter from the State of Pennsylvania, on the expressed condition that it should issue no bank note of a less denomination than ten dollars. It is presumed to be part of the policy of that wise State, that the circulation of so large an institution should be so limited. The neglect of Congress has defeated this salutary policy; it has given to the trustee the means and power of doing that which the State of Pennsylvania intended should not be done; five dollar notes are largely issued by the Bank of the United States chartered by Pennsylvania, though the Legislature of that State declared they should not be. Congress cannot be justified in permitting this. It is due to the State of Pennsylvania that they should respect her laws; that they should not, by any omission on their part, permit a power derived from them to be so exercised as to thwart her designs. While it is the solemn and evident duty of Congress not to interfere with the institutions of the States, but to leave them to pursue the policy of the Legislatures by which they were created, and to answer to those authorities for every violation, it is not less its duty to prevent that from being done indirectly, either by its permission or its neglect, which virtually infringes the law and policy of the States. Rightfully may the State of Pennsylvania complain, if, after strictly prohibiting the issue of notes of a denomination less than ten dollars, by this institution, the sanction or the neglect of Congress should enable it to issue and circulate millions of five dollar notes.

The following bill is, therefore, respectfully reported to the Senate:

A BILL to prevent the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes, and other securities of corporations created by acts of Congress which have expired.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases where the charter of any corporation which has been or may be created by act of Congress of the United States shall have expired, or may hereafter expire, if any director, officer, or agent, of the said corporation, or any trustee thereof, or any agent or officer of such trustee, or any person having in his possession, or under his control, the property of the said corporation, for the purpose of paying or redeeming its notes and obligations, shall knowingly issue, reissue, or utter as money, or in any other way knowingly put in circulation any bill, note, check, draft, or other security, purporting to have been made by any such corporation, whose charter has expired, or by any officer thereof, or purporting to have been made under authority derived therefrom, or if any person or persons shall knowingly aid and assist in any such act, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, or by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor not exceeding ten years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which any corporation has been or may be created by acts of Congress of the United States, or in which the United States shall have been interested as a stockholder, the term of which corporation has expired, and in which any bills, notes, checks, drafts, or other securities, made under authority derived, or alleged to have been derived, from such act, shall be in the possession or under the control of any director, officer, or agent, of the said expired corporation, or any trustee thereof, or any agent or officer of such trustee, or any person having in his possession or under his control the property of the said corporation, for the purpose of paying or redeeming its notes and obligations, the several circuit courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction on the bill or petition of the United States to grant injunctions to prevent the issuing, reissuing, or transfer of any such bills, notes, checks, drafts, or other securities; and also to cause such of the said bills, notes, checks, drafts, or other securities, as have been redeemed, to be delivered up and cancelled; and the said several courts shall have power to make all necessary decrees and orders for the purpose of carrying into effect the jurisdiction hereby conferred, and to execute the same by due process of law.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. WRIGHT,
OF NEW YORK,

In Senate, January 31, 1838—Upon the bill "to impose additional duties, as depositaries, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement, of the public moneys of the United States."

Mr. WRIGHT said he regretted that it would be necessary for him to impose a more severe tax upon the time and patience of the Senate, than he had ever before been compelled to impose, since he had been honored with a seat in the body. He had hoped, therefore, that he should have been able to reach the subject at an earlier hour in the morning; but, as it was, he would endeavor to conclude with the sitting of the day.

He said he entered upon the debate with a painful consciousness of his inability to do justice to the position he held in reference to the measure upon the table. The discussion of it must involve questions of the highest importance in politics, of the most pervading interest in finance, and, as he thought, of equal magnitude in the morals of Government. These questions were to be discussed, deliberated upon, and decided by the Senate; and upon him had fallen the duty of opening such a debate before that high tribunal.

Could he call to his aid talents, experience, learning, powers of argument, and perspicuity of language, such as were possessed and at the command of many of the distinguished Senators whom he knew he must meet in opposition to the bill, he should feel a gratifying confidence that he could contend successfully, and could triumphantly refute every objection. As it was, he was consoled by the reflection that he should be followed in the debate by other Senators equally able and equally distinguished, and who would only have occasion to ask of him that he should not injure a cause which must rest its defence with them. He would most cheerfully promise them that he would not intentionally throw obstacles in their way; and he would entreat the Senate to judge of the bill from its provisions, which he considered sound and salutary, and not from the weaknesses they would not fail to discover in his attempt to support them.

Justice to himself required another preliminary remark. But a few months had passed since they were engaged there in the discussion of this same measure, or rather, perhaps he should say, of a measure precisely similar in its great leading features. In that discussion he had taken a part; and if he should be found upon this occasion repeating ideas, and urging arguments, which he had then advanced, the reason and his apology must be sought in the identity of the subjects, and not in a disposition on his part to trouble the Senate now with remarks to which they had once done him the honor to listen.

He said the bill was based upon two great leading principles, and that all its provisions, detailed and numerous as they were, became necessary, in the judgment of the committee, to carry those principles successfully into practice. These principles were—

First. A practical and bona fide separation between the public treasure, the money of the people, and the business of individuals and incorporations, and especially between this money and the business of banking.

Second. A gradual change of the currency to be received in payment of the public dues, from that authorized to be received by the resolution of Congress of 1816, to the legal currency of the United States.

The material details of the bill, applicable to each of these objects, it would be his duty to notice; and as the task must be tedious and uninteresting to him, and much more so to the Senate, he would abridge it as much as justice to the measure would permit.

As applicable to the first object, the bill commenced with the establishment of offices and vaults, at designated points, for the safe keeping of the public money. The first section defined and established the Treasury of the United States, and placed it under the care and charge of the Treasurer of the United States; and, singular as it had appeared to him, and as he thought it would appear to most of the constituents of every Senator, this was the first attempt, so far as his researches had enabled him to discover, to establish by law a National Treasury. Should this bill pass, and this section be retained, he was confident it would be the first act of the Congress of the United States which had given, not a name, but "a local habitation," to this most important institution. As the object of the bill is to place the funds of the Government hereafter under the control of the public Treasury, and not of private banking institutions, it seemed to the committee peculiarly proper that its first enactment should be to define and establish that Treasury.

The second section constituted the mint at Philadelphia, and the branch mint at New Orleans, also places for the deposite and safe keeping of the public money collected at those places, or transferred to them by the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The treasurers of the mints respectively were assigned to the charge and custody of the moneys there deposited.

The third section directed the preparation of suitable offices and vaults in the custom-houses now erecting at New York and Boston, for the deposite and safe-keeping of the public money at those points, and for the use of the officers to have the custody of those moneys; and the fourth section provided for the erection of two independent offices and vaults, for the same purpose: the one to be located at Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, and the other at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri.

It would not require any remark from him to satisfy the mind of every Senator of the propriety of selecting the seat of Government as the place of location for the National Treasury, or that the points he had named upon the Atlantic coast, as well as New Orleans, were places where so important portions of the public revenue were collected, and from which so great a share of the public disbursements were now, in fact, made, or could be made with increased convenience to the Treasury, and to the public creditors, as to render them all proper places for the location of offices for the safe-keeping of the public money, in case any such offices were to be provided at the public expense, owned by the Government, and kept in the charge of its officers. Another reason also existed, and which was conclusive with the committee, as to the selection of Washington, Philadelphia, New Orleans, New York and Boston. Public buildings of a fire proof character were already erected, or now being erected, at the public expense, and for the public use, at all those places, in which sufficient rooms, offices and vaults, for the purpose contemplated, could be secured without any material addition to the expense incurred, and to be incurred, upon the buildings. It was also his duty to inform the Senate that, since the bill was reported, the committee had learned that the Government now owned a custom-house at Charleston, and that the information possessed at the Treasury Department authorized the belief that suitable rooms for offices could be had in that building, thus rendering it necessary to construct a vault only, instead of an independent office, as the bill contemplated, at that place. He had prepared an amendment to the bill, to make it conform to this state of facts, which he would send to the Chair before he resumed his seat.

As to the selection of St. Louis some diversity of opinion might exist; but the committee had fixed upon that place, because, from all the information they had been able to collect, they believed it to be the point from which the principal part of our heavy disbursements upon the western frontier were made. They were informed that a very large proportion of the money paid, and to be paid, annually, to the Indians west of the Mississippi, and the principal part of the disbursements at the various military posts upon the western frontier, were received by the various disbursing officers at this town, and that, therefore, large accumulations of public money were rendered necessary at this point, to meet these payments. This seemed to them to require an office for safe-keeping, and an officer or agent of the Government, of some kind, there; and the place was selected more, perhaps, in consequence of the heavy disbursements made from, than the amount of collections at it. Still their information was, that the money collected at many of the western, and especially the northwestern, land offices could be more conveniently transferred to, and accumulated at, that point than at any other upon that frontier.

The fifth section of the bill, he said, provided for the appointment of four additional salary officers, and which, in the draft of the bill, the committee had, to distinguish them from the receivers of public money at the various land offices, denominated "receivers general of public money." These officers were to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as other officers of like importance were appointed; were to hold their offices for the same terms of four years; and were to be located, one at New York, one at Boston, one at Charleston, and one at St. Louis, to take the charge of the offices and vaults for the safe-keeping of the public money at those points respectively, and of the money placed therein.

He was well-aware that this was a feature of the bill not calculated to be popular, upon a slight examination, and that it was not palatable to some of the friends of the measure generally. It was not his purpose to discuss this provision at large, in this place, as the course he had marked out for himself would require that he should again recur to it; but a few remarks upon the necessity of some provision of the sort were called for here. It was indispensably necessary to the operations of the Treasury, that it should have agencies of some description at these points. The collections and disbursements at them all made this imperative, and if it was designed to discontinue the banks as fiscal agents, some other must be substituted. This would be apparent to all, merely from recurring to the names of the places, and to their importance as commercial towns. It was true that, in the bill reported by the committee, at the extra session of Congress in September, no provision was made for this addition to the existing officers of the Treasury Department. The duties now proposed to be assigned to these new officers, were, by that bill, devolved upon the respective collectors of the customs at the places named; but it was then stated to the Senate by himself, in his place, that this and many other matters of detail were purposely omitted, that the bill then reported might be made as simple as possible, and embody the great principles intended to be secured by it; knowing, as the committee did know, the strong desire and determination of both Houses of Congress to limit that session within the shortest possible period which the public business would allow. They believed that these details, including as well the provisions of the sections before noticed, as the one now under discussion, and others which follow, would be calculated to protract discussion, delay action, and thus, either extend the session, or prevent the final passage of the bill. They were then convinced that the recommendations of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, as to the appointment of these additional officers, would have to be carried out, but, in the then almost suspended state of our foreign trade, they did not believe that the operations of the Treasury would suffer for the want of them during the very short vacation which was to intervene between that and the present session of Congress; and it was then intimated that the defects in that bill could be supplied now.

The inquiries which the committee have since made, not only at the Treasury Department, but at some of the places named, have proved to their entire satisfaction that this addition of officers will be required; that the collectors of the customs at these places, or certainly at some of them, are already charged with more onerous and responsible duties than any one man, whatever may be his industry and capacity for business, can well discharge; and that, at the port of New York at least, those duties would justly bear division, were it not that, from their nature and character, they cannot be divided. The same must be nearly the truth at Boston, and cannot vary very materially from it at Charleston and St. Louis. The Secretary of the Treasury supposes that the receipts and disbursements of the money ordinarily collected and disbursed at each of these points, will occupy the full time of one competent business man; and will any one suppose that duties so onerous and so responsible can be added to those at present to be performed by the collectors of the customs? Will any one desire that such duties and responsibilities should be confided to a mere clerk in the office of the collector? He thought not. Then the provision, or some one of a similar character, was indispensable, and its rejection would endanger the safety of the public money, embarrass the operations of the Treasury, and put in jeopardy, if not defeat, the successful action of the whole system.

The sixth section of the bill was, in substance, the first section of the bill reported by the committee at the extra session; the only alterations being those required to make it conform to the provisions which were before it, and which he had already noticed. It declared what officers of the Government should be depositaries, embracing, in addition to those named in the former sections, collectors of the customs, receivers of public money at the land offices, postmasters, and some other classes, and assigned generally the duties to be performed by them in this capacity.

He would now pass to section ten, which required but a single remark. It conferred a general power upon the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer the money in the hands of any depositary to the custody and keeping of any other depositary, as occasion might require. This provision was necessary, as well to give the Department control over its own affairs, as to enable it to consult the safety of the public money, and the calls of the public service. If money accumulate, at any given point, to an amount which, from the smallness of the officer's bond, or from any other cause, the Secretary shall have reason to fear is, or may be, unsafe, he should be authorized to transfer it, or any portion of it, to a place of safety. If money accumulate at points where it is not wanted for disbursement, he should have the same authority to transfer it to a point where it is so wanted. If a depositary be located at a place remote from any bank, and any office of safe-keeping, similar authority will be required to transfer his collections for deposite. These, and many other occasions, will arise for the exercise of this power to make transfers.

The twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth sections contained provisions to authorize special deposites of public money for safe-keeping, at all places where there was no office for the safe-keeping belonging to the Government. The only parts of the sections which it would be material for him to notice, were those which defined the character of the deposites. They are made strictly special, and a broad discretion is given to the Secretary of the Treasury as to the measures he will adopt to secure to them that character. In case he shall think it wise to do so, he is authorized to provide iron safes to be placed in the vaults of the banks, for the exclusive keeping of the public money, and so constructed that they may be under the joint control of the bank and the depositing officer, so that neither can gain access to the money without the consent and aid of the other. A further condition is, that nothing but gold and silver, and paper issued upon the authority of the United States, and made, by law, receivable in payment of the public dues, shall be offered for deposite by the depositaries, or received on deposite by the banks. It is further provided, that all deposites shall be carried upon the books of the bank to the credit of the officer making the deposite, and not to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States; that neither the Treasurer, nor the Secretary of the Treasury, shall draw upon the bank for disbursements or transfers, and that the money deposited shall not be withdrawn from the bank, by the officer to whose credit it stands, without an order from the Secretary of the Treasury for the payment. A commission upon the money deposited is proposed to b allowed to the banks for their trouble and risk, but as the committee had no information as to the rate of commission which it would be safe for Congress to fix as a maximum, and not incur the danger of so limiting this compensation as to induce the banks to refuse the deposites altogether, they have reported the bill in blank in this respect.

These provisions, it would be seen, were very close; and it had been suggested, as well by some of the friends, as by the opponents of the bill, that they were so close as to render it possible, if not probable, that the banking institutions would reject them on that account, upon the ground that they carried upon their face a distrust of the solvency and responsibility of the institutions, or of the integrity of their officers and managers, or both. He would detain the Senate a few moments to examine these objections; and, first, if he understood the matter, and the law of the case, the idea of distrust as to the solvency and responsibility of the banks, arising from these provisions, seemed to him to be a forced and unnatural inference. If such an idea could grow out of any part of them, it must be that part giving to the Secretary of the Treasury a discretion to furnish safes for the exclusive keeping of the public money, to be under the joint control of the bank and an officer of the Government. This would constitute the deposite entirely special; and, as he understood the law, the bank would not be responsible for such a deposite beyond the obligation of ordinary care and vigilance in its safe-keeping. In the incidents of property, responsibility, and risk, there was scarcely a resemblance between a deposite of this character, and a general, open deposite. In the latter, the property is changed the moment the deposite is made. The money becomes the absolute property of the bank as much as its own capital, and the Government receives its credit, or promise to pay, in its certificate of deposite, in exchange for the money. No matter, then, how the money be lost, if it be lost, the indebtedness of the institution upon its certificate is not changed thereby, nor can it be discharged by any act of the debtor other than payment. In such deposites, therefore, the solvency and responsibility of the bank becomes the first subject of inquiry and examination for the depositor. Not so in cases of special deposite. There the property is not changed; the specific thing deposited remains the property of the depositor. If it be money, it would be a violation of the law, and rules of the deposite, for the bank to exchange it, for any purpose, for the same amount of money of an exactly similar character. It is the identity of the article, and the property in it, which gives it the character of a special deposite; and if that article be converted by the bank, although instantly replaced by an exactly similar article in every respect, the identity and property are both gone, and the option of the depositor alone must determine whether his indemnity shall be the responsibility of the institution or the article tendered in exchange. Hence the different liabilities of the bank in the two cases. In the first, it purchases the money with its credit, and thus contracts a debt which it is unconditionally liable to pay; in the second, it derives no property from the deposite, and is a simple bailee, with or without compensation, as its contract of deposite shall determine; but, in either case, only liable in case of want of ordinary care and vigilance in the safe-keeping of the thing entrusted to its keeping.

In the provisions for the special deposites provided for, therefore, the Government only proposes to hire the security of the vaults and safes of the banks, for the keeping of its money, and the ordinary care and vigilance of its officers, in guarding it while there. Beyond these, it has nothing to do with the capital, solvency, or responsibility of the institutions. How, then, can it be supposed that the provisions are intended to carry distrust upon their face against the solvency and responsibility of the banks? If the vaults be safe, and the integrity of the officers, their vigilance and care, tried and known, an insolvent bank is as safe a place for a special deposite as a solvent one; a bank unable to pay its debts, as a bank abundant in its means beyond its liabilities. Either can keep as safely and faithfully the property of another, placed in its vaults, while the creditors of neither can avail themselves of a special deposite, whatever it may be, without the assent and aid of the officers of the institution. How unnecessary, therefore, to declare distrust upon the face of a law, when almost all interest in the just grounds for that feeling is put at rest by the nature and character of the deposite to be made? And how unnatural to infer such distrust from language which does not necessarily convey it, when the character of the contract proposed to be made does not require the inference.

It was further alleged that the provisions conveyed imputation against the integrity of the officers and managers of the banks, and that, therefore, they would not contract with the Secretary of the Treasury for the deposites proposed. Was this a fair construction of the provisions of the bill? Was it an improper or ungenerous distrust of the integrity of those who had the management of these institutions, and the care and custody of the property placed in their charge, to set guards over their conduct? What did the bill propose in reference to the officers who were to be entrusted with the safe-keeping of the public money? They were required, not only to give bonds for the faithful performance of their trust, but a breach of that trust, in the use of the money, for investments, loans, or in any other manner whatsoever, was declared a crime which should subject the perpetrator to indictment and infamous punishment; to protracted personal imprisonment, and to a fine equal to the money embezzled; and, consequently, to perpetual disgrace and infamy. Was this a suggestion, upon the face of these provisions, of distrust of the honesty and integrity of these officers? Was every honest and honorable citizen of the country bound to reject these offices, when tendered to them, because the law under which they must act, in providing penalties for their misconduct, or guards against it, conveyed to the public a distrust of their integrity? Had any statesman ever supposed that, in naming penalties and punishments in a law for violations of official duty or official trust, he was drawing out imputations against the integrity and trustworthiness of the officers who were to hold places under it? He could not so suppose. He could not subscribe to this doctrine; and he would ask if incorporations, incorporeal existences, were to be treated more delicately, in our legislation, than that class of citizens who would be selected by the President, and approved by the Senate, for high and responsible public trusts? All must answer no; and, so answering, all must concede that there was no foundation for this objection to the provisions. Incorporations could not be subjected to indictment and punishment, as there was no real person upon whom the punishment could be inflicted. This check could not be imposed upon their officers and agents, because it would be impossible to determine who was guilty in form only, and who in fact, when every act must be that of an agent who may have no discretion. If, then, physical restraints are interposed as to these institutions, to accomplish the ends which are reached by penal enactments in the case of natural persons, is the offence to delicacy of feeling, the affront to honor or integrity, greater in the former case than in the latter? He could not see that it was; and he must think that both of these objections displayed a degree of over-wrought sensibility towards the banking institutions of the country which their sagacious managers would see should not govern their conduct.

There was a single other view of this subject which he must present, and he would pass on to other provisions of the bill. It was the intention of the committee, who drew and reported the bill, to make these deposites strictly special; to prevent the banks from any use of the money deposited; and he believed the provisions to which he had referred, if faithfully executed, would accomplish that intention. If the banks should receive the money, under this understanding, and with an intention on their part to carry it out in good faith, what would be their true interest in this matter? Would it not be to have their power to use the money placed beyond question? To have physical disabilities interposed between them and that portion of the public treasure committed to their charge? Observation and experience must, already, have taught them that the distrustful eye of public opinion follows the public treasure, and, unless the most efficient guards are provided by the Government, and assented to by the banks, will not the most injurious suspicions of a breach of their trust be likely to rest upon them? Ought they not, for their own indemnity, to desire that the use of these moneys should be placed beyond their power? And will they not have some just reason to apprehend that objections on their part may give rise to suspicions as to their disposition faithfully to execute the trust in conformity with its intentions?

The fifteenth and sixteenth sections provided checks upon the various depositaries constituted by the bill. The first authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint special agents, whenever he may find it necessary, to inspect the books, accounts, money on hand, and other business of any depositary. The principal object of this section, as he understood that object, was to enable the Secretary, whenever the returns of the officer, information communicated by third persons, or any other information, should authorize a suspicion that all was not right with any one of the officers entrusted with the safe-keeping of public money, to appoint some competent citizen, as a special agent, to present himself, unexpectedly, with authority to examine the official transactions of the officer, to detect and correct error, if error should be found to exist; to expose fraud and bring the officer to punishment, in case dishonesty should be detected; and to justify innocence, if suspected without foundation. It was true, the section made these examinations compulsory, at long intervals of one year, in cases where the amounts collected usually exceeded a just proportion to the amount secured by the bond of the officer; but this part of the section he considered of much less importance than that he had before noticed. He considered its principal utility to exist in the authority to appoint an agent unknown to the officer, and who might come upon him in an unprepared state. If the agent were to be one permanently appointed, and publicly known, one whom the officer might watch and guard himself against, he should consider it not worth retaining. He was aware that, in its present shape, it was objectionable to some of the friends of the bill; and, with this exposition, he submitted its adoption or rejection to the sense of the Senate. It was an exact transcript of a section contained in the bill which passed the body at the extra session, and as it was inserted upon the suggestion of the head of the Treasury Department, he presumed the suggestion had proceeded from a similar provision contained in the laws which regulate the Post Office Department, and which had been of great use in detecting frauds connected with the extended operations of that Department; but should it be thought that such a provision would not be beneficial, as connected with this bill, he should not consider its removal as materially marring the system intended to be constituted.

The sixteenth section made it the duty of the surveyors of the customs, naval officers, registers of the land offices, directors of the mints, and some other officers, at the expiration of each quarter, to examine into, and report to the Secretary of the Treasury, the state of the accounts, and money on hand, of the depositaries in their districts, or immediate connection. These were checks obtained through the instrumentality of existing officers; were wholly without expense to the public; would evidently be of material service, as guards upon the depositaries, and as contributing to a uniformity and system in the keeping of the accounts of those officers, and he presumed would meet with no objection from any quarter.

He would pass now to the twentieth section, which required every officer, charged with the keeping of public money, to keep an accurate account of the kinds of money received and paid out; the object of which was to prevent these officers, without detection, from receiving and paying out to the public creditors a depreciated currency, and also from making exchanges of the currency received, in a manner which should be injurious to the public interests, or to the rights of those who might receive payments from the officer, of demands against the Government. The same section also declares that any use of the money in his hands by any depositary, by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or of loan, with, or without interest, or in any way whatsoever, shall be a high misdemeanor, for which the officer convicted thereof, shall be imprisoned for a term of not less than two, nor more five years, and shall pay a fine equal to the amount of the money so used. He believed this was a new feature in the legislation of Congress. He had not found any case where a law imposed criminal punishment for the misuse or misapplication of money by a public officer; but still he believed the provision sound in principle, and that it would prove salutary in practice. He had examined very superficially the legislation of other countries upon this point, and he found that many of the nations of Europe, from which we had copied most of our public laws, made this act a felony, with much more severe punishment than is here proposed. He had heard no objection against this feature of the bill from any quarter of the House, and he hoped there would be none.

The twenty-first section might not be considered by some as peculiarly appropriate to this bill; but he trusted to be able to satisfy the Senate that it connected itself with its provisions in a very important manner, and ought to form a part of it. The section made it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, when there should be an amount upon deposite to the credit of the Treasurer beyond the sum of four millions of dollars, to invest such surplus in stocks of the United States, or of some one of the States, bearing an interest, and transferrable at the pleasure of the holder, by delivery or assignment; but it prohibited the Secretary from becoming a subscriber to, or purchaser of, any new stocks about to be issued by any State, and thus prevented him from holding out any inducement to any State to issue stocks with a view to these investments. It also directed him, whenever the money in the Treasury, or standing to the credit of the Treasurer with the several depositaries, should be less than four millions, to sell so much of the stocks, in which any surplus should have been invested, as would keep the money in the Treasury at that amount, or as his information might satisfy him the wants of the Treasury would require.

Provisions of the character contained in this section were not new to the Senate. They had been, upon a former occasion, introduced there by himself, as a mean of disposing, in the most safe and profitable manner to the Treasury, and in the way he thought would prove most convenient to the business interests of the community, of a large surplus of public money on deposite in the banks. A different disposition of that subject seemed preferable to the Senate, and the provisions for investment did not meet with favor. He entertained a strong hope that their natural connection with this bill, and with the salutary workings of the system for the management of the public finances provided for by it, would give to it a different reception at the present time.

It was found that the wide-spread operations of the Treasury required about four millions of dollars constantly on hand, including the amounts in transitu, and the million, or thereabouts, constantly employed at the mints, but that accumulations beyond that sum were, at all ordinary periods, accumulations to be kept, not acted upon, for the time being. To avoid, then, the risks of keeping, which formed a material objection with those who opposed the bill, and to avoid accumulations of money to be locked up from use, which formed another and much more weighty objection against the system in the arguments of those who had hitherto opposed it, these provisions were made a part of the bill itself, and he must suppose that these considerations would, at this time, and in this connection, render them acceptable to many, who, upon their introduction on the former occasion alluded to, could not yield them support. He must confidently believe that, to those whose minds had been influenced by the objections he had repeated, they would constitute a positive merit, as a part of a bill otherwise, in their estimation, defective.

There was another aspect in which he wished to present these provisions. The constant experience of the Treasury Department, since the final extinguishment of the national debt, had shown the necessity of some elastic provision in our legislation upon the subject of the public revenue and expenditures, which would accommodate itself to the varied conditions of the Treasury, or, rather, which would enable the head of the Treasury Department so to manage the national finances, as that the Treasury may be at all times prepared to meet the calls upon it, and that an amount of money should at no time be hoarded therein, to the injury of the business of the country or its citizens. During the existence of the public debt, the provisions of law, and appropriations of money connected with it, furnished this regulator for the state of the Treasury. The applications of money upon the debt were at all times governed by the surplus of revenue over the expenditures, while all the unexpended balances of appropriations, after a limited period, passed to the sinking fund, and were absorbed in the debt. A troublesome surplus of revenue, therefore, could never exist, while that application remained open. On the other hand, as the appropriations for the year were carefully provided for before any application upon the debt, it was scarcely possible that any contingency, not foreseen during the regular annual sessions of Congress could occur, to disenable the Treasury to meet the demands upon it, arising under the current appropriation bills. The amount of revenue intended for application upon the debt would always be sufficient to meet any disappointment in the accruing receipts into the Treasury. That time, however, had now past. The debt was paid; and, from the necessity of the case, and the state of the legislation of Congress, experiments had been made to measure the actual appropriations by the estimated revenue, and to make them come out even. For the first few years of this trial, from a state of circumstances not at the time sufficiently considered, but now clearly and properly estimated, the revenue got largely the better of the appropriations. This gave rise to the bill directing a deposite of the surplus with the States; and again the actual appropriations and the estimated revenue were attempted to be equally measured. A revulsion in the trade, and business, and banking, of the country came: the anticipated revenue was cut short, and that portion of it which rested upon credits, could not be realized. Indeed, the very money on deposite in the banks, to the credit of the Treasurer, could not be commanded, and, comparatively, the whole anticipated means of the Treasury were either not realized, or placed beyond its control. Still the appropriations were in force, the expenditures were going on under them, and could not be arrested, and a special convocation of Congress became necessary, to preserve the faith of the Government, and enable the public Treasury to meet the just demands upon it. What followed was fresh in the recollection of the Senate and the country; and he would not consume the time by a repetition of the measures of relief to the country and the Treasury, adopted at that session.

He had mentioned these facts to show the necessity of some provision to guard against these disappointments in the accruing revenue, as well as to prevent the evil of a hoarding of money, when the revenue should overreach the appropriations. In either sense, he considered the provisions of the section of the first importance, and he entreated Senators not to suffer past recollections to prejudice their minds, but to examine these facts; to permit our late experience to have its due weight; to reflect how frequently similar disappointments, as to the revenue, might be experienced—how often surplus amounts of revenue might alarm the public mind, as to the safety of the public treasure; and then to decide upon the adoption or rejection of the section.

The only remaining section which he would notice, as connected with the first great object of the bill, was the twenty-seventh. This section authorizes the Treasurer of the United States to receive, at the Treasury, and at such other places as he shall designate, payments of money, in advance, for the purchase of public lands, and to give a receipt for each payment, which shall be current at any of the land offices, at any public or private sale of lands. Since the bill had been reported, he had become convinced that this section was too loosely drawn, and required to be amended. These receipts might be taken and treated as negotiable paper, and might, as the section now stood, be given in a form which would make them so upon their face. This would subject the bill to the imputation of authorizing the emission of a paper currency, based upon the public lands; a thing by no means intended by himself, and he was sure not by any member of the committee who assented to the report of the bill. He had, therefore, prepared an amendment, declaring that the receipts to be given by the Treasurer, pursuant to the provisions of the section, should not be negotiable or transferrable, by assignment, or delivery, or in any other manner whatsoever; but that every such receipt should be presented at the land office by, or for, the person to whom it was given, as shown upon its face. In this shape he hoped the section would not be objectionable upon the ground above stated, while he thought it would be apparent that its general provision would be of great convenience to those purchasers of the public lands who were to emigrate from the old States, and to carry with them the means to make their purchases. It would save them from the trouble and risk of transporting money of any description, and also from the danger of taking, to so distant a portion of the country, a currency which would not answer their purpose when there. It was not apprehended that the Treasurer would be called upon to select many points as places where these payments might be made. Perhaps the points at which it was proposed to keep offices for the deposite of the public money would be sufficient, and perhaps a few other principal places might be selected with increased convenience to the public. A certificate of the deposite of the money at any designated point, transmitted to the Treasurer, would command the required receipt from him, as well as the actual payment of the money at the Treasury itself; and as this could be done through the mail, the party making the payment would be saved the expense of a journey to the Treasurer's office in this city.

A further and material advantage to the banking institutions, he was assured, would be derived from the adoption of this section. The notes of specie paying banks are now authorized to be received for all payments, except for lands, and if this bill passed, would be receivable, as well for lands as other public dues, to a greater or less extent, for six or seven years yet to come. Still a citizen of the old States, about to emigrate to the new, and having the money for the purchase of his lands in the notes of specie paying banks of the old States, would not venture to take those notes as the means of payment, because there would be a danger that the land officer, to whom he might wish to make payment, would not receive the notes of even specie paying banks so remote from the place where alone they could be converted into specie. The emigrant would be compelled, therefore, to present the notes, convert them himself, and take the specie as his means of payment, unless the provision now proposed, or some one of a similar character, should enable him to make the payment before his journey is commenced. The experience of the past had proved that this was the course pursued by the emigrants, towards the banks in the vicinty of their former residences, and pursued from compulsion; but he had been informed that during the short period, in the summer of 1836, when payments for lands were actually received at the office of the Treasurer in this city, large amounts were paid and received, and that the banks here, and in the adjoining States of Virginia and Maryland, experienced sensible and material relief from the practice.

He would here close his examination of the first class of the provisions of the bill, and give a very brief attention of the second: those relating to the proposed change in the currency to be received in payment of the public dues.

The principal and controlling provision upon this subject was to be found in the twenty-third section of the bill. The section was long, and contained much detail, but the principle adopted by it was simple and intelligible; it was merely a gradual change, from the currency of specie paying bank notes, to the legal currency of the country. The change was to commence after the close of the present year, and was to cover the full period of six years, making the change applicable to one-sixth part of the accruing revenue of each, beyond that of the next preceding year. He could most easily make the Senate acquainted with this section, by saying that it was, in substance and principle, the provision offered by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) by way of amendment to the bill reported by the committee to the Senate, at the extra session, in September last. The only material change made by the committee, had been to extend the gradation of the change in the currency from fourths to sixths, so as to require six instead of four years to make the change entire. The section might not be drawn in the same words used by that Senator in his amendment, but, with the exception just named, the substance was identical.

This was a feature of the bill which former experience assured him would be more strongly contested, perhaps, than any other of its provisions. It would be recollected by the Senate that, at the extra session, the committee had incorporated into their bill no provision in reference to the currency in which the public dues should be received, and that their opinion had been then expressed to the body, that it would be most expedient to legislate upon each of these great points separately, and by separate bills. A different opinion was strongly expressed at the time by several Senators, and different amendments touching this subject of the currency were early offered to the bill which the committee did report. After full debate, and by deliberate votes, the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina was adopted, and made a part of the bill. Under these circumstances, the committee had felt constrained, in making their report at this session, to include this provision in that report, and to make it a part of the same measure which should separate the finances of the country from the banking interests of the country. Hence is the section now found in the bill presented by the committee, although it was not a part of their former report. Still it presents a question of deep interest, of great magnitude, and upon which there is great diversity of opinion and great delicacy of feeling, as well throughout the country as in this and the other house of Congress.

It was not his purpose, at this time, to discuss the section, except in one aspect, but in that one he must make some suggestions. The alarm taken at the provision had relation principally to the State banks, and it was in reference to the interests of those institutions that he proposed the suggestions he was about to make. The proposition is, gradually, and after the term of some six or seven years, to discontinue the receipt of their notes in payment of the public dues, although they may be, at the time, specie paying banks, and their notes may be convertible into specie, at the will of the holder, at their banking house, wherever that may be located. The objection is, that this rejection of the paper of these banks, on the part of the National Government, will so far discredit their circulation generally as to cripple their operations, destroy their powers of usefulness in the local sphere of their legitimate operations, and finally annihilate them. Is there ground for this apprehension? How are the charters of the State banks obtained, and for what purposes? Is it that the circulation of their notes shall extend over the whole Union? Is it that those notes shall take with them, wherever they may go, the faith and credit of the United States, and be the legal currency of the Federal Government at every point and place in these twenty-six States? No: no such idea ever entered into the mind of any man, who, as a member of the Legislature of his State, has voted for a local bank charter. The only ground upon which those applications are pressed upon the State Legislatures is, the accommodation of the commerce and business in the immediate vicinity of the proposed location of the bank. Look at the statistics which are always made a part of the argument in favor of a particular State charter. Are they the statistics of the Union? No: they are the statistics of the village, or town, or county, embracing the location of the proposed bank, and they are intended to prove the necessity of the banking facilities proposed to be furnished by the charter at that point. Did any man ever suppose, then, that the State Legislatures, to which these applications are so constantly and perseveringly addressed, considered themselves, in their very liberal grants in this way, to be authorizing a currency for the whole people of the United States, and especially a standard of currency for the Treasury of the United States? No. Such a position would not be assumed by any man here, nor would it by any man in the country. Where, then, arose the obligation of this Government to receive the notes of these institutions, thus chartered, and for such purposes, in payment of the public dues? He could not see either the obligation or the duty; and certainly no one would contend, in case the notes were to be received, that they should be kept on hand as the money treasure of the whole people.

How, then, were they to be disposed of in a manner to consult the safety of the public funds, in case they were to be perpetually received? This question admitted of but one answer. They must be presented, at short intervals, to the banks which issued them, and converted into money, into the legal currency of the country. In conformity with this manifest principle, the bill provided that these notes should not be made matters of deposite, under the regulations it contains for special deposites in banks. It would be folly to deposite, merely for safety, the representative of value, in the place of the value itself, where the open option existed to constitute the deposite of the one or the other. Which would, then, be most useful to the State banks: to receive their notes as cash at the Treasury, and constantly convert them into specie, or gradually to discontinue that receipt altogether, and collect the revenue in the legal currency only? To allow them from six to seven years to conform themselves, their business, and their conditions, to the changed state of things; or to commence immediately to receive their notes for the public dues, so far as those notes are redeemable in specie upon demand at their banking-houses, and to present them for payment at short intervals and in large masses? For himself, he must say he thought the provisions of the section in question were more mild, and more favorable to the State banks, than the alternative he had contemplated. The subject, however, was before the Senate. It would be discussed by others, who had bestowed more thought and more research upon this particular point than he had; the merits of the question, in every aspect, would be fairly and fully presented, and he would content himself with whatever decision should be made. Should this proposition not meet with favor, he should ask the sense of the Senate upon the alternative, and he would not permit himself to doubt that the one or the other would be adopted.

The twenty-fourth section was merely calculated to carry out the one which preceded it, by making it imperative upon all disbursing officers, after the time when the whole revenue should be collectable in the legal currency of the United States, to make all their disbursements in the same currency, upon penalty of dismissal from office, and a forfeiture of any compensation which might be due to them at the time of their violation of the law. The twenty-fifth section might, perhaps, be considered as somewhat connected with those which have gone before it, as it requires the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe the times within which the drafts of the Treasurer, drawn upon the various depositaries, according to their respective distances from the seat of Government, shall be presented for payment, and after which time they shall not be accepted and paid by the depositary, without new directions from the Secretary. The object of this section, it will be seen, was to prevent these drafts from being made a currency for circulation, based upon the credit of the Government. Since the suspension of the banks, in May last, this use has been made of these drafts, to some extent, and it was thought desirable to check the practice in its inception. The section was copied from a provision of the bill which passed the Senate at the extra session, and which was inserted in that bill, as an amendment, by the Senate itself.

He would relieve the Senate and himself from any further observations as to the details of the bill. He had omitted several of great importance; and among them he would mention those which made provision for the official bonds of the several depositaries. He believed those provisions broad and ample, and such as were best calculated to secure the public treasure; and he thought every Senator, upon examination, would agree with him in this opinion. He would not attempt to particularize the other sections which had not been noticed, but would merely remark that none of them introduced any new principle into the bill, and that he thought all would be found to reach the object intended by them.

Such, Mr. President, said Mr. W. is the system which the majority of the Committee on Finance have considered it to be their duty to present to the Senate for the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement, of the public money of the United States. This system is strenuously opposed, not by the political party uniformly opposed to the present Administration only, but by some of the respected and influential individuals among those who have, hitherto, been its friends and supporters. What, then, is proposed by those who cannot give their support to the bill before you? The system of State bank deposites seems to be more especially urged as the antagonist proposition, and, under the impression that there was to rest the present controversy, so far as distinct propositions of any character would be submitted to the Senate, he proposed to institute a comparison between the advantages and disadvantages of each system, as connected with the prominent objections which had been, heretofore, urged against the provisions of the bill.

First, then, as to the safety of the public money under the system proposed by the bill, and under the State bank deposite system.

The bill proposes to require ample and sufficient bonds and sureties from all the depositaries constituted by it, as one step towards the safety of the money entrusted to the keeping of those agents.

It also proposes to provide vaults and safes at the most important points of collection and disbursement, in this respect placing itself upon a par with banks, so far as physical securities are concerned.

It further proposes to adopt the use of the vaults and safes of the banks, at all places where those securities are not provided by the Government, using the banks for safety simply, by the system of special deposites, and not in any sense as fiscal agents of the Treasury.

These are the guards which the system constituted by the bill holds out to the people against the loss of their treasure.

The State bank deposite system presents the capitals of the institutions as security for deposites, in the same manner as for all other liabilities of the incorporation.

It also presents its vaults and safes, constructed for its own security, and, it is fair to presume, as securely constructed as those proposed for the Government.

It next presents, as we have heretofore practised under it, collateral bonds, with sureties, for the due and faithful fulfilment of its engagements on the part of the bank.

These are the protections to the public treasure offered by the State bank deposite system, supposing, as he did, that the system, if continued, was to remain upon the plan of open or general deposites, as adopted in the deposite bill of 1836. Otherwise, as he had shown in a former part of his remarks, the capital of the bank would not be liable, except for gross negligence in the keeping of the money placed in its vaults.

What, then, are the risks under each system?

Under that proposed by the bill, the only single risk is that of the misconduct and dishonesty of the officers to whom the safe-keeping of the money is entrusted, and that conduct, in addition to all other legal liabilities, is made a high crime, and punishable with protracted personal imprisonment. The persons to whom this trust is to be confided, are such citizns as the President, with a full knowledge of the duties, responsibilities, and temptations, shall select and nominate to the Senate, and as the Senate, upon full examination, shall advise and consent that the President do appoint and commission to execute the trust. The risk is that these persons will be dishonest; that they will become insensible to standing and character; that they will violate their faith to their sureties and their country; that they will embezzle the public money in their hands, and thus subject themselves to infamous punishment—to imprisonment with rogues and felons for a term of not less than two years.

One of the risks under the State bank deposite system is the same misconduct and dishonesty of the officers, agents, and managers, of the banks, and they are numerous, and many of them selected to perform subordinate duties. Without any imputation upon the institutions, therefore, or their principal officers, it cannot be unfair to assume that many of the persons who must have access to their books, accounts, and money, will not be persons of that standing and character which would be required, by all concerned, in the selection and appointment of responsible public officers. In the case of the bank, too, the persons who must have access to the money in its charge are numerous, while under the other system the single depositary alone has such access. Again, the misconduct and dishonesty of the officers and agents of the bank are not made criminal and punished as crimes. If committed, so far as the Government is concerned, they are mere breaches of trust, and incur a debt; they lay the foundation for a suit at law to recover the money embezzled. Can it, by possibility, be supposed that these risks are equally balanced? He knew that, upon a former occasion, when this same subject was under discussion, we had had paraded before us a long and most unpleasant list of defaulting public officers, but it had not been stated at what periods those defaults had occurred, or what was their aggregate amount. He had never, upon any occasion, examined the list with much care, as it was not a matter of entertainment to him to see these evidences of unworthiness in those who had sought and obtained public patronage and public trust. He had, however, referred to the list sufficiently to learn that nine-tenths of the defaults recorded upon it had happened during the prevalence of a system of bank deposites of some sort; and he thought it would be found, upon careful comparison, that a large majority of them had taken place when a national bank, that great security, in the minds of many, against all pecuniary evils, was the sole depository of the national treasure. The defaulters were mostly disbursing officers proper, such as paymasters of the army, pursers in the navy, and the like, or postmasters, who had never, until very recently, been legally connected, in any way, with the Treasury, or contractors upon the public works. All these classes of persons, except postmasters, must always, and under any system, have the same opportunity to misapply public money; and their defaults, therefore, were no more an argument against the system proposed by the bill, for the safe-keeping of the public money, than against any other system which could be devised or named. He had already said the amount of these defaults had not been stated. He did not know the amount, but this he would venture to affirm, without the fear of contradiction, that the whole amount of losses to the Government, from the defaults of public officers, since its organization under the Constitution, would be but a fraction of the losses which it had sustained from its connection with State banks alone, setting aside the forty years of the period when a national bank was the sole fiscal agent of the Treasury. Here, therefore, the State bank system gained no advantage in the argument. He was most happy to be able to say that, in comparison with the vast amounts which had been received and disbursed, the losses under any system hitherto adopted had been very small; and it made him proud of his country, and of her citizens, to state a fact which had been given to him from high authority, since the subject of entrusting the money of the people with their own officers had been one of discussion before the country. The fact to which he alluded was that the whole disbursements of the army, from the year 1821, to the year 1836, both inclusive, amounting to several millions in each year, had been made through the hands of the public officers appointed for that purpose, and that not one dollar of loss had accrued to the Government from those appropriations, during the whole of that period. Ought not this fact alone to inspire confidence in the trustworthiness of our public servants? It seemed to him so: and he must say he could not comprehend how it was, after all the experience which our former and recent history had afforded, that gentlemen of the most unquestioned integrity should feel and manifest so much distrust against the public officers of the Government—men of elevated standing and character, and directly accountable to the people and their representatives, as well as to the civil and criminal tribunals of the country—and should, at the same time, and in reference to the same subject, repose such implicit and unmoved confidence in the incorporated banking institutions of the States, and in their offices and managers. Did they believe that the transfer of a citizen from private life to a public office necessarily poisoned his integrity, while a similar transfer to a situation in a bank rendered him worthy of all trust? No. They could not so believe. The fact could not be so. The honest man would be honest in either situation. The dishonest man would be honest in neither. He knew that public officers sometimes became defaulters; and he must be permitted to ask how frequently the public sense was startled by announcements, through the public press, of the defaults and embezzlements of the most confidential officers of banks? All were frail and erring men, and some alike in both classes, would prove unequal to the resistance which the temptations of their situations required; but he could not see that either system derived any advantage over the other, from this consideration, while he did believe that the bill under discussion proposed guards against this risk, which would be found more beneficial in practice than any hitherto known to the legislation of Congress.

So far as vaults and safes were concerned, he had already admitted that each system possessed equal advantages, and from what had been said, it would be seen that, to a very great extent, these securities, as applied to both systems, were identically the same.

But there is another, and much more important, risk connected with the bank system. It is, that all moneys placed with the banks for safe-keeping, upon open or general deposite, are necessarily subjected to all the hazards which attend the business of the banking institutions. We have already seen that the money thus deposited becomes at once the property of the bank; and that the depositor receives, in exchange for his money, the simple credit of the institution. If, then, its credit be subjected to the hazards of the banking business, so must be the money placed on general deposite with it, as that money is merely converted by the depositor into that credit. By adopting this system, therefore, for the safe-keeping of the national treasure, we embark the money of the people in the same boat with the capital of the bank; we subject it to all the hazards to which that capital is subjected, and we substantially agree, so far as our reliance is upon the capital of the institution for indemnity, that, if the adventure be fortunate, our money shall be safe; but that, if it be unfortunate, the risk and the loss shall be ours. We are not, however to be placed in the condition of the owners of the capital of the bank. We are not to share in the profits of a fortunate hazard. Our only object is safety for our money; and to gain that, we take our share of the risks, without any interest in the contemplated profits from them. Who will contend that these risks do not fully balance the safety we derive as the consideration for incurring them? The bank system, then derives no advantage in the argument from the security afforded us by its capital, so long as it subjects us to all its risks without any share in its gains.

Let us now balance the account, as far as we have gone, and see which system has the advantage. In the security of vaults and safes both are equal. The security afforded by the capitals of the banks is counterbalanced by the risks it compels us to take, growing out of its banking operations, without any share in the profits of those operations, if fortunate. This balances this item of the account. In the risk growing out of the misconduct and dishonesty of officers, managers, and agents, the system proposed by the bill has a decided advantage, in the number of persons to be trusted, the standing and character of those who have access to the money, and the guards against, and punishment of, embezzlement. In the bonds and sureties both systems would be, prima facie, equal; but we have been recently told, by a distinguished Senator, (Mr. WEBSTER,) that the collateral bonds given by banks are useless paper; that they are always signed by officers, directors, and stockholders, of the bank for which they are sureties, by persons whose business and fortunes are interwoven with the business and fortunes of the bank; and that when it fails the sureties upon our bond must fail with it. He hoped this position was not true to its full extent; but he must admit that it was likely to be true in a very great degree, for who would become security for a bank, but the persons interested in it? These institutions, from their nature and character, could neither receive nor reciprocate any other friendships than those of interest, and therefore they could only look to the interested to find sureties for their engagements. Not so with the public officer. He would have no business relations. His official duties would require his whole time, and whole mind. The discharge of those duties would call for no bank facilities. His sureties would be friends; men wholly disconnected from him in business, and whose properties and responsibilities could not be affected by his pecuniary disasters, any farther than their liabilities upon his bond should produce that effect. The system proposed by the bill, then, derived a material advantage over the bank system, in the safety of the collateral bonds, and thus must be admitted, in the settlement of the account, to have two advantages over the antagonist system, and to be the safer of the two.

Second. He would now carry the comparison to the expenses of the antagonist systems.

And, first, of the expenses under that proposed by the bill. They were the erection of the two offices at Charleston and St. Louis. It had been seen, however, that the erection of an office at Charleston would be probably avoided; that the Government now owned a custom-house at that place, and that rooms for an office for the receiver general of public moneys there might be procured in that building; that the necessary vaults would be required to be constructed, and the rooms fitted up and prepared for this use, which would be the whole expense at that point for erections. The estimate of the Department, for these purposes, was two thousand dollars. For the expenses of a site, the erection of the necessary building, and the construction of vaults and safes within it, at St. Louis, the Department supposed an expense of from four thousand five hundred to five thousand dollars would be incurred. From inquiry made of gentlemen intimately and personally acquainted with the prices of property and building materials at that place, he presumed the expense might be above the estimate of the Department. It was said that the cost of a suitable site, at a proper location within the business part of the town, would be some three or four thousand dollars at the least. In this event, the estimate would be much too low, and it was just to the Secretary of the Treasury to say that the estimate of the Department was accompanied with a declaration that no local information was possessed, such as was required to approximate towards perfect accuracy. The estimates were from six thousand five hundred to seven thousand dollars. He would suppose they were too low by three thousand dollars, and that an expenditure of ten thousand dollars would be incurred for these erections at the two points. He had been more particular and detailed upon this item of the proposed expenditures, because he was well advised that the most persevering efforts had been made, and were constantly making, to represent the intention to be to erect palaces, and splendid edifices, for these humble offices? He had no other answer to give to these mistakes than to present the estimates of the proper department of the Government—of that department which was charged by the bill with the erection of the buildings not only, but with the direction of the plans upon which they were to be erected, thus showing, as perfectly as mere intention can be shown, the views of the Government as to the scale of extravagance or economy designed by it in this particular; and to say that Congress was the only branch of the Government which could be looked to for the means to make any erections whatsoever, and that its appropriations must measure the expense, and consequently the extravagance or economy of the executors of the law.

The next, and only other item of expense, under the bill, would be the pay of the officers and clerks employed. The number of additional officers whose appointments were provided for was four, and he would assume that their combined salaries would not be less than eight, nor more than twelve, thousand dollars. They were to be placed in responsible trusts, and ought to be citizens of elevated standing and tried moral integrity. He could not suppose, therefore, that any one would wish to assign them salaries of less than two thousand dollars each, and he did not think that the salary of any one of them should exceed three thousand dollars. For the sake of the argument, he would call this expense twelve thousand dollars.

It might be necessary to employ from six to twelve additional clerks, under the various provisions of the bill. Their combined pay might amount to from six to ten thousand dollars. He thought the estimate, both as to the number of clerks, and as to the amount of compensation, very high. Both, however, were his own, as he had asked no estimate from the Department upon this point, and he was willing to assume the highest of his suppositions to be the true standard of expense for these two objects.

These last are regular annual expenses, and are, therefore, to be considered as the constant charge upon the public Treasury of the system proposed. The cost of the erections is a single expense, which, being once incurred and paid, is done with.

What, then, are the expenses of the State bank deposite system? If the deposites are open and general, and the banks have the use of the public money as a compensation for their agency, the expense is nothing, directly. The use pays for the keeping, as it most assuredly should when the money is not, in fact, kept, but used. He should have occasion, however, very soon, to hint at the indirect expenses to the United States of such a system of bank deposites.

But suppose a system of special deposites be established, and the banks be effectually prohibited from the use, for any purpose, of the money of the people in their keeping, how then will stand the question of expense? A commission upon the money deposited must be paid to the bank for its trouble and risk. He was wholly unable to say what that commission ought to be, or what Congress would be compelled to make it, to induce the banks to accept the trust. He had found, however, from a comparison of various rates of commission with the ordinary amounts of revenue collected under the existing laws, and with the estimate of the revenue for the current year, that one-eighth of one per cent. would amount to from twenty-five to twenty-eight thousand dollars, as the constant and current expenses of a special deposite system.

How, then, stands the comparison? It had been seen that the annual expenses of the system proposed by the bill would, in the payment of officers and clerks, vary from fourteen to twenty-two thousand dollars, and that the last would be the highest amount to which those expenditures could rise under that system, were Congress to adopt it as reported by the committee. The expenditures for erections might be added, if gentlemen chose, and the average made, upon any given number of years, which, in the judgment of any member of the Senate, would afford a fair trial to any financial system, adapted to the operations of the National Treasury, and conforming as strictly to the great mass of private and corporate interests in the country, as the constitutional powers of Congress would permit that conformation to be made. He could not see, therefore, that any system, formed upon the basis of special deposites in banks, could, in point of expense, possess advantages over the bill under discussion. He had not forgotten that that bill adopted a partial system of special deposites, and that it contemplated a payment of a commission to the banks, which should keep the public money pursuant to its provisions; but he assumed that the difference of amount in the above estimate for the respective systems, was more than sufficient to cover any commissions which a fair execution of the provisions of the bill would call out of the public Treasury, to be paid to the banks. The most important points in the country, both as to the collection and disbursement of the public money, were provided for, independently of the provisions for a special deposite. The commissions, therefore, could be made applicable to but a mere fraction of the whole revenue; and, at any contemplated rate, the whole amount could never exceed a few thousand dollars.

He had made a reference to the indirect expenses of an open and general State bank deposite system, where the services and risks of the banks were compensated by the use of the public money. Need he, at this time, and in the present condition of the State banks, and of the public funds, define his meaning in that reference? Why was the special convocation of Congress rendered necessary in September last? Was it not the suspension of the banks to pay specie for their paper, and the consequent inability of the public Treasury to obtain from them, in any currency conformable to law, the millions of the public money entrusted to their safe-keeping, and required for the current expenditures of the Government? No one would deny this position. What the expense to the people of the United States was, for that single extra session of Congress, he had not taken the trouble to inform himself, but this he would venture to assert with perfect confidence, that those expenses more than equalled the money required to carry on the system of finance, proposed by the bill, for any period of ten years. He would not now bring into notice the losses which might yet be sustained before the experiment of the late State bank deposite system should be finally closed. He did not wish to say any thing unfavorable to the eventual solvency, and safety, and security of those institutions. He did not wish to bring any distrust upon them. Much less would he repeat, here, the daily rumors of that portion of the public press which most strenuously opposed this measure, of the entire failure of this and that and the other "pet bank;" of the sixty thousand dollars here, and forty thousand dollars there, and untold thousands somewhere else, lost to the people, by this experiment-trying Administration, in consequence of the employment of these State banks as fiscal agents of the public Treasury. He hoped and believed these pictures were overdrawn; he was content to suppose, for the purpose of this argument, that not one dollar was to be thus lost, and yet he trusted he had shown that the system proposed by the bill, for the management of the national finances, was more economical and less expensive to the tax-paying public, than either a system of general or special State bank deposites.

Third. His next point of comparison should be the patronage conferred upon the Executive branch of the Government by the antagonist systems.

It had been already seen that the system proposed by the bill required the appointment of four additional officers, with salaries of from two to three thousand dollars. This was a direct increase of the Executive power and patronage; but when it should be recollected how many officers, with equal salaries, already existed, and with how much facility officers were added to that number, at almost every session of Congress, and in almost every one of the Executive departments, he must hope that no unreasonable alarm would be felt in any quarter of the house by this very limited addition to the existing number. If they were not to be constitutionally appointed, or if, being so appointed, duties were to be assigned to them not of a character compatible with our civil and political institutions, then the offices ought not to be created, or the duties assigned, regardless of all consequences which the rejection of the proposition might bring upon the country. If, however, the appointments are to be constitutionally made, and the duties of the officers seem to be necessary to the public service, he must be permitted to say that he reposed too confidently upon the intelligence of the American people, to suppose they would condemn the measure, because its details called for such an accession of Executive strength to carry out their wishes. He would not permit himself so far to distrust the confidence of our citizens in the Government of their choice, as to believe that they would not feel perfectly safe in the decisions of Congress as to the offices to be created, and in the President and Senate to select the persons to fill those offices.

Was it, could it be, true, that a greater or safer trust was to be placed in local banking incorporations, than could be placed in the constituted authorities of our Government, as organized under the Constitution? Were the tax-paying citizens of our Republic afraid to entrust the safe-keeping of the national treasure to officers of their own choice, and responsible to them and to the laws of Congress, and anxious to confide it to banks, not created by national authority, over which no branch of the National Government had any control, and in the management of which neither the people nor their Government had any voice? He did not believe this was the state of public opinion. He did not believe that distrust towards our national authorities had yet gained this extent. He was not ready to admit that banks, such as our State banks now are, and with the recent experience of the danger of resting the operations of the public Treasury upon them, were more the favorites of the people of this country than their own well-tried and faithful servants.

It was not his wish or design, he would repeat again, to say any thing unjust or injurious to these institutions. Within their proper spheres they were convenient and useful, but recent events had perfectly satisfied his mind that they were not the fit keepers of the treasure or treasury of a nation; that this important incident to national independence ought not to be committed to the charge of institutions whose interests leaned so strongly towards a hazardous misapplication of such a trust.

Was it, could it have been, contemplated by the framers of our system of Government, that they had provided no fit and trustworthy depository of the national finances? That banks, incorporations, private incorporations, chartered for private uses, owned by private individuals, and managed by persons responsible only to the stockholders, must be called in to sustain the most delicate trust under any Government? That the will of these institutions must be consulted as to the terms upon which they would consent to accept the trust, and that all the authorities of the country, Congrsss itself included, must cater with them for terms upon which the money of a free people could be kept and paid out, and as to the character of the currency which either should be permitted to enjoy? Had propositions to this effect been submitted to the convention which framed the Constitution, what would have been their fate? Does any one believe they would now have been found in that Constitution which is the pride of freemen every where? No: such dependence upon such aid would have found no countenance there. Can it find countenance in the Senate now?

Could any one doubt, then, that the people's money should be confided to the people's servants, o their officers, responsible to them and to their laws? and that the appointment of such and so many officers as should be found necessary to perform this trust in a manner safe and convenient to the Treasury, and to the people themselves, was not only in strict conformity with the Constitution, and the very nature of our civil institutions, but an imperious duty upon every Congress? He could entertain no doubts upon either point.

There was another direct grant of Executive patronage and power under the bill—the authority to appoint the necessary clerks to perform the mechanical duties required, when they could not be performed by the officers to whose keeping the money was to be entrusted—and it had been seen that this might involve the selection and appointment of from six to t velve clerks. He would consume no time in commenting upon this grant of power; the mere statement of the fact should suffice.

These two were the only direct grants of Executive patronage which the bill proposed to make; but it seemed to be supposed that the power and influence of the Executive was to be immensely and dangerously increased over all the officers charged with the keeping of any portion of the public money; and this idea formed one of the most weighty objections against the system, How, he would ask, is this inference derived? Not one cent of additional compensation is proposed to be given to any one of the existing executive officers, in consequence of the additional duties imposed upon them by this bill. They were all now subject to removal from office by the President, at his pleasure. Whence, then, was he to derive this increased power over them? Could he command the money in their hands? No: unless he was ready to commit a direct infraction of the Constitution, and the officer to subject himself to protracted imprisonment and infamous punishment. The bill provides that all money, in the hands of every depositary, shall be held as there to the credit of the Treasurer, or, in other words, as in the Treasury; and the Constitution declares that no money shall be taken from the Treasury but in conformity to appropriations made by law. The bill makes any unlawful use of the money, by the officer in whose charge it is, punishable by imprisonment for a term not less than two years. To let the President have the money would be as criminal, under the law, as to let any other citizen of the country have it, and detection would be as certain in the one case as the other. The only difference would be that the President, if he were to make himself the knowing recipient, would subject himself to impeachment for the violation of the Constitution and the fraud upon the Treasury; whereas the citizen would incur no criminal liability whatsoever. Where, then, is the dangerous increase of power given to the President? Suppose he remove the officer: the money is still, in a legal sense, in the Treasury. He gains no access to it by the removal, and if he did, he could make no use of it without a violation of the Constitution. It was easy to see that this system would impose great additional responsibility upon the President, as he must select all the persons who are to be entrusted with public money, and it is his duty to see that they all obey, observe, and execute the law. He would venture the assertion that no honest man who was to hold the office of President, consulting merely his personal interests and responsibilities, separate from his sense of the public good, would desire the passage of this law. He could see nothing desirable to that officer personally to grow out of it, while he could see a fearful load of personal responsibility in every feature of the system.

But the officers who were to keep the public money, were also executive officers, and perhaps it was here, and not with the President, that this great increase of Executive power was apprehended. The same inquiries were alike applicable to this suggestion. How could the possession of money by the officer, which he could only use in pursuance of appropriations made by law, without subjecting himself to the severest punishment, increase the power and influence of that officer with his fellow-citizens? Suppose he should become corrupt and violate the law. Would not every respectable man whom he should approach, shun and avoid him, and could the certainty of detection give him time to establish an influence, based upon the power of the money embezzled, which would be dangerous to public liberty? Most certainly not. In this, as in the case of the President, the responsibility, not the power and influence, of the officer would be increased.

Such was the view he was compelled to take of the charge of Executive patronage made against tha financial system proposed by the bill, in its present form; but the imaginations of some had carried them beyond the present propositions, and induced them to fear that this was the mere commencement, the entering wedge, to a multiplication of Executive officers, until they should cover the whole land, like the locusts of Egypt, and eat out the substance of the people. Where was the foundation for this apprehension? With whom rested the power of increasing officers of any character? Not, certainly, with the Executive. He can act in selecting men for office, when the offices are created by Congress, and, with certain exceptions, he can remove men from office, at his pleasure; but he can create no office, nor can he multiply the number of officers, of any grade or character. This, then, is not an objection against the Executive, but against the legislative power of the Government; it is an objection which implies distrust, not of the President, but of ourselves. And are we afraid to trust ourselves in this matter, or do we stand in so much fear of those who may succeed us in these seats, that we would rather commit the finances of the country to incorporated banks, than to the present or future representatives of the people and the States?

But how stands the objection of Executiye patronage, as applied to the State bank deposite system? The first step in this system is the selection of some twenty, thirty, or more banks, to do which the direct interest of all their officers, directors and stockholders, must be addressed, and, when selected, the same interest is enlisted in whatever contract may be made. Here is, at once, an army of new persons brought within the reach of Executive power, not, like the salary officer, upon stipulated compensations, but whose interests are wholly dependent upon the extent of the patronage bestowed—upon the amount of money entrusted to their charge. Then come up the competitions and appliances to obtain a selection, and the inducement to a vicious Executive to excite hopes and create expectations, throughout the whole line of banking institutions in all the States. But the selections are made, the money deposited and passed to the citizens, among the other accommodations of the favored banks. This creates another influence far more extended and fearful—the influence of the debtors of the selected banks; for when appropriations are made by law, the executive officers—those who are charged with the execution of the law—must direct the drafts which are to bring the money from the banks to meet them. Let any unprejudiced mind compare the influences here embodied with the Executive patronage conferred by the bill under discussion, and can the decision be in favor of the bank system, in this respect?

But there is another view of this matter. He had shown that, under the system proposed by the bill, the Executive could not reach the money in the hands of the depositary without subjecting both to condign punishment. How is it here? Suppose the Executive corrupt, and the bank willing to be corrupted, or the reverse, and what is to hinder his obtaining any amount of the public money he pleases? He takes it not as the money of the people, but as the money of the bank. It is not, in form, a loan from the public money on deposite, but an accommodation in the usual course of banking business; and still, before the depositing officer shall have left the counter of the institution, the Executive may take the money he deposites, and no one is punishable. The depositing officer himself, any other executive officer of the Government, may do the same thing, with equal impunity.

Has the system provided for by the bill, then, any thing to fear from a comparison with that of the State bank deposite system, as to the dangers of an increase of Executive patronage? He could not so suppose.

Fourth. He would now institute a short comparison of what he thought would be the relative effects of the two systems upon the State banking institutions themselves.

The system proposed by the bill would necessarily operate as a check upon the issues and expansions of those institutions, in either shape in which it had been proposed to pass it. If the notes of the banks continue to be received in payment of the public dues, and the depositaries are directed, as in that case they unquestionably should be, to call frequently, and at short intervals, for the balances against the banks, and to demand specie for those balances, this must operate as a powerful check upon all the banks in the vicinity of those depositaries where the collections are large. If, on the other hand, the receipt of the bank notes be gradually discontinued in the collection of the revenue, and specie collections substituted, while the change will create some demand upon the banks for specie, the disbursements of specie by the Government will constantly distribute among the people a broader and more permanent basis for the paper circulation, which the banks will, of course, continue, growing out of their private operations. That the demand for specie may, to some extent, diminish the profits of banking, is more than probable; but if the effect shall be to restrain the issues of the banks, to keep upon them a constant sense of the necessity of more specie capital to meet their liabilities, the operation, as past experience abundantly proves, will be greatly beneficial to the community, and will work rather a benefit than an injury to the institutions themselves. In the mean time, the disbursement, by the Government, of the specie it receives, cannot fail, not only to give stability and confidence, to some extent, at least, to the general currency, by continuing in active circulation some portions of the gold and silver upon which the whole is based, but must, to the extent of the circulation, have a tendency to strengthen the banks against sudden pressures, and unfounded distrusts, by enabling them, the more easily to arm themselves with coin.

What are the tendencies of the opposite system upon the banking institutions? Recent experience has answered this inquiry more forcibly than it was in his power to command language to answer it. The effect was to promote fearful expansions when large amounts of public money were placed upon deposite, and ruinous contractions when the necessities or the policy of the Government required its payment. The effect was to stimulate to dangerous excesses, not the banks only, but their customers also, when money was abundant in the Treasury, and to add to the pressure, by heavy calls from the Treasury, when there was a scarcity. In short, the effect of the latter system upon the banks had proved, upon trial, to be unmixed evil, while the influences of the former promised to be rather favorable than unfavorable.

Fifth. The next and most important comparison between the two systems, was the influence of each upon the Government of the country and its finances. The proposed system would place the money of the Government, at all times, within the power and control of the Government. It would enable the Government, at all times, to pay its debts in a currency not depreciated, a currency equal to the standard of the Constitution and the law. It would render the Government financially independent, and maintain it in that position. Under such a system we should no more hear, what we were now daily hearing in this hall, that honest citizens had been defrauded, by being paid their demands against the Treasury in bank paper, which was depreciated, or worthless, and that Congress ought to indemnify them for their losses thus occasioned. These were some of the benefits certain to be derived to the Government from the adoption of the system provided for by the bill; but there was another, and, in his judgment, far greater benefit, equally certain to flow from its adoption. It would exempt the Government from the constant and innumerable imputations of injuries to trade, to the currency, to credit, to the private affairs of individuals and banks, from its financial movements. Was any person whom he addressed insensible to the moral and political evils growing out of these complaints? To their strong tendency to alienate the feelings of the people from our most valuable institutions, and to bring them to look upon all government as a curse and not a blessing; as calculated, not for their protection, but destruction and ruin? He would remind the Senate, very briefly, of the course of these complaints for the last four years.

The Government removed the public money from one single bank and placed it in several others. A clamor followed the act; a panic was excited; banks failed, merchants failed, money was made scarce, the currency was disturbed, credit received a shock, and, for some four months in succession, we heard nothing here but scenes of distress, general ruin, and almost famine; and all in a time of as great plenty and abundance, not of the necessaries of life only, but of money, as our country had ever witnessed. The panic passed off, and business of every description, and enterprise of every character, sprung into increased life and activity. The public lands commenced to sell rapidly, and our revenues became excessive. Then came the second complaint, which he proposed to notice; and it was that the whole splendid public domain, that rich inheritance from our fathers of the Revolution, under the operation of the "pet bank system," was going or gone; was being exchanged, for what? For "bank rags." That complaint lasted us for the most of one session of Congress, but nothing was done, by legislation, to remedy the evil. The accumulations of revenue had by this time come to be vast, and this gave rise to a third complaint. It was double in its character and contradictory with itself, and yet it entertained us during a large share of one of our sessions, and finally produced legislation. It was, to-day, that the Government was actually locking up in the banks all the money of the country, while the honest and hard-working citizens were suffering for its use. To-morrow, the almost countless millions were loaned by the pet banks to favorites of the Executive, and members of the dominant political party, to enable them to make speculations in the public lands, and in all other descriptions of property, to the injury of fair business men, and the ruin of the poor. So far were these complaints carried, inconsistent and contradictory as they were, as to make a sensible impression upon the public mind, and finally to induce almost all the members of this body to vote for the deposite law of 1836, which was to dissipate this hoarded fund, and place it in safe keeping with the States. The Secretary of the Treasury commenced the necessary measures to execute this law, and very soon found that the money which had been so injuriously hoarded, in our debates here, had been, in fact, rather too much dissipated before Congress interfered with it. This raised another complaint. The Secretary was wantonly executing the law, because he did not like its provisions. He was giving drafts upon the banks which had the money, for acceptance and payment, as the law required; when, if he had given them for transfer merely, the banks would not have been injured. During the first part of this process, the sale of the public lands continued at an accelerated pace; and, although Congress made a strenuous, but fruitless, effort to remedy the evil, the complaint commenced again that the public domain was being exchanged for irresponsible bank paper. The President took up the subject, after Congress left it, and directed the land officers to receive nothing but gold and silver in payment for lands. This laid the foundation for a new and continuing complaint. The payment of the immense deposites to the States produced the necessity for equal collections on the part of the deposite banks from their customers. These collections occasioned a scarcity of money, and it was the "Specie Circular" which had done it. Their foreign debts pressed upon the merchants, and the calls upon them from the banks disenabled them to pay; but the Specie Circular had wrought the mischief, by marching all the gold and silver of the country to the West to purchase lands. Embarrassments continued to increase; extensive failures of merchants and others took place; and, finally, in May last, all the banks of the country suspended payment. Still the Government was principally in fault; the Specie Circular had taken all the metallic currency to the interior, and prevented it from going to Europe to pay our foreign debt; and the banks could not pay specie until that debt was cancelled. Time passed on. The funds of the Treasury were in the banks, and could not be commanded, and an extra call of Congress became necessary to relieve the debtors of the Government, and supply the Treasury with funds. The banks were complained of, for their excesses and improvidence; and the fault was that of the Government, for having placed in their hands such immense deposites, to be called for so suddenly, and for having checked their excessive issues of paper by the Specie Circular. Congress was convened, and the present President transmitted his Message, proposing to end these complaints by an entire severance of all business connection between he National Treasury and the banking institutions. This, at once, changed the face of things, and showed the President and the Administration hostile to the banks; and now, although the foreign debt is paid, and foreign exchange down to par, the banks cannot resume payment for fear of the Government.

He would ask, in all candor, and in all sincerity, if any history of facts could show, more conclusively, the impropriety of this connection between the finances of the country and the affairs of individuals and banking incorporations? If there was a man who heard him, who did not see and feel the necessity of relieving the Government of his country from these constant and contradictory complaints? The proposed system will do that, and, in his judgment, that alone would be one of the greatest benefits which could be conferred upon the nation.

If such will be the influences upon our finances and Government, of the system proposed, what influences are to be expected from the State bank system? Certainly, to place the money of the people beyond the control of the servants of the people, and within the control of the banks; to disenable the Government to pay its debts, except in a depreciated currency, whenever the notes of the banks are depreciated; or to abandon its money, collected and accumulated in the banks to meet its debts, as a resource for that purpose, and to resort to its credit to raise the means by which legal payments can be made; to render the country, at all times, under all circumstances, and in every emergency, even that of war not excepted, and after the money for the public use has been collected from the people, financially dependent upon banks, in the management of which it has no voice, and over which it has no control; to subject the Government to all the complaints which have been recapitulated, and volumes of others of a like character; in short, to subject the Treasury of the nation to all the fluctuations, to which an ordinary banking or commercial house is subject; to make it instrumental in promoting excesses in both, and then chargeable with all the evils which may befall either itself, or the banking and mercantile interests. Should he spend the time of the Senate to prove that these were the necessary consequences of the system of State bank deposites? In the face of recent and severe experience both to the Treasury and to the country, would proof of these positions be called for? That experience furnished the clearest and strongest proof, and those whom it had not convinced, it was in vain for him to attempt to convince, by fact or argument. Such, to his mind, were the comparative influences of the two systems upon the Government of the country and its finances.

Sixth. He would extend his comparison to a single other point—the influence of each system upon the general currency, and dismiss this part of the argument.

The system proposed was clear and certain in its action, in this particular. It would secure a sound and standard currency for the National Treasury, whether that currency should be gold and silver or bank paper, and it would exempt that Treasury from the fluctuations of an unregulated and varying currency. So far, therefore, as the money operations of the Government could influence the currency generally, the influence exerted by this system must be salutary, as it must be to sustain a general currency equal to its own standard. If that currency should come, in time, to be gold and silver only, the system would exer another beneficial influence. It would not only present a standard of currency worthy of imitation, but, to the extent of the whole public disbursements, it would constantly circulate among the people a basis for the paper currency of the State banks, and thus aid them in keeping their representation of coin stable and firm, and equal in value to coin itself. Beyond these influences, it would leave the people and the States to regulate, in their own way, and without the interference of federal power, that portion of the general currency which, by the divisions of power under our system, falls within their jurisdiction and is the constant subject of their action. It would then be clear to all, if that portion of the currency should sink below the standard of currency for the public Treasury, that wrong existed somewhere in State legislation, or in the management of those entrusted by State legislation with the regulation of that currency; and the federal authorities would be free from imputation or suspicion, and would stand before the whole country holding up the true standard of currency, and inviting from the State authorities a correction of the errors which should at any time disturb or depreciate that portion committed to their care.

How, in this respect, does the opposite system act? The State banks are, to much the greatest, if not to the entire, extent, private institutions, controlled by private individuals and private interests, and owned in whole, or to the extent of a majority of the capital, by private citizens, as private property. Private gain, then, as a necessary and natural consequence of the very constitution of these banks, was their principle of government, and, as an equally necessary and natural consequence, they would keep that portion of the currency which they were authorized to furnish for the country, at a sound, standard value, when private interest, and the prospect of private gain, should so direct, and they would suffer it to depreciate by the same rule. Give them the national treasure, and permit them to subject it to the fluctuations of their interest, and can a stable currency be expected, either for the Treasury or the people? Who are the legitimate customers of the banks? More particularly the merchants. Their business pervades not the whole of their own country only, but the whole civilized world. The laws of the States of the Union, therefore, are regulations much too limited for them; and even the laws and regulations of any single Government, as to either trade or currency, are but municipal in their character, when applied to their operations. Still they themselves have local habitations, and the case may well and frequently occur, when it is vastly more important to them that they should be able to command specie to export, in liquidation of their foreign debts, than that our local banks at home should redeem their notes in specie. What, in such a condition of trade and of the mercantile interest, will always be likely to be the condition of our local banks? Set aside the consideration that the merchants may be able to control those institutions from the stock they hold, and merely assume that they are the principal debtors to the banks, and are to continue to be their principal customers. Let the argument rest here, and give the banks the possession and control of the national treasure. Which interest would prevail? Would the Treasury of the country be sustained, and the payments to the public creditors be made in specie, or its equivalent, or would the views and wishes of the merchants be consulted, and the currency be made to bend to private and corporate interests? Let the experience of the last year answer the inquiry. He would express his confirmed opinion, that, under such a system, the currency of the public Treasury must share all the reverses and fluctuations of foreign and domestic trade, and all the hazards of corporate banking, as a private interest. Hence the operations of the Treasury itself must be suspended, or the law of Congress, as to currency, violated, whenever revulsions shall oppress the country, and the customers of the banks, or the alternative be resorted to, as it recently has been, by the national authorities, to convoke Congress, relieve the banks and the public debtors, and resort to the credit of the nation to sustain its Treasury, until the natural operations of healthful business shall again restore the equilibrium.

Such, in his mind, were the probable influences of the two systems upon the general currency of the country.

He would now proceed to answer a very few of the prominent objections made to the bill, and pass, as rapidly as possible, to his conclusion. The first of these objections which he would notice, was that the system proposed by the bill was an attack upon the State banking institutions, calculated to destroy their credit and usefulness. This, if true, was a grave charge, and therefore required some consideration. An attack must be an infringement of some vested right, or a course of treatment so manifestly against the public good as to partake of wantonness and immorality, or a spirit of revenge. Was any right of these institutions proposed to be infringed upon? Did their charters, granted by the States, for fixed and specified purposes, include among those purposes the safe-keeping, or profitable use, of the money of the whole country? Was there a provision that they should be fiscal agents of the National Treasury, or that their credit should be sustained by the money and credit of the people of the United States? No. No such provision was ever heard of in the charter of any State bank. No right of the institutions was, then, infringed, by withholding from them both the keeping and use of the public money.

Was any faith, or confidence, due from this Government to the States, or to these institutions of their creation, violated by the proposed separation? The States had chartered banks for particular locations, with capitals such as the locations seemed to demand, but would any one pretend that, in granting these charters, the State Legislatures had counted upon the money in the National Treasury, or the credit of the Federal Government, to sustain and make useful the banking institutions to which they were giving life and power, as banks of issue and discount? Did any State Legislature ever, by word or deed, cause it to be understood, either by the people, or the institutions, that banks of their creation were mere skeletons, powerless and helpless, and that the life and health-giving principle was to be breathed into them by an extension of the patronage of the Federal Government, in the shape of a profitable use of its money, and a command of its confidence and credit? Never. Had the Federal Government, by any act, or expression, authorized an expectation of this patronage and confidence, except upon conditions which had been violated by the banks, and had thus forced a separation between them and the treasure of the country? He was aware of no such act or expression. The separation exists, and has been forced upon the nation by the banks themselves, and the simple question is, shall we renew it? In what sense can the decision of that question, however that decision may be made, be an attack upon the banks? The idea was a mistaken one, and the objection, in any light in which it could be viewed, was unfounded and unjust.

He proposed, however, for the purpose of illustrating the truth of this conclusion, and making it more clear, to call to the minds of Senators a single chapter in our financial history. During forty years of the existence of the Government, under the Federal Constitution, a national bank had been in existence, and, he spoke from recollection, but he believed the national bank had been, for the whole period, the exclusive depository of the public money, and the exclusive fiscal agent of the Treasury. He was sure it was so during the twenty years' existence of the last national bank, and he thought it was so under the old bank. Then the State banks were not depositories of the national treasure, nor fiscal agents of the National Treasury, and had it ever been asserted that this legislation was an attack upon these institutions, or that their credit and usefulness were thereby destroyed? But, again: during the existence of the last Bank of the United States the notes of the State banks were not disbursed to the public creditors at all, and were not receivable in payment of the public dues but at the pleasure of the national bank, and then, as every bank bank receives the notes of its neighbor institution, to take them out of circulation, and return them promptly, to be converted into specie or specie funds. Did these State institutions languish and die under this Congressional legislation? Did they not rather take root and flourish, and become sound, and stable, and useful? Has not a large and powerful political party in this country ever contended that the checks and restraints, exercised by the national bank, during this period, over the State institutions, were salutary and proper? That it was a great balance wheel, regulating and equalising the movement of the whole complex machinery? What is proposed by the bill, but that, to the extent of its operations, the National Treasury shall form the same check and restraint upon the local banking institutions? That it shall keep the public money independent of them? That it shall either not receive their notes in payment of the public dues, or receiving, shall frequently present them for conversion into specie, or specie funds? The only difference will be that the Treasury will not enter into competition with the local banks in the business of banking; that it will leave that whole field to them, and merely content itself with a sound currency for its transactions. How, then, is it possible that those who saw such benign influences to the local institutions from the wholesome restraints of a national bank, should see such baneful effects to follow the same influences, when flowing from the public Treasury? should see there an attack upon the institutions, a prostration of their credit, and a total destruction of their usefulness?

He was aware that the system proposed was new, and substantially untried, so far as the legislation and the practice of our Government was concerned; and it would be admitted by all, that, as a new measure, it had met the full share of denunciation to which almost all changes from established custom, almost all reforms, however valuable and useful, are destined to meet, when presented in the mere shape of propositions for the acceptance of the public. It was not his habit to speak disrespectfully here of the actions or the motives of any; and he certainly did not intend, in the remark he was about to make, to express any want of charity towards the course or opinions of any side of the House, or any individual in it. He yielded to all that credit for purity of purpose and sincerity of intention, which he wished them to award to him; but he must say that he had never seen more active, zealous, and persevering efforts to forestall public opinion upon any measure of legislation, than had been used towards this, from the appearance of the Message of the President, at the extra session, to the present hour. He had seen this with the more deep regret, because some of the most respectable, intelligent, and influential, of those who had been friends and supporters of the Administration, and who, he trusted, were yet so, were among the most active in opposition to this measure. They so acted, because they so felt and so thought; and if they used efforts to prejudice the bill in the public mind, it was because they deprecated its passage as, in their judgments, injurious to the public interests.

He would entreat them, however, to pause and reflect. Experience had tested the imperfections of the State bank deposite system, of which they were advocates, while experience had done little to approve or condemn the system proposed by the bill. It had been in substantial operation since the suspension of specie payments by the banks, in May last. It was forced into operation by that suspension. It found the currency of the country deranged, the credit of the country depressed, and the business of the country prostrate and at a stand. He would not say that these were the consequences of the State bank deposite system. He had said upon that point all he intended to say; but it was matter of history that these disasters had come upon the country under the practical operation of that system. What had been the effect of the operation, for two-thirds of a year, of the system which it was supposed would destroy credit, depress property, discourage enterprise and exertion, and send the country back to a state of barbarism? Foreign exchanges had been, for some time, down to and below par, in our commercial markets; thus affording conclusive evidence that our foreign debt had been reduced within ordinary limits; domestic exchanges were rapidly approximating a healthful state, furnishing the same evidence that internal trade was gradually and steadily equalizing itself; property retained a fair value, and found a steady market; credit and confidence were gaining strength; and the banks, as a general remark, were recovering from their late excesses, and preparing for a speedy resumption of specie payments. Such seemed to be the history of our business prospects at the present moment. He did not mention these things to ascribe them to the operations of the National Treasury, or to the manner in which those operations had been conducted since the suspension of the banks, but to prove that the practical operation of a system for the management of our finances, such as is substantially provided for by the bill, had not had the effect to retard and defeat these great and beneficial business results, nor to repress the immense energies, and to cripple the vast resources, of our extended country.

Surely, then, so far as experience has afforded evidence, it offers no cause for discouragement to the friends of the measure, and inasmuch as opinions beyond that, whether favorable or unfavorable, are little more than conjecture, the opposers of the bill should not demand of us to surrender our favorable judgment, though thus slightly tested, in favor of a measure which repeated experiment, both in adversity and in prosperity, has proved to be delusive and dangerous.

The next objection he proposed to notice was, that the operations of the bill would be to separate the Government from the people, and to secure a sound currency for the public officers, and a base currency for the country.

This, again, was a startling objection, and required examination. Its first assumption was, that the tendency of the measure under discussion would be to separate the Government of the country from the people of the country; to elevate the former and depress the latter; and the second was, that the separation would be marked by a difference in the value of the currency to be provided for and secured to each. Had either of these assumptions any foundation in fact, or even in fair apprehension?

He had already attempted to show, and thought he had succeeded in showing, that the financial system proposed by the bill was preferable to the State bank deposite system in the following respects, namely: in the safety it afforded to the public moneys; in the expenses and risks attending its administration; in its salutary influences upon the banking institutions themselves; in the limitations of patronage added to the Executive branch of the Government; in the independence it secures to the Government financially, and the exemption it confers from injurious imputations; and in its tendency, to the full extent of the operations of the National Treasury, and of the exertion of all the constitutional power of this Government, to produce and maintain a sound and stable currency for the whole country. If he had succeeded in establishing these positions, would it, could it, be said, that a system possessing such advantages was calculated to produce separation and alienation between the people of the country and the Government of their choice? He could not believe it.

But the objection assumed that this separation was to grow out of the different currencies produced for the Government and the people, by the necessary action of the system. That the effect of the bill would be, and was intended to be, to produce and maintain a uniform and sound currency for the National Treasury, and for all who might have demands upon it, as well the officers of the Government as others, was most freely admitted. Indeed this was claimed as one of the principal merits of the system. But did it follow that, because the bill had this tendency, it would therefore tend to debase the general currency of the people? Certainly not. No such consequence followed. On the contrary, it had been already shown that, so far as it should exert any influence upon the general currency, that influence must be to raise that currency to a level with that secured to the Treasury. If, then, the people were to have a base currency, they were to have it, not in consequence of the bill, but in defiance of it; they were to receive it, not from the public Treasury, but from their own State banks; not from the evils of the legislation of Congress, but from the evils of State legislation. Did any one pretend that the bill could exert an influence to debase any portion of the currency upon which it had no direct action? He had not heard it so contended, and he felt sure that no such position would be assumed. If the currency upon which it did directly act, and the standard of which it regulated, were to be base, then it might be well apprehended that its indirect influence would be to draw down the general currency to its level; but as the gist of the complaint is, that the standard of currency it assumes for the Government is higher than that of the general currency, so it follows, by a parity of reasoning, that its indirect influence must be to raise the general currency to its standard.

In all this he was constrained most respectfully to ask where was the ground of complaint, unless gentlemen were ready to take the position that a sound, uniform, and standard currency could not be sustained in the country, and that, to avoid invidious distinctions between the Government and the people, the National Legislature, possessing the power to fix the standard of currency, should at once adopt a base standard, and thus conform the currency of the Treasury to that which it might be the interest of the local banking institutions to maintain. He did not believe that any advocate for such a doctrine was to be found here; but if such an one should appear, he had only first to deny the position wholly, and to assert that a sound currency could be sustained in this country, without an infringement upon the powers granted to Congress by the Constitution, for the means of accomplishing the object; and second, if the position should be granted, to deny the inference, and contend that it was the constitutional duty of Congress to keep the currency of the National Treasury up to the standard of gold and silver, in any event.

The next, and only other, objection he proposed to notice was, that the tendency of the system provided for by the bill, would be to withdraw from circulation and use, and to hoard in the several depositories, too great a portion of the gold and silver of the country.

He had but a brief answer to this objection. It never could be true at times when the revenue and expenditures of the Government were properly adjusted. If they were equal, as they should be, the receipts of revenue would be taken in one hand, and the disbursements for expenses would be made with the other. Nothing could be hoarded but the amount which the widely extended operations of the Treasury compelled it to keep in transitu; and that was just as much, and no more, hoarded than the money of the merchant at a distant point, either during the time that notice of its collection was travelling to him in the mail, or his draft for it was passing back to the point where the money was on deposite. This amount would vary from three to five millions of dollars, including the amount constantly retained in the mints in the process of coinage; and he would repeat that, when the revenue and expenditures should bear a just proportion to each other, as they always should, no further or more dangerous hoarding could take place under the bill.

But suppose that a time should again come when over-trading and speculation, in every branch of business, should commence the accumulation of another surplus revenue, such as had afflicted the country for the last few years, then, for himself, he should consider this tendency of the bill one of its most valuable features. Let over-trading go on, and speculations spread, and let the amounts paid for duties and lands be collected in gold and silver, and hoarded in the public Treasury and its depositories, except so much as is wanted to meet the fair expenditures of the Government, and how far does any man believe these deranging and injurious business excesses would proceed? Not, Mr. President, to the prostration of business and credit, and the currency of the country. No, sir: the banks, instead of promoting, would be compelled to arrest them, and to restore business to its legitimate and proper channels, before the country could receive a shock, or the people injury.

It was wrong for him, however, to spend the time of the Senate in the discussion of this objection, as it was expressly met by a provision in the bill. He referred to the twenty-first section, which made it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever there should be upon deposite to the credit of the Treasurer a sum greater than four millions of dollars, to dissipate the money so hoarded by an investment in National, or State stocks. This must relieve the apprehensions of all upon this point, as four millions was the greatest amount which could, at any one time, be permitted to remain in the possession and keeping of all the depositaries constituted by the bill. As, however, he had discussed the provisions of this section somewhat at length, in the course of his remarks upon the provisions of the bill generally, he would omit any further remarks here.

He had now closed what he proposed to say, having particular reference to the system of finance for the National Treasury, recommended by the committee, or as to the ostensible antagonist system of State bank deposites.

But there was a third alternative—a National Bank—which he must not omit to notice, in his extended discussion of this great subject. He was bound, however, after having so long trespassed upon the time of the Senate, to relieve the members from the apprehension that he was now to enter upon this interminable field of debate. No: nothing in this field presented to him matter for debate. He entertained the most firm convictions that the Constitution of the United States had conferred upon Congress no power to charter such an institution, but every argument upon that great question had been again and again presented to Congress and the nation, in a manner much more forcible, and from sources much more commanding, than any thing which could be advanced by him. It was, therefore, to him, a question not for discussion, but for action, and, unless his present views upon it should be radically changed, for negative action only.

He had heard, since he had been honored with a seat in this body, many ingenious arguments in favor of the power, but all had sought to derive it from necessity or expediency; and it was due to the authors of these arguments to say that, to his mind, no very nice distinction had been preserved between necessity and expediency. It had been said that a uniform currency was necessary for the country; that such a currency could not be produced or maintained without a National Bank; and that, therefore, Congress had the power to charter such an institution. That a uniform currency was expedient and highly desirable for our wide-spread country, no one could doubt; but that the country could get on very comfortably without such a currency, had been proved by the actual experience of several periods in our history. That a sound and standard currency was necessary to the existence of commerce, that such a currency could not be established and sustained in our country but by Congressional legislation, and that, therefore, Congress had the power to create, as well as to regulate, such a currency, has been contended here. No one will be disposed to question the position that a sound and standard currency is very desirable to a commercial country, but that commerce can be carried on, to a considerable extent, without money of any description, is a fact not to be questioned. These instances are mentioned, not to question the expedient and useful tendency of the arguments, so far as they go to show that a uniform currency is highly important to every civilized country, and that a sound medium of exchange is of the first utility in commerce, but to question how far the argument of necessity, in either case, can be safely relied upon as the basis of a grant of constitutional power, and to show that, in either argument, there is no little difficulty in settling the dispute as to where expediency and utility end, and necessity begins. For himself, he repudiated all such arguments, and all arguments of every character, founded upon simple necessity, as establishing grants of power under the Constitution of the United States in favor of the Congress of the United States.

A single remark upon the question of chartering a National Bank, as a mere matter of expediency, if all questions of constitutional power were out of the way, and he would dismiss this topic. The experience of his own time, the late proceedings of the late Bank of the United States, had satisfied his mind that the dangers to our political and civil institutions, from such an organized money power, vastly overbalance any anticipated benefits, and that, as a simple question of expediency, such an institution ought not to be chartered by Congress. Neither the hour of the day, the patience of the Senate, nor his own strength, would permit him to enter upon a further discussion of this point at present; and his only purpose having been to pronounce the opinion he had pronounced, he would pass to his conclusion.

The three alternatives had been presented. The condition of the public Treasury, of the currency, of the business of the country, and general public expectation, demanded action from Congress. The committee of which he was a member had presented to the Senate the bill upon the table, as the action which a majority of its members proposed. This bill was to be opposed from two sides of the house. The friends of the State bank deposite system, and the friends of a National Bank, were alike, and together, to be met and overcome, or the bill could not pass.

In this condition of the question, and of the Senate, he considered it to be his indispensable duty to present, what he believed to be the real and true issue, fairly and fully to the Senate and the country. And what was that?

In his judgment, it was the adoption of some system based upon the principles of the bill under discussion, or a National Bank. He saw no prospect of success for any middle ground. What were the evidences of our senses upon this subject? Look at the divisions in this body. The party friendly to a National Bank had always repudiated the State bank deposite system as dangerous in its additions to Executive power, as inefficient as to the currency, and as unsafe as to the public money. Was there any evidence that those members of that party here had changed their opinions as to that system? He knew of none; and were he to judge from the language of that portion of the public press which was supposed to reflect their opinions, or from what had but recently passed here in relation to the failure of a deposite bank in Boston, he should be compelled to say that no change in that quarter had taken place. But he would appeal to the gentlemen themselves, and ask if recent experience, as to that financial system for the National Treasury, had changed their feelings towards it? Had endeared it to them, as one they were now desirous to make their own? Are they willing to surrender their favorite project of a National Bank for this alternative? Will they not tell us, in frankness and candor, that, with one or two solitary exceptions perhaps, every man of them is for a National Bank, as, in their judgments, the only effectual remedy for the financial difficulties of the country?

If such continues to be the feeling of the party which opposed the late Administration, and equally opposes the present, what is the condition, in this respect, of those who have hitherto supported both? Is there not, numerically speaking, a very great degree of unanimity of sentiment with them, in favor of the bill, at least so far as a practical and bona fide separation from the banks is concerned? He supposed that to be the fact, and he referred to this division of feeling here, upon this subject, with no pleasure. He knew and felt that those with whom he had long, intimately, and pleasantly associated, personally and politically, were to differ with him upon this measure. He regretted the difference as much as any one of them could. He entertained no unkindness of feeling towards them on account of this difference of opinion upon a particular bill. He yielded to them all the sincerity of convictions of public duty which he claimed for himself; and he assured them, one and all, that no remark which he had made, or was about to make, had been, or should be, on his part, intended to wound their feelings, or censure their course. They, like himself, were responsible to their constituents and the country, for their acts here; and he did not entertain a doubt that that accountability would be discharged by them according to their most firm convictions of right. Yet he must appeal to them to say if they did not believe the public opinion of the country was very justly reflected in the two Houses of Congress upon the three alternative propositions he had discussed. If they had seen any evidence, from recent political results any where, to authorize the belief that the State bank system of deposites, to which they still adhered, was gaining favor in any quarter? If they did not perceive that the two other systems were dividing the great mass of the public mind of the whole country? If they did not feel, in the recent history and present condition of the State banks, that public confidence could not again be restored to that system of deposites by legislative enactments? If they did not fear that, in assuming the positions they were compelled to assume, that banks were necessary to the successful and proper administration of the finances of the Federal Government; that it is within the power, and is, in some sort, and to some extent, the duty of this Government to regulate the whole currency of the country; that the regulation of exchanges, too, if not directly, was incidentally a matter for which the Government should be held responsible; and that the custody and safe-keeping of the public treasure should be committed to banks, and not to the constituted authorities of the Government; did they not fear, he would repeat, that, in assuming these positions, they were merely aiding and strengthening the friends of a National Bank? That they were furnishing what might be considered as evidence to those who could listen to such an argument, to prove that a National Bank was necessary under our system? He did not put these inquiries from any thing which had been advanced here, but they were suggested from the course of argument which he saw constantly used in the public press and elsewhere, to sustain the ground which these friends had assumed, and he must say that it seemed to him like yielding the whole field to the advocates of a National Bank; that it was making such an institution, and some system founded upon the principles of the bill under discussion, the real alternatives before the country, and bringing the contest, if not here, elsewhere, to that issue.

He was sorry to have detained the Senate so long, and, as the best atonement he could make, he would resume his seat, and trouble them no farther.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION CASE.

SPEECH OF R. BARNWELL RHETT,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, February 3, 1838—Upon the Mississippi election.

Mr. SPEAKER: Were it not for the observations, which have fallen from the gentleman from Tennessee,* who has just taken his seat, with respect to the South Carolina delegation, reflecting in some degree, I think, upon their independence, and ascribing an influence upon them, on the part of my learned colleague,† which upon this subject does not exist, I should not have ventured to address the House, worn out and harrassed as it is, by weeks of procrastinated discussion, on this perplexing question. In order, however, properly to vindicate the independence of my own opinions, it may not be unnecessary, briefly to consider the question before the House; and to state the arguments, upon which I think this election should be returned to the people of Mississippi.

This House will recollect, that when, at the special session, it was about to organize itself into a legal assembly, I moved, that a chairman should be appointed to whom our credentials of election should be sent. Upon being opened by him and laid before us, we would be able to determine amongst ourselves, by our own judgment, from the face of the credentials, who were "prima facie" members of the 25th Congress. All undisputed seats would of course be filled; all doubtful ones would be suspended, or filled conditionally, until Congress being regularly organized, the disputed elections would be sent regularly to the committees, for their report and consideration. The House thought proper, however to proceed otherwise. They allowed the clerk of the previous Congress, to do what it was our duty to have done ourselves—determine, in the first instance, who were members of the 25th Congress. The consequence was, not a single credential of membership was produced; and all were sworn in, as members of Congress, whom this unauthorized individual had placed upon a list, made out from the newspapers of the day. Had the credentials of Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson been then produced, the objection, that this House at the last session, was in some degree ignorant of their purport, would not then have existed; and we might possibly, if there is any thing in the objection, have saved ourselves and the country, this long, expensive, and more irritating debate. After I had submitted the motion for the appointment of a chairman, fearing, from the observations which fell in the discussion, that it might be considered a party move, I rose and declared to the House, that I believed those gentlemen as fully entitled to their seats as any members upon the floor. Sir, I voted and I knew that I was about to vote, contrary to those gentlemen upon the election of Speaker which was then about to ensue. These gentlemen, voted for you; and I voted for the honorable gentleman from Tennessee.‡ Thus did I express my opinion upon this question, in advance of others, and contrary to my party predilections at the time, if I had any capable of biasing my judgment. And I have not changed my opinion since. It is true, however, that when the matter came to be discussed, and particularly by my learned colleague, who made the ablest exposition of its principles I had the opportunity of hearing, my confidence in the opinion I had formed was greatly shaken, and my doubts increased. My vote for the sitting members, was finally given, only upon the principle—that the presumption should be in favor of the popular right to a representation; that when the people of Mississippi, under all the forms of law, demanded a seat upon this floor for her Representatives, it lay upon those who denied the right, clearly to prove that it did not exist. The people of Mississippi should have the benefit of my doubts. Upon conviction alone ought their acts to be made void, and their Representatives be rejected. Well, sir, after hearing all, from every part of the House, I was not fully satisfied—I was not convinced, that their Representatives ought to be turned out of our doors; and I voted for the only other alternative left to me, that Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson were members of the 25th Congress of the United States. Nothing that has since occurred has, in the least, changed the nature of the question. It is now, as it was then, whether the July election held by the people of Mississippi was constitutional or not. If our decision, affirming the validity of this election was right, there is an end of the question. The subsequent action of the people of Mississippi, cannot in the least affect the relation which they then occupied towards us; and it is by that relation that the question, when reconsidered, is again to be determined. The principles and circumstances being now, substantially, the same that they were then, my vote has been, and shall be the same. The House, however, by a vote already taken, has expressed an opinion contrary to mine; and have declared that the July election was unconstitutional; and that the sitting members are not entitled to their seats. The new question, in this state of things, arises, whether the subsequent election in November is good, and the contestants should be allowed to take their seats as members of the 25th Congress—or the election should be sent back to the people. Those who contend that the election in November is good, maintain that the election in July being unconstitutional, was void "ab initio;" that the decision of this House confirming it gave no rights, and was obligatory neither upon this House nor the people of Mississippi; consequently, the election in November, regularly held, to fill a vacancy regularly produced by the operation of law, is good, and the contestants should be allowed to take their seats. I think I fairly state the question.

Now, sir, properly to understand the duty of Congress, we must ascertain what was the effect of the resolution passed by this House, determining that Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson were members of the 25th Congress. No one doubts—all concede, that this House is the sole, absolute, and final judge, under the Constitutution of the United States, of the election of its members. It may err in its judgment, but there is no other or higher tribunal to correct its errors. If this is so, its judgment, pronounced by the power of the Constitution, is simply an exposition of what the Constitution is; and, until reversed, becomes a part of the Constitution itself; as much so as the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is binding, as the supreme law of the land, upon this House, and the people of the United States represented within it, and upon the people of Mississippi. Its effect upon this House was, to fill two seats on this floor, and "de facto" and "de jure," to make the gentlemen who occupied them members of the 25th Congress. If these gentlemen were not in fact, and by right, members of the 25th Congress, then all of their acts upon this floor are void. Every motion they have made—every vote they have given, ought to be expunged from the journals of the House. You have not yet rescinded your resolution—reversed your judgment; and who, up to this moment, has ventured to question their right to speak and act as members of Congress, within this hall? Why do not gentlemen, who contend that the judgment of this House is not merely voidable, but, when reversed, will be void "ab initio," and, consequently, that Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson have never been members of the 25th Congress—why do they not carry out their principles into practice, and march boldly up to the far-famed process of expunging? It may be as little to their taste, as it is to mine;—but if their principles be correct, constitutional duty, which they have sworn to maintain, requires it. And on the people of Mississippi—what was the effect of the resolution of this House upon them? It placed them upon this floor, by their representatives, in council with their confederates. It gave them a voice and influence in all the legislation affecting all the people of the United States. It bound them here and at home,—in the Congress of the United States, and in their primary assemblies at the polls. It was a part of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore a part of the Constitution of Mississippi; and no law or action of the people of that State, could contravene or overrule it. Any election, therefore, held contrary to this supreme law of the land, to fill seats already constitutionally occupied—to supply a representation actually existing, was simply void. In this view, it is unnecessary to enter into any calculation of majorities; whether the contestants received a majority or minority of the votes cast at the November election. If they had received the vote of every man, woman, and child in Mississippi, it would not not in the least strengthen their right to seats upon this floor. The election would still be void. Its holding was illegal; the law under which it was held, so far as members of Congress was concerned, was overruled; and by us, can be treated only as if it had never been.

Against these positions, it has been urged, that they make Congress a despotism. If by a despotism be meant, uncontrollable and supreme authority upon the subjects committed to its exclusive jurisdiction, Congress, as well as every other supreme tribunal, is a despotism. Every supreme court in the land, is a despotism. But will gentlemen tell us, how society or any Government can exist, without such supreme tribunals? There must be a final arbiter somewhere, in all Governments, which binds the citizen and society, or every thing is put at hazard, liable to the continual charges of caprice and power. Recognise any other doctrine in the case before you, and where does it place the State of Mississippi? Above the Constitution—without the form or fact of sovereign interposition—controling and changing it whenever it comes in collision, even incidentally and without design, with any of her statutes; and she would dictate the law not only to her own citizens, and within her own limits, but to Congress and all the people of the United States. This far exceeds any power, hitherto maintained, as belonging to the States; and seems not a little strange when advanced from the quarter from which it comes. Sir, in my opinion, the election held in November, in Mississippi, is void, because contrary to the Constitution of the United States, as expounded by the decision of this House. There were then, no seats in Congress vacant. The people of Mississippi were then here, filling the seats which rightfully belonged to them,—bound as we were by the decision of this House;—and, until revoked, it is our law and their law. Consequently, when the House rescinds its resolution, the election must be returned to the people.

During the debate, many harsh reflections have been made upon this House, for its course upon this matter, at the special session. We did not seek the responsibility. It was thrown upon us, by the constitution and the people of Mississippi. Are gentlemen dissatisfied, that Congress should have the sole and final power of determining upon the election and qualifications of its members? This power is possessed by every legislative assembly in the Union, and, I believe, in the world. Was the power, in this instance, exercised honestly and fairly? No one has ventured to assert the contrary in direct terms;—but by suppositious cases and inuendos, it may be inferred, that a corrupt party spirit had controlled its determination. And from what is this inference drawn? From the fact, I presume, that gentlemen holding opposite opinions upon other great questions, have fallen in opposition upon this. Well, sir! the inference, if good for any thing, applies to both parties; and the charge of party corruption recoils, therefore, upon those who made it. Sir, the purest minds are seldom the most ready to impugn the motives of others. For my part, I cannot recognise the justice of these sweeping imputations upon the integrity of our associates. We are men, and therefore liable to the weaknesses of our nature; and I know how easily, with the very best intentions, our judgments are often swayed by our will. We are not beyond the influence of associates and our own strong desires. Hence, with the purest and most patriotic purpose to do our duty, we often find most upright and conscientious men, taking directly opposite sides of the same question. But what does this prove? Why, only that we are men; while it brings home to us the admonition, most carefully to strive to lift our minds, if possible, above the slavery of its feelings and passions. I doubt not, that in the main, the promotion of the public good and the maintenance of the public honor, are the grand design which actuate the votes and conduct of members upon this floor, in the discharge of their constitutional duties. And, sir, heretofore as now, this must have been the case, or our Republican systems would long since have been swept away. It is not intelligence which can maintain our institutions. The French legislative assembly was one of the most intelligent bodies ever assembled in the name of liberty. They failed for want of virtue—the virtue of christianity. And their intelligence only aided them in dispensing all evil, in the pursuit of imaginary good; and, at every step in blood, to show forth in all its horrors, the fierce depravity of our natures, when uncontrolled by the salutary influences of religion and virtue. The fact that amidst so many storms and contentions—so many risks and dangers, we have still been able to preserve our free institutions, and live together under a written Constitution, proves beyond all question, that the counsels within these walls must have been guided by sound principles of public duty. My inference in debate is, that every gentleman upon this floor acts conscientiously. I will not judge—I have no right to judge of his motives; and should I impugn those of another, what right have I to expect my own to be respected. This is the course of conduct towards each other, which the most ordinary charity demands; and permit me, sir, to add, which the dignity and character of this House requires. National character is national strength. It is the highest property of a people; and is essential to the obedience and veneration of the citizen at home, and the respect of nations abroad. If here, where the popular will and character of the people of the United States are concentrated, we are actuated by no higher motives than those of a corrupt party nature, the downfall of our institutions is inevitable, and our liberties must soon pass away.

Mr. Speaker, There is one other ground, upon which I think this election should be returned to the people. The principle will be admitted by all, though some may differ as to the propriety of its application. It is within the power, and it is the duty of this House, whenever it has reason to believe that an election has been unfair, and, therefore, might not be a correct expression of the popular will, to send it back to the people. This is the principle. Now, sir, was the election held in November, in Mississippi, a fair election? Resting upon the decision of this House, the gentlemen who, but a few months before, had obtained a large majority of the suffrages of the people, supposing themselves members of the 25th Congress, declined being candidates at the November election. They were not even present at the polls A one sided election took place under the hot canvassing of the able contestant who has addressed this House. I suppose that he might have used the same arguments with the people he has addressed to us: representing the decision of this House as a gross usurpation, a tyrannical infringement of the rights of of the people of Mississippi, to be redressed at all hazards; and those who would maintain it, and act upon the faith of its existence, as accessary to this outrage upon their liberties. The pride of the people, as freemen and citizens of Mississippi, might thus have been aroused—their passions inflamed—their judgments perverted. Now, I put it to gentlemen—is it possible that such an election could be fair? Without any opposition—with none to reply or defend—upon a question in which the nicest point of constitutional law were involved, and therefore, easily perverted—could such an election, however decided, be fair? Would any gentleman who hears me, be willing to stand such an election? If, under such circumstances, not a majority only, but every vote in Mississippi had been cast for the contestants, I should regard the election as an unfair expression of popular opinion, and I should return it to the people. I pretend not to dictate the conduct of others. I have no doubt the gentlemen who claim their seats under the November election, have as high a sense of integrity and honor as I can entertain. But with my views and information upon this subject, if I was in their situation, I would disdain to take my seat upon this floor. I would sit here, under a full, fair, and unprejudiced enunciation of the popular will, or I should remain forever without these walls. And this House, which has been, in part, the innocent cause of this partial election—what course does it become us to pursue? Admitting that we had the constitutional power—if we were to receive these gentlemen, what would we say to the sitting members, whom we have lulled into inaction and security by our resolution—to the people of Mississippi, who, in consequence of our resolution, might have been kept from the polls—and to the whole mass of electors who voted, but who may have voted under erroneous impulses, in consequence of our determination? Sir, I repeat, I will not question—I do not question, the perfect integrity of gentlemen who differ from me upon this subject; but thinking as I do, I would commit an act of injustice and dishonesty in my legislative capacity, if I did not return this election to this people. And, surely, this course ought not to give dissatisfaction to the people of Mississippi. They must perceive that they have been the ultimate cause of all the trouble and contention which has ensued. They must perceive, that if we erred in confirming the July election, it was from a sincere desire to uphold their rights and interests; and, if we now return the election to them, it is because we cannot consent to violate the Constitution of the United States, and add injustice to its violation.

I turn, Mr. Speaker, to the South Carolina delegation, who, it seems, have attracted the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee, in the course of his observations upon this subject. He seemed to suppose that our votes upon this question were not determined by our own views of right and duty, but by our deference to the opinion of my learned friend and colleague. Sir, whatever weight the opinion of such a man might have on other occasions, I think it most apparent that it has had but little upon this. Two of the delegation only voted with him, in favor of the sitting members; the rest voted against him; several of them, reversing the votes they gave on this question at the special session; and I, who voted with him, expressed my opinion on the subject, as I have already reminded the House, on the first day of the session, before my friend had even considered it. We know well his worth in counsel; but we know too, that our consciences are our own, and not another's; and that for a correct discharge of our public duties, we are alone responsible. Sir, in looking back to those who preceded us upon this floor, we find no subserviency to men—no obsequience to power—no base betrayal to party, of the great principles they maintainod, characterizing their bright career of honorable service to their country. However unworthy to stand in the distinguished places they once occupied, we intend, to the best of our ability, to maintain in our demeanor, unsullied by dishonor, and untainted by impurity, the fair fame they have bequeathed us upon this floor; and here, as well as elsewhere, ever to remember that we are the sons of South Carolina.

SPEECH OF MR. MARTIN,

OF ALABAMA,

In the House of Representatives, February 5, 1838—The following questions in relation to the case of the Mississippi election being under consideration:

The House had already adopted the following resolution, as an amendment:

"Resolved, That the resolution of this House of the 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, be rescinded, and that Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE are not duly elected members of the 25th Congress."

The question pending was on the following additional resolution, submitted by Mr. HOWARD of Maryland:

"Resolved, That Sergeant S. Prentiss and Thomas J. Word are not members of the Twenty-fifth Congress."

Mr. ROBERTSON had moved to strike out the word "not."

Mr. MARTIN being entitled to the floor, gave way first to Mr. GLASCOCK, who presented a statement from Mr. Claiborne, and again to Mr. HOWARD, who modified his resolution as follows:

"And that Messrs. Pentiss and Word are not entitled to seats on this floor as members of the 25th Congress."

Mr. MARTIN then addressed the House as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: In giving way for the modifications just made by the honorable mover (Mr. HOWARD of Maryland) to the resolution under consideration, I was simply extending to that gentleman the courtesy due to him in such a case; for with the technical form in which the question is presented, the remarks which I intend to submit will be found to have nothing to do. Nor do I intend to enter into an examination of the technicalities so elaborately discussed by all who have preceded me in this debate, which are involved in the writ of election of the Governor of Mississippi, and the proceedings had thereon in July last in that State. Indeed, sir, I shall not attempt to investigate that election, for its validity has had no influence in bringing my mind to the conclusion to which I have arrived upon the question immediately under consideration, in relation to the right of the applicants, Messrs. Prentiss and Word, to seats upon this floor as members from the State of Mississippi; for, however irregular the election in July may have been, this House, the only tribunal having cognizance of the question, did, by its solemn decision on the 3d of October last, declare it to be valid. That I may not be misunderstood, however, in regard to my opinion of that election, I will take this occasion to say that, upon full examination, I voted with the majority of the House upon that question, and have found no reason since to regret the vote, or to desire to change it. I am fully satisfied that the resolution to which I have referred, declaring the sitting members, Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE, duly elected members of the 25th Congress, was properly adopted by the House.

The right of the applicants to seats upon this floor as members, under the election held in November last, is the question now for consideration, and to that question I intend to march boldly up, as in my judgment a representative of the people should do, and discuss it fairly upon its merits; nor do I fear that I shall meet, in my way, any ground, either of merit or technicality, that will give me difficulty to overcome. Gentlemen of acknowledged ability have most zealously exerted themselves upon this question to prove the validity of that election: they have shown much research and industry in bringing to the view of the House all the authority which could aid them in sustaining it; they have left no means unessayed which might either tend to convince the judgment, or induce an acquiescence in the desired conclusion; and, to aid in this result, appeals are made to our passions and prejudices as partisans. These appeals, sir, I deeply regret, when thus brought to bear upon a grave constitutional question, involving, as this does, nothing less than the elective franchise.

In taking a view of this question, it is necessary that we should look to the facts and circumstances upon which the claim of the applicants to seats here is founded; and, to do so, it will be necessary that I should give a brief history of the case.

During the past summer, it was considered necessary by the President of the United States that the Twenty-fifth Congress should convene its first session on the first Monday in September last, and for that purpose, by his proclamation, ordered Congress to meet upon that day. By the laws of Mississippi, the time fixed for the election of her members to the present Congress was the first Monday and day following in November last. The Governor of that State, by his proclamation, ordered an election to be held in July, for the election of members to serve until superceded by those to be elected in November, the time fixed by law for holding the regular election. At the election in July, the sitting members were candidates, and were opposed by one of the applicants, (Mr. Prentiss) and another gentleman, the result of which was their return by a large majority of all the votes cast. At the meeting of the session thus called, the sitting members presented themselves, and having participated in the election of Speaker, as is usual in such cases by all the members returned, were duly sworn and took their seats. Some question being made by the honorable gentleman from Virginir, (Mr. MERCER) as to their right to seats as members, one of the sitting members, (Mr. GHOLSON,) called upon the House to institute an inquiry upon the subject, alleging, as his reason for doing so, that he wished the question settled in time for him to return to Mississippi, if he should be adjudged not entitled, before the time for holding the regular election in November, that the people might be informed, and hold another election. The House complied with that request, by the adoption of the resolution offered by that gentleman, referring the inquiry to the Committee of Elections, who, after examination, made their report, accompanied by a resolution declaring the sitting members duly elected members of the Twenty-fifth Congress; which resolution, so declaring, was, after full examnation and discussion, adopted by this House.

In addition to the legal presumption that the adoption of this resolution was known to the people of Mississippi, that fact was made known to them through the newspapers, and other channels of communication, by the sitting members, so that before the election in November, the electors of that State were fully informed of the decision of the House, and of the determination of the sitting members to rely upon that decision. These facts are admitted on all sides of the House. The applicants alone were candidates at the November election, obtaining a majority of the votes cast for Congress, but less than half of the whole vote polled at that election; and that, too, after a general canvass through the counties of the State by the applicants, as stated by Mr. Prentiss. These, I believe, sir, are most of the important facts and circumstances upon which this application is founded. There are certainly no others that I have heard which tend in the slightest degree to strengthen the claims of the applicants.

By the Constitution of the United States, this House is made the sole judge of the election, return, and qualification of its members; and under this authority we are now called upon to determine whether the election in November last, under all the circumstances attending it, has conferred the right upon the applicants here, to seats upon this floor as members of this House, as claimed by them.

No gentleman upon this floor, sir, entertains a higher respect and regard for the elective franchise than I do, nor is there one who would go further than I would to secure it to the people in its purity; and when, sir, I shall discover any attempt to abridge that sacred right here, or elsewhere, I shall not be found wanting in my best efforts for its preservation and protection. It has been well called the palladium of our liberty and institutions; and if, sir, it shall turn out that we are forgetful of our duty in the disposition which we shall make of the grave and important question under consideration, I shall look to the ballot box as the great corrector of this, as it has been in most cases heretofore of the wrongs committed by the servants of the people. And while on the one hand I would be among the first to sustain an election which I may be satisfied was fairly made by the people, on the other I should with equal promptness declare invalid one of which I might entertain a different opinion. And in deciding questions of doubtful character of this sort, I should feel bound to take that course which would threaten least danger to this great right, which would be to return it to the people for their further action.

Without entering into the inquiry at this moment, of the controlling influence which the decision of the House ought to have had upon the electors of the State of Mississippi, let me ask you, sir, from the facts before us, what effect it actually did have upon their action. What, sir, do the facts show us? We find two gentlemen, of fine talents, in the field, with none to oppose them, using great exertion, personally and through their friends, to induce a general vote for them throughout the State. The day is one of general election of all the important officers of the State, and nothing further necessary to be done than that of adding the names of the candidates for Congress to the ticket in their hand, for the people to vote for them; and this in one of the new Southern States, the population of which is composed of enterprising and intelligent citizens, from each of the other States, every man nearly able to write, with every facility for doing so, and in a State, too, ultra-Democratic in its form of Government, where all of the State officers are elected by the people, not even excepting the Judges of their Circuit and Supreme Courts; where every thing is done in accordance with the people's will, and where the people will every thing that is done; and where a failure by the people to express their will through the ballot box would destroy the Government of the State itself. In such a State, and under such circumstances, Mr. Speaker, what, I ask, would be the probable result? I have no hesitation in saying, sir, that with no great matter of principle to influence them, not one thousand out of the whole population who cast their votes at that election would have failed to vote for members to Congress. Now, sir, let us see how it did result. Why, sir, the applicants received less than half the votes polled at that election. Will any gentleman tell me that this strange result is of mere chance, and that it would ordinarily occur in such cases? None will venture to say so, who understand the character of the people of the South, and especially those of Mississippi. And, sir, I am surprised to hear gentlemen say that even this result is the loudest call that has emanated from that quarter. To my mind, sir, this result speaks volumes, but not, as gentlemen suppose, in favor of the validity of that election; very far from it. It satisfies me conclusively that some powerful and extraordinary influence was felt in that election. What other influence could have had this effect, so far as the evidence has made the disclosure, but the action of this House at the called session? And here I might ask again, was not that action of the House not only well calculated to produce such a result, but would it not necessarily do so? Propound this question to any man of plain common sense, and what would be his reply? In the affirmative, without doubt. Then, sir, if, by our action, we have prevented the people from fairly expressing their opinions and will, in the election of representatives upon this floor, can we for one moment hesitate to correct our error while we may, and restore to them their rights and privileges?

My friend from Virginia (Mr. Patton) seems to suppose that the vote polled for the applicants, although less than half that were cast, is extraordinarily large; and as proof that it is so, cites his own election last spring, in which he says, that having no opposition, he received, out of a district of 5,000 voters, but 200 votes. This may do in his part of the country; but we do things very differently in the South. In my district, sir, I ran alone for the Twenty-fourth Congress; and out of a district of some 7,000 voters, I received over 6,000 votes. In three of the largest counties, I lost less than 35 votes; and that, too, without a great deal of exertion, much less, at any rate, than Mr. PRENTISS informed us he used. I mention this case, by way of set-off to that of my friend from Virginia; and although not conclusive, yet it affords some evidence of our course in such things in the South. But, sir, the case of my friend from Virginia, I presume, falls short of a parallel with the one under consideration. It appears that in three counties in Mississippi, not one vote was cast for Congress. Will the gentleman say that the inhabitants of those counties felt no interest in so important an election? Was there no man in either of those counties who wished to be represented upon this floor? Did the citizens of any one county in his district, all refuse to vote for him? I did not so understand him to say, nor do I suppose it can have been so. Can this result have been the offspring of mere chance also? If so, sir, I question if the world shall ever see its like again; and certainly not, I would say, until the people of the South undergo such a change in their mode of thinking and acting, as must be the work of many years.

But, sir, in addition to the influence which the resolution of the House actually had upon the election in November, in preventing a full and fair expression of the people's will, and whether that influence was properly or improperly estimated by them, the result must control my judgment in determining it to be invalid. Yet I contend further, that while that resolution remained unrescinded, it was obligatory upon the people of Mississippi, and rendered void any election held by them to fill seats at that time occupied by the sitting members under it, being contrary to the law of the case, which that resolution certainly was.

By the Constitution of the United States, as I have remarked, this House is given the exclusive power to judge of the election, return, and qualification of its members; and in the exercise of that power, its decisions, emanating from that instrument, are equal in validity with the Constitution itself, and obligatory upon all the people of this Union. If this be true, (of which I entertain no doubt,) and it is also true that acts done in violation of law are void, of which, I presume, none will venture a question, as a necessary corollary, the election in November, being held during the existence of that resolution, was wholly void, and, of course, confers no right upon the applicants. This proposition is so very clear and conclusive in itself, that it is difficult to make it more so by any argument I can offer.

Gentlemen endeavor to avoid this conclusive position, by putting extreme cases of the abuse of this power by the House. Let us test one of them, and see how far they succeed. We are asked if the House, in the exercise of this great constitutional right, should declare an individual who had never been voted for by the electors of Mississippi to be their representative, if that decision would give to such an individual all the rights and privileges of a member from that State. I reply, sir, that it would not; but this is begging the question. It is the election by the people of which this House is to judge; and it has no jurisdiction of the question of who shall be members of this body, except so far as that question is involved in the decision of their election, return, and qualification. Without an election, then, no jurisdiction would be conferred upon the House; and of course if any attempt was made to decide as in the case proposed, such decision would be void. The distinction between a case like this, and one in which the House has decided most palpably wrong, is obvious, at least to every lawyer here. In the first case, as I have admitted, the decision would be absolutely void; while, in the last, it would be obligatory so long as it continued unreversed.

I have remarked, sir, that I was well satisfied that the election in July is valid; but, for the sake of the argument, let us suppose it to be otherwise. Upon what ground, I would ask, can it be contended here, that the force of that decision, declaring it valid, the House having jurisdiction of the subject matter, would be impaired? That decision must be either entitled to its full force, or it must be void; it cannot occupy a middle ground; for although it might be subject to reversal for the error, yet it would continue valid until reversed. If void, of course it could have no influence upon the subsequent election, in the point of view in which I am now considering the question; and the subsequent election would be good or not, according to other circumstances attending it. If in full force, upon the other hand, the conclusion must be, that the election held in violation of it was void. Nor would the recision of that resolution afterwards change the result, upon any principle with which I am acquainted. It is true that a crime prohibited by statute is not punishable after its repeal. This, however, depends upon a very different principle from that which is contended for in the case under consideration. In that case the discharge is produced from the humanity of the law in favor of life. But, sir, upon what principle can it be contended in this case that the repeal of a law, the existence of which prevented the creation of title to a civil right, can operate to create it? The law being in existence at the time, fixed its character and effect, which could not be changed by the mere negative influence of its repeal.

I will pursue this point in the argument no further; for really, sir, after the best examination which I have been able to give this question, I find no ground for doubt even as to the conclusiveness of this point; nor have I been furnished with any by the ingenuity of those who have elaborated it so extensively upon the other side of the question.

I feel now, Mr. Speaker, that I have shown conclusively that the resolution under consideration, declaring Messrs. Prentiss and Word not entitled to seats as members upon this floor from the State of Mississippi, ought to be adopted; and, so far as that inquiry is concerned, I have no further remark to make. But, sir, this is not the only question now under the consideration of the House. It is true, sir, that a vote has been taken testing the strength of the first resolution, which proposes to rescind the resolution of the House at the called session, declaring the sitting members, Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson, duly elected members of the present Congress, from which it is rendered probable, not to say certain, that it will be adopted It is not, however, yet done; and viewing it, as I do, the heaviest blow that has ever been aimed at the institutions of my country, I will continue to hope that a kind Providence, to whose guardian care we owe the creation and continuance of our happy form of Government, will interpose some means to avert it from us; and, for one, sir, I will struggle against it until I hear its dreadful consummation announced from the Chair. And here, sir, permit me to say that I view the course taken upon this subject with great alarm, as setting the most dangerous precedent; and from the number of those who are in favor of its adoption, and particularly when I find the members of greatest age and experience among that number, I feel that the danger to be apprehended is near at hand. I may be told, sir, that my fears are too easily excited. I trust it may so turn out, but I have no expectation that it will. I have looked with painful anxiety into the history of this House and the Senate for a precedent for this course, but in vain. I have also examined into the history of the Parliament of England for one, with the same success. I challenge the oldest and the wisest in this House, sir, to produce an act in which the principle involved in this inquiry has been recognised in the proceedings of either branch of Congress, or any other similarly constituted body. I shall feel under obligation to any one who will point me to a precedent; for if my fears are groundless, I wish to be relieved from them. If, sir, there is no precedent, I entreat gentlemen to pause and reflect before they inflict this heavy blow upon our institutions and Government.

We have heard from the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. BELL) the admission that party considerations have had influence upon this decision; and indeed, sir, it is too obvious to any one who will look to the votes and the advocates upon either side of it. But for that influence, I cannot believe that we should be troubled with this investigation. When, sir, the proposition was made by the applicants for seats here, I did not suppose for one moment that it would be seriously entertained; and indeed, sir, when it was referred to the Committee of Elections, I supposed it was done pro forma merely, as a respectful way of disposing of the subject. I could not then believe that even the devotion to party, which had been manifested here upon so many recent occasions, would be permitted upon that to make any gentleman forget his country. I did suppose respect for ourselves and our decisions, and the importance of continuing a respectful consideration of them by others, would have forbid us from treating as mere idle matters the solemn decisions of this House, even were it viewed as a question of policy. But, sir, how much less did I suppose that gentlemen here would treat lightly their decision, by which was vested the dearest rights of an American citizen. Sir, it seems to be forgotten by the House that any right or privilege was conferred by the resolution of the called session upon the sitting members from Mississippi; for certainly, if remembered, they would be recognised. What, sir, would be your course if, after the adoption of the resolution which I am now considering, the sitting members should take their seats upon this floor, and demand to take part in the action of this House—demand the right to debate and vote upon the subjects before us—would you, sir, feel satisfied that you, as the presiding officer of this body, would be authorized to refuse to permit them to do so, thus depriving them of privileges conferred upon them and their constituents by this House, while they remain unexpelled by the constitutional majority. I hope, sir, this delicate and grave question may not be presented to you for decision. You would find no precedent for your guide, sir; out of the great number of decisions made by this House, touching every legitimate subject for its determation, this would not, in principle, sir, be found to be "res adjudicata." Upon you, sir, would devolve a duty that the stoutest heart might dread to perform. Ordered, as you would be, by a majority of this House—for the authority of which I know you entertain high respect—to do an act which, in conscience, you believed to be wrong, you could not but hesitate either to obey the mandate, or do the injustice. Your seat would be found truly burthensome to you. I cannot believe, however strongly you would desire to comply with the order of the House, that you would permit yourself to become the instrument through which such violence would be done to the Constitution of the country, the rights of individuals, and those of a sovereign State. I repeat, sir, that for your sake I hope the cup may pass by you; if in other hands, I am confident it would not. So far as the principle is concerned, I should be glad to see it tested; and if, sir, contrary to what I suppose would be your course, you should execute the void order of the House, then, indeed, would you hear a voice, loud and long, not only from Mississippi, but from every part of this Union, which would make this House not only feel its error, but prepare it for a willing correction of it.

This resolution, if adopted, will, in violation of all principle, do that, indirectly, which it cannot do directly. Its effect, when executed, will be to expel from this House the representatives of a sovereign State, by a bare majority, when, by the Constitution which we have sworn to support, it could only be effected by two-thirds of this body. And, sir, in what estimation will our acts be held by the community, when they see this House rescinding a most solemn resolution of a former session, vesting the most important rights in individuals, and securing them to a sovereign State of this Union, in violation of every principle of the Constitution and laws of this land, in the absence of all precedent, and without any ground for impeaching that resolution. All must conclude, that rights which depend upon the unstable decisions of this House, are of but little value. So much, sir, do I consider the value of stability in our decisions, that if I had no other reason for doing so than to secure that object, I would not vote for the recision, were my right to a seat here dependent upon it. Nay, sir, neither office nor place could induce me thus to bring into disrepute our solemn determinations by the establishment of such a precedent. Carry out the principle which we are now about to establish, and where will it lead us, and where is it to end? The term, sir, of our presiding officer is to continue so long as the party to which he may belong shall compose the majority of this House, and no longer, instead of the term of a Congress, as heretofore. Indeed, sir, the whole organization of the House is to depend, for its duration, upon the ups and downs of party. In one word, sir, we are cut loose from all the usages and fixed principles of our fathers, which were esteemed by them to be indispensable to the perpetuity of this our happy form of Government, and are at sea without compass or rudder to direct our wanderings. Sir, the day is not far in advance of us, when this departure which we are about to make, must be corrected by the people, through the ballot box, or this glorious Union must melt, under the intense heat of party strife, into anarchy; and I call upon my countrymen to come to the rescue.

REMARKS OF MR. SMITH,
OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, January 5, 1838—On the subject of British aggressions on the northern frontier of the United States.

Mr. SMITH said he did not rise with any disposition to detain the House more than a few moments, and particularly as the resolutions touching the matter immediately before the House had been so amended as to produce a very obvious unanimity on the part of the House in their favor. But (said Mr. S.) I cannot consent to close this debate, without calling the attention of the House to a portion of the remarks made by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, (Mr. Howard,) when he last addressed the House.

The difficulties existing in relation to the boundary of the United States on the extreme northeast, are of a kindred character to those which have excited the indignation, and, I may say, laudable zeal of the honorable gentlemen from New York, who have addressed the House; and they have inevitably been associated together in this debate. But I understand the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (who is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in this House,) that there is no disposition to press the border difficulties and disputed boundary on the frontier of the State which I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor, upon the consideration of either the British Government or of this House at the present time, or to attempt any settlement of them. Now, sir, I wish to know whether that gentleman is to be understood as expressing correctly the feeling and sense of the present Administration, or of his committee, or of this House, in this particular?

Mr. HOWARD here rose to explain. He had merely stated his personal opinion. He had not stated it as the opinion of the committee, nor had he said that he felt no disposition to press for a settlement of the question of boundary; but, as it had been said by some gentlemen that we seemed to be on the eve of a war with Great Britain, he had made some remarks which were intended to show that such an opinion was unfounded.

Sir, said Mr. SMITH, I am gratified to learn that the honorable gentleman disclaims having spoken in behalf of the Administration, or of his committee. I am glad that he disclaims indifference towards so important a matter on his own part also. But I did not only understand him to say, that there was no disposition on his own part, or on the part of the Administration, or of this House, or of somebody, to press to a settlement the boundary difficulties that are now disturbing the peace and the rights of the people of Maine; but as giving reasons also for adopting such a policy, such as struck my mind as being most singular and extraordinary. I understood him, sir, as advancing as a reason for disregarding, for the present, the subject of the disputed boundary in the northeast, that it had already been in dispute for twenty years past; I understood another reason of his, for such a policy, was, that we are on terms of peace and amity with Great Britain in regard to all other matters; and a third reason why we should not press to a termination, at this time, the dispute on the frontier boundary of Maine, which I understood the gentleman as assigning, was, that Great Britain is at this time involved in troubles with another people—a portion of her own subjects, and it would be dishonorable in us to press our disputes with her to a settlement under such circumstances.

Sir, these are all reasons why I would see the boundary of Maine pressed and settled at this time, and I can assure the honorable gentleman from Maryland that such a policy is expected of him, and of his committee, and of this House, and of every branch of this Government, by the people of Maine. My colleague, sir, who has already addressed the House, (Mr. Cilley,) has truly represented what are the feelings of the people of Maine upon this subject; and I sincerely hope that the honorable gentleman, who is at the head of foreign affairs in this House, will, upon further reflection, be induced to adopt the same decided interest in favor of an immediate adjustment of this boundary, that the President has expressed in his message to Congress. Sir, the people of Maine have claims upon this Government in this matter. Does not the honorable gentleman from Maryland know, that at this moment one of the citizens of Maine is incarcerated by the British Government in one of their provincial jails, and has been so incarcerated for months and months? And for what, sir? Under the pretext of having committed an act which the provincial government of Great Britain was pleased to call a violation of its provincial law, and upon territory, too, that the honorable chairman of foreign affairs here upon this floor declares to be the property of Maine by the most clear and perfect title!

Yes, sir, a citizen of Maine, let me tell the honorable gentleman, is at this moment imprisoned in a foreign jail by the British Government, for an act which that Government has chosen to call an offence against itself, and upon territory to which the gentleman admits Maine to have the most clear and perfect title. He was taken, kidnaped from our own soil, and transmitted beyond the limits of the United States, and is still there in prison; and yet the gentleman said he had no disposition, for reasons which he mentioned, for pressing the aggression upon the consideration of the House. Sir, this is not the policy which Maine expects of this Administration upon this subject; and it is not the policy which it becomes this House to adopt.

Mr. Speaker, calamitous, and unfortunate in other respects, as the recent events on our frontier, in the vicinity of Niagara, may be regarded by gentlemen from New York. I cannot but congratulate myself, and the State I here represent in part, that they have occurred. I congratulate myself, and the State of Maine on account of these events, because I believe they will have a direct tendency to bring to the consideration of this House, and of the Government, and of the country, the aggressions which have been perpetrated upon the territory and rights of Maine, by the British Government. They will tend to bring to the consideration of Congress, the worth of the liberty of a citizen of a State so far in the eastern extremity of this Union as is Maine, and the worth of protecting inviolate the territory of that State. They will serve to remind this House and the nation of its duty to a territory that has been thus drawn into dispute, exceeding in extent the Territory of near two or three of the entire States of the Union. I have observed, sir, in the documents communicated by the Secretary of State, respecting our relations with Mexico, that the mere circumstance that the Minister of that Government, on the eve of his leaving the country, had the audacity to print a pamphlet of a character esteemed offensive to the Secretary of State, or to our Government, has been regarded as sufficient consequence to call for the special consideration of this House and of the nation, and held up in the light of an offence that should inflame the nation into a war upon the Government of that Minister. Sir, if such an unimportant circumstance is esteemed to be of such magnitude in our relations with Mexico, may I not express some surprise that the honorable chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs should be so inclined to overlook the outrages committed upon the citizens and rights and territory of Maine as the British Government has been, and still is, guilty of? I repeat, sir, that I am gratified, and it must be a subject of legitimate congratulation in Maine, that events have taken place of a character to arouse the attention of the Representatives of New York upon this floor to the outrages of the British Government, inasmuch as it will tend to elevate the aggressions committed by the same Government upon the people and rights of Maine, to equal consideration on the part of this House and of the present Administration, with that bestowed upon the offensive pamphlet published by the Mexican Minister. Let the injuries of Maine constitute, at least, as much of an appendage to the aggressions committed by the British Government upon New York, as the published pamphlet, to which I have alluded, has been made to our unsettled claims upon Mexico. Sir, I hope the resolutions offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. Fillmore,) will pass with unanimity; and if they will bear the construction of a call upon the President for all the information he possesses relative to violations of our treaty relations with Great Britain upon the extreme eastern border, where a citizen of the United States has been kidnapped and carried out of the country by the British Government, I shall like the resolutions so much the better. I hope they will bear this broad construction. But for what they do mean I go for them, and hope they will pass, as I am sure they will.

SPEECH OF MR. HUBBARD, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

In Senate, February 7th and 8th, 1838—Upon the bill "to impose additional duties, as depositaries, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement, of the public money of the United States."

If, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Virginia is governed by those high considerations, which he ascribes to his course: If, as he says, the pure love of country controls his actions here: If he has the consciousness of having honestly and faithfully discharged his public duty, what has he to fear from all the denunciations of party? Armed, as he must be, so strong in honesty, he would disregard all the bitter persecutions of political prejudice. The American people are too well informed, not to understand the acts of every public man, and too discerning, not to see the motives which induce those acts, and they are too just, however much they may censure the action, to condemn the actor, if his course of action has been governed by the high considerations of public duty. I shall, sir, judge no man. I will not, for a moment, indulge the thought that any view of self-elevation, of personal aggrandisement, can influence the course of any member of this Senate. I am bound to believe that the distinguished public men of our country, whatever may be their passion for preferment, their ambition for place, are nevertheless governed in their public course by considerations of patriotism. Mr. President, I feel also, in common with the honorable Senator from Virginia, the responsibilities which devolve on me; and it is my purpose to act, here and elsewhere, as one that must give an account. All I can say is, that if it should so happen, that my course, on this or on any other great measure of public policy, shall not meet the approbation of my constituents, that I shall be ready, at their bidding, to give up my place to another, who shall better represent the will of the people.

The Senator from Virginia has very distinctly expressed his dissatisfaction with the object and details of the bill emanating from the Committee on Finance. He has stated, and truly stated, that it is the same in principle with the bill of the last session. The fate of that bill is matter of history. It originated in this branch of Congress; was here fully discussed, most critically and carefully considered, and finally received the sanction of the Senate. Its fate in the House of Representatives was not so fortunate for the Government or the country. It was laid upon the table; and notwithstanding the agitation of the public mind in relation to this subject, notwithstanding the peculiar condition of the currency of the country, and of the finances of the Government, the bill there yet remains; and as far, sir, as I have been able to learn the passing events, not a movement has been made since the commencement of the present session, to bring this most important subject to the consideration of that branch of Congress; a subject immediately connected with the collection, custody, and disbursement of the money of the people.

The Senator from Virginia says that he anticipated, at this session, a different measure. The final disposition of the bill of the last session, the indications of popular sentiment which have taken place since it was first brought forward, and the sentiments of the recent Message of the President, led him to suppose that a different policy would be manifested; that a measure more in accordance with the public mind would now have been presented for the consideration of Congress. There is, sir, a radical difference between the Senator and myself, in relation to the state of popular opinion. If the Senator will appeal to the great working classes of our community, to the actual cultivators of the soil, the mechanics and tradesmen of the country, he will find a deep-rooted conviction that the time has come when all financial connection between the Government of their choice and the banks of the States ought, in their judgment, to be dissolved. A different sentiment, I have no doubt, pervades other portions of the community.

But I feel a perfect confidence that, if this question could now be submitted to the American people—"Shall the revenues of the Government hereafter be collected and disbursed independent of banking institutions?"—that the Senator would find, from the response, that he had altogether mistaken the state of public opinion.

I am somewhat surprised that the Senator should have anticipated any different measure from the character of the Message. The President says: "If a majority of Congress see the public welfare in a different light, and more especially if they should be satisfied that the measure proposed would not be acceptable to the people, I shall look to their wisdom to substitute such as may be more conducive to the one and more satisfactory to the other. In any event, they may confidently rely on my hearty co-operation, to the fullest extent which my views of the Constitution and my sense of duty will permit." There is nothing in this paragraph which could lead the Senator to anticipate the recommendation of a different measure. The mind of the President was unaltered. "I have (he said) found no reason to change my own opinion as to the expediency of adopting the system proposed, being perfectly satisfied that there will be neither stability nor safety, either in the fiscal affairs of the Government, or in the pecuniary transactions of individuals and corporations, so long as a connection exists between them, which, like the past, offers such strong inducements to make them the subjects of political agitation." The Senator could not have anticipated from this part of the President's message that he was in favor of any different measure. He says that he anticipated a report from the Committee on Finance of a different bill, from the indications of popular opinion since the last session of Congress. Considering the free and representative character of our Government, I admit that the state of public opinion, at all times, should and would have a controlling influence with every public man; and the President himself has not communicated a sentiment conflicting with this safe Republican principle. He has well said, that "the national will is the supreme law of the Republic, and on all subjects within the limits of his constitutional powers, should be faithfully observed by the public servant." "Local elections for State officers have, however, been held in several of the States, at which the expediency of the plan proposed by the Executive has been more or less discussed. You will, I am confident, yield to their results the respect due to every expression of the public voice."

"Desiring, however, to arrive at truth and a just view of the subject in all its bearings, you will at the same time remember that questions of far deeper and more immediate local interest than the fiscal plans of the National Treasury were involved in those elections. Above all, we cannot overlook the striking fact, that there were at the time in those States more than one hundred and sixty millions of bank capital, of which large portions were subject to actual forfeiture, other large portions upheld only by special and limited legislative indulgencies, and most of it, if not all, to a greater or less extent dependent for a continuance of its corporate existence upon the will of the State Legislatures to be then chosen."

The Senator from Virginia, and the Senator from Massachusetts, have alluded to the elections which have taken place in Maine, Indiana, and New York, as evidence of a most extraordinary change in public opinion with reference to this measure. This may be so, and it may be otherwise. Questions having no connection with this Independent Treasury scheme may have controlled those local elections; and I submit whether any thing unfavorable to the policy of the Administration is inferrable from those results. In Maine, the aggregate vote given for State Senators shows a Democratic majority, while the votes for Governor indicate a different result. Both may equally express the will of the people; and all that can be inferred from the result of the Maine election is, that the Democratic candidate for Governor did not command the same support that the Democratic candidates for the State Senate received. In New York, also, it is perfectly clear that fifty thousand less votes were cast at the last than at the next preceding election. On this subject I will say that, if the the present incumbent of the Presidential office, and the whole combined force of the Opposition concentrated in a candidate friendly to a National Bank, or friendly to the State deposite policy, were now before the people for office, the result of such a contest would be a fair expression of the popular will, and, unless I wholly mistake the signs of the times, would conclusively show that the present state of the public mind, in relation to this question, has been greatly misapprehended and greatly misrepresented.

It has been stated, Mr. President, that the general object of this measure was a separation of the Government from the banks. And is there any member of this Senate who would advocate a continuance of this connection, in the present state of the banks themselves? No sir. It then becomes, at once, a matter of duty for Congress to make adequate provision for the collection, safe-keeping and disbursement of the public revenues. The banks cannot be employed as the fiscal agents of the Government, in their present acknowledged state of bankruptcy. It would be monstrous to require the Government, in the present state of affairs, to make deposite of its funds with these State institutions. The subject, then, is one most emphatically demanding the consideration of Congress.

The power of this Government would be enfeebled, if not endangered, by the destruction of its financial resources. It is the unembarrassed operation of the fiscal system of this Government, that gives to it life, vigor and stability. And the Congress of the United States would be faithless in the discharge of their high trusts, should they fail to make ample provision for the safe-keeping of the public funds. What then is to be done? The depositories of the public money, under the act of June, 1836, have failed to perform their engagements to the Government, and to meet the just expectations of the community. The Secretary of the Treasury, without a direct violation of law, cannot longer employ these institutions as the fiscal agents of the Government. And I am, sir, well satisfied that there will be "neither safety or stability, so long as the connection exists between them and the Government." The time has come then when something should be done. The Committee on Finance have reported this bill as the result of their reflections. If it shall be adopted, the care of the public funds will be committed to the charge of agents directly responsible to the Government, who derive their official existence through the effect of public law, and their whole duty is defined and regulated by public enactment. They are bound to collect, safely keep and disburse the public revenues. In this way the Government at once acquires the exclusive control of the public funds. In the hands of its own agents, they are in no way liable to depreciation or loss.

They can in no way become the means for speculation. The same funds which shall be received shall be disbursed. But the moment the public money is mingled with the money of banking corporations, that moment the control and management of the Government funds is put beyond the power of the department charged with the fiscal operations of the country. The direct benefit resulting from the separation is, that the Government will always be unembarrassed in conducting its own financial affairs. It must possess, at all times, full knowledge of its own resources; and, in pursuance of public law, can invariably command its own pecuniary means. It will be recollected that the public moneys were deposited with the United States Bank, agreeably to the provisions of the charter, subject to the control of the Treasury Department. It will also be recollected that those deposites were transferred to the State institutions, and the act of June, 1836, provided for the regulation of the deposites of the public money in those local banks. The history of the connection with the Bank of the United States and with the State institutions furnishes a lesson of experience which cannot be lost upon the country, and which must have prepared the public mind for the measure now recommended.

I am then, Mr. President, for the bill, because it prohibits, under the severest penalties, the use of the public money for any purpose whatever; and because it secures to the Government the entire control of the public funds. There is another leading object contemplated by the bill, which is, gradually to effect a change in the kind of currency in which the public revenues shall be received. I should have been entirely content to have left this matter to the law of 1789, and to the resolution of 1816. I am not one of those, however, who regard this provision of the bill with any alarm. It must be matter of great indifference to banks of discount whether the revenues of the Government shall be collected exclusively in gold or silver, or whether in paper equivalent to specie, and which may be converted into specie at the place where received. If paper money shall be equal in value to the precious metals, the bank issuing such a description of paper can have no occasion to be alarmed from the practical effect of this measure. Those banks only whose paper shall be depreciated, and whose circulation shall be worth less than specie, will experience embarrassment from the operation of this bill. It cannot be the object of the Government to lend its aid to sustain institutions of this character. The legalized currency of the Government should never be a depreciated currency. Gold and silver only have a fixed and standard value, and all other descriptions of money possess a mere relative value. The public funds should be collected in a currency uniform and of intrinsic and equal worth in every part of the Republic. The operations of the Government would necessarily result in pecuniary loss by making disbursements in a medium liable to any fluctuation. The public funds are the rightful property of the American people, and should be received and disbursed by the Government, as their agent, in a currency recognised by the Constitution and sanctioned by public law.

The revenues of the Government should never be used in banking operations, because it would subject them to all the hazard and change to which paper money is unavoidably exposed.

Every description of a paper currency, from its nature and character, is liable to constant fluctuation in its value. Bank paper in one section of the country may be much more below the value of specie than in another.

These considerations, Mr. President, should induce Congress, at as early a day as may be consistent with the interest and convenience of the tax-payers, to provide for the collection of the public revenues exclusively in a currency of a fixed and standard value; and this is all that the bill proposes in this respect. It provides for this salutary change in the most gradual manner—in a manner safe, practical, and convenient.

These are the leading and general objects of the bill reported from the Committee on Finance. And what, sir, are the objections which have been urged against this measure?

First, That it estabishes a Government bank, more odious in its character, and more alarming in its effects upon the industry of the country, than even was the late bank of the United States.

If this were so, how does it happen that every friend of a National Bank in this, and in the other branch of Congress, opposes this measure with every possible degree of virulence and of hostility? Not because it is, but because it is not a bank; because it runs counter to every principle and privilege of banking institutions—that this bill meets with such unrelenting oppesition. This objection to the bill, made as it has been by the Senator from Virginia, and enforced with so much zeal and ability, imposes upon me the necessity of travelling over the same ground which has been so recently and so ably occupied by the chairman of the committee. I must ask the attention of the Senate while I examine the details of the bill, with a view to answer this most extraordinary, and to my mind, most unwarrantable, objection to the measure.

The first section of this bill, after designating suitable and convenient rooms for the keeping of the public moneys, and giving a locality to the public treasury, provides that the Treasurer of the United States, shall keep all the public moneys which shall come to his hands in the Treasury of the United States as hereby constituted, "until the same are drawn therefrom according to law."

The second section of the bill establishes certain places as public depositories, and defines the particular duties of the officers charged with the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of all such moneys as may be deposited at those places.

The third section designates the duties which shall be performed by certain Receivers General, to be appointed and stationed at the cities of Boston and New York, with reference to the collection and disbursement of the public funds which may be deposited at those points.

The fourth section contains substantially the same provisions as are contained in the third, and gives authority for the appointment of Receivers General to be stationed at the cities of Charleston and St. Louis, with the same powers and for the same purposes.

The sixth section, after expressly designating those officers to be charged with the collection of the public money, provides that they shall keep safely, without loaning or using, all the public money collected by them, until the same shall be ordered to be transferred or disbursed by the proper department of the Government.

The ninth section provides that the respective depositaries shall safely keep the public money until the same shall be disposed of according to law. And here, Mr. President, I must stop to inquire what line or paragraph of the first nine sections of this bill gives the slightest countenance to the establishment of a Government bank? A bank of issues, a bank of circulation?

The public funds, which may, in the pursuance of these provisions, be placed for safe-keeping in some or all of the depositories is, I suppose, to be understood as constituting the capital of this great Government bank.

But, unlike all other banking institutions, it possesses no power to trade upon this capital. The same has been deposited, and is in the safe custody of the public officers; but not a dollar of this capital, at any time, or under any pretence, can be withdrawn, except by the authority of law. The Treasurer of the United States, in the capacity of acting president of the new discovered bank, in conjunction with the whole board of directors, in the character of Mint treasurers, collectors and receivers, cannot discount one dollar of this capital, except it be through the acts of the Legislature and Executive branches of the Government.

The capital then of this Government bank is placed beyond the reach of any cashier, teller, director, or any other officer connected with the institution.

The Senator from Virginia must have imposed a severe tax upon his ingenuity, to have conceived the remotest similitude between the provisions of these nine sections, and the provisions of a National Bank charter, between this measure and a Government bank.

It must be under the tenth section of this bill that the Senator from Virginia imagines that any banking power is conferred upon the executive officers of the Government. The Treasury Department has, by virtue of this section, authority to transfer the moneys in the hands of one depositary to the charge of another. A power which has, of necessity, been exercised by that Department since the foundation of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury has no more power under this bill, with reference to the transfer of the public money, than he possessed during the existence of the Bank of the United States, than he possessed before and since the existence of that institution. That officer, from the character of the public appropriations, must know at what particular points expenditures will be required; and he would be a most faithless officer to permit the deposites of the public money to accumulate in New York, when the wants of the Government will demand their use at New Orleans.

This power must be vested in some one of the Executive Departments. It has been vested and exercised, from the commencement of the Government, by the Treasury Department, to which has been committed the oversight and general management of the public revenues. The discharge of this high, necessary, and responsible duty has alarmed the fears of the Senator from Virginia. He has exhibited to our view, as the offspring of this power, the hideous spectre of a Government Bank.

There is no power given to the Secretary, in transferring the public funds "at his discretion, and as the safety of the public moneys and the convenience of the public service shall seem to him to require," to divert those funds, to give to them any different direction. Any such order of transfer would at once be dishonored; but, if regarded, would subject the Secretary himself, and all concerned, to the severe, but just, penalty prescribed by the act. Such a purpose never could be perfected. It is then, sir, to my mind, strange indeed that the banking power, which the Senator from Virginia says is conferred by this bill, can possibly be inferred from this tenth section.

But there is another clause of this section which gives to the Treasurer of the United States, for the purpose of payments on public account, power to draw upon the depositories, as the public interests and the convenience of the public creditors shall require, a power coeval with the existence of the Government, and without the exercise of which I am unable to discover how its fiscal affairs could safely be conducted. It should, however, be borne constantly in mind, that this same Treasurer of the United States cannot issue his drafts, except to discharge appropriations made by law. This is all the control, all the power, which this or any other public officer has over the disbursements of the public money; and yet the Senator says there is established by this bill a power to bank upon the public funds. How, when or where, I cannot see. The importers must pay their duties, and the purchasers must pay for their lands; the receivers must deposite the avails; the officers charged with the custody must safely keep, and must disburse the same, to satisfy the public creditors, upon the drafts of the Treasurer of the United States, issued in pursuance of legal appropriations. This is the whole power given by this bill to the public officers over the public funds. The best individual bond or commercial paper in the community cannot draw from the safes and vaults of the Treasury a solitary dollar on loan. The capital of the American people cannot be touched by their agents, except for the support of their Government; and then, not without the consent of their representatives.

The committee, in preparing this bill, intended to steer clear of any such objection. The bill of the extra session, embracing the same general principle, was assailed on this ground. It will be found, in further pursuing the details of this bill, that the eleventh section contains the very important provision that all the public moneys, no matter where held in deposite, shall be credited "to the Treasurer of the United States, and shall be at all times subject to his draft;" and I have before shown whence this same officer derived his authority to disburse the public money, and what was the extent of that authority.

This section, then, puts the matter to rest; makes confirmation strong as "holy writ," that no other officer, be he whom he may, "whether president, director, cashier, or teller of this Government bank" can, by any power he may possess, withdraw any portion of the capital, for any purpose. It follows, then, that this Government bank cannot issue any paper for circulation as money, and has no other power over its capital than to discount the Treasurer's drafts, for the payment of public creditors.

The thirteenth section gives authority to the Secretary of the Treasury, under certain circumstances, to direct the public moneys to be specially deposited in some selected bank, and prescribes the conditions and terms upon which deposites shall thus be made. The first is, "that the banks holding them shall be prohibited from making any use of the moneys deposited by way of loans, discounts, or in any other manner, or for any other purpose whatsoever. And this essential provision is most faithfully secured by the subsequent terms of this section.

The fifteenth and sixteenth sections of this bill impose additional and important guards for the safe-keeping of the public moneys thus deposited, to meet the wants of the Treasury. But it has been said that this bill gives authority to individuals to make deposites, and to receive certificates of such deposites from the Treasury Department, and these certificates will pass as the paper money of this Government bank.

I am bound to suppose every gentleman sincere in the objections which he urges to this measure. But, sir, I have looked through and through this bill; I have examined it with all the care and attention which I can bestow upon it, and I must say that this objection is utterly groundless, without any foundation upon which it can rest.

The nineteenth section, it is true, gives authority to a certain description of public officers, 'having public money to pay to the United States, and all patentees wishing to make payment for patents issued, to pay all such moneys at the Treasury of the United States," or at the other places of public deposite, and the officers are to give certificates of all such payments; and the twenty-seventh section also provides that the Treasurer of the United States may receive payments in advance for the public lands, and give a certificate therefor, which shall be received at the land offices; but, so far from this constituting a paper currency, their transfer or assignment is, in terms, expressly prohibited.

From these sections is inferred the dangerous power given to the Executive to issue a Government bank paper to pass as currency. All the power which the Executive has, in relation to this matter, is conferred by these two sections. I leave for others to show where the danger lies. It must occur to every practical man, that the privileges granted by the twenty-seventh section will greatly promote individual convenience, without making the Government obnoxious to the charge of receiving money on individual deposite. In both sections, all that is done is to provide a convenient mode for receiving the public dues, and not for creating Government liabilities.

If any thing further were necessary to relieve the public mind from the suspicion that this bill looks to the establishment of a Government Bank, I would refer to the important provisions of the twentieth section, not only prohibiting any public officer, under any pretence, from using the public money, but imposing the severe penalty of fine and imprisonment, should any such officer transgress.

The public press, also, since this bill was first brought forward, has exerted its power to prejudice the public mind against this measure, by publications without even the shadow of truth to sustain them. It is said that "the plan is drawn up with exceeding skill, and apparently with the principal object of ensuring safety to the public money. But, in reality, it proposes a VAST GOVERNMENT BANK, wholly and without any check, under the control of the Executive. It would possess ALL THE POWERS OF A NATIONAL BANK, but without any of the checks or guards which should surround such an institution. To show that I do not deal in mere assertion, I propose to point out the true features of this abominable plan; and to prove that it is nothing more or less than a Government Bank, under the unchecked control of the President, or his instrument, the Secretary of the Treasury.

"What are the principal POWERS OF A BANK? They are, 1. The power of issuing bills, to be used as a currency. 2. The receiving and holding deposites of money. And 3d. The loaning of money, and the buying and selling of exchange,

"I presume it will be admitted, that the above are all the essential powers or PRIVILEGES OF A BANK? The proposed law expressly confers all these privileges upon the Treasury Department, and gives it the whole revenue of the country, and all the money which individuals may deposite with it, as a capital to work upon!"

Have I not already shown that this measure confers no power to issue a paper currency, to receive private deposites, or to loan money? This, however, is sent forth to the American people in one of the journals in the city of Boston as the true character of this public measure.

In what part of this bill are to be found provisions tending to the establishment of a Government bank, without check, and under the control of the Executive? Where is to be found the grant of executive power to issue paper to be used as a currency? Does any part of the bill give authority to receive, and hold as deposites, the money of others? Is there any power conferred to loan money, or trade in exchange? No, sir: and if the writer of this article had examined this measure with a spirit of candor, and free from prejudice, he could never have given to the public sentiments so much at war with the spirit and letter of this bill. One of the provisions of this much abused measure, which must recommend it more than any other, is, that it takes from every officer of the Government the power of employing the public funds "as a capital to work upon."

The Senator from Virginia says, as between a Government Bank, such as this bill seeks to establish, and a Bank of the United States, such as has recently existed, he should pause long before he should go for a Government Bank.

In such an alternative he should pause long before he could give to this measure his preference. I have read, sir, the speech of the honorable Senator, delivered on this floor in 1834, and it seems to me inconceivable that any alternative could be presented to his mind which could induce him, under any circumstances, to give his support to the re-establishment of a National Bank.

On the occasion to which I have referred, the Senator remarked:

"I am not less sensible, I trust, sir, than other gentlemen to the sufferings of any portion of my fellow-citizens, but I must say that the present crisis, whatever be its severity, comes alleviated by one high consolation. It is calculated to awaken, and I trust will awaken, all of us to the true nature and dangerous character of that formidable moneyed power which we have built up by our own laws, and which now sits enthroned upon our statute book in the pride of chartered prerogative. Sir, we have heretofore been singularly deaf to the monitory lessons delivered to us by our fathers and predecessors. In vain did the Republican statesmen of '91 warn us of the fatal consequences of this 'first transgression' of the sacred limits of the Constitution; in vain did Mr. JEFFERSON, in the prophetic passage which was read to us the other day by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) tell us of all possible institutions 'this was the one of most deadly hostility against the principles and form of our Constitution,' and that if permitted to exist it would one day reduce the constituted authorities of the nation themselves under vassalage to its will."

Is the measure proposed by the Committee on Finance, a violation of the Constitution? Does it conflict with the provisions of that sacred instrument? Has it so been pretended by any one? Does the Senator wish to be understood that he should pause long before he would go for this bill, when the alternative was presented—this bill or a Bank of the United States? Sir, I cannot believe that the Senator wishes so to be understood.

The bill reported by the committee is free from every constitutional embarrassment. It should be regarded as a mere measure of expediency. I cannot suppose that any man would give a preference to any other measure directly conflicting with the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

The late distinguished colleague of the Senator expressed similar sentiments as to the constitutional power of Congress to establish a United States Bank; but he, at the same time, expressed the sentiment that such an alternative might be presented as might justify the abandonment of the guards of the Constitution.

When such sentiments shall be avowed, and a corresponding course of action shall be manifested, we may prepare to surrender the dearest rights of freemen.

Mr. LEIGH remarked, upon the bill to extend, for a term of six years, the United States Bank charter:

"But though the people of Virginia do maintain the opinion, and have uniformly maintained it, and, I think, upon just grounds, that this Government has no constitutional authority to charter a National Bank, the developments of the present year now in rapid progress may serve to convince them that the renewal of the present charter of the present bank, with such modifications, and for such a term, as experience has shown or shall dictate to be proper, may be the only means which human wisdom can devise, to avert or correct measures far more unconstitutional, more abhorrent in principle from their opinion, and more dangerous and baleful in their consequences. The alternatives but too likely to be presented to us are, indeed, awful."

Sir, I should think so; but so long as I had physical strength to sustain me, I would cling to the Constitution of my country in all the violence of party tempests; and when the last hold should fail me, I would sink with the fragments. No alternative could be presented to my mind which, for a single moment, could induce the surrender of the charter of my liberty.

The Senators from Virginia and Massachusetts object to this measure, for the reason that it proposes one currency for the Government, and another currency for the people. This, Mr. President, is no new discovery. It is not a sentiment now advanced for the first time by way of objection to this bill. It has been, on this floor and elsewhere, emphatically reiterated hundreds of times. One currency for the Government—another currency for the people. I confess that I am wholly unable to comprehend the meaning or the force of the objection. Has this Government power to interfere with the paper circulation established by the States? Is it intended to convey the idea that the Senate and the House of Representatives, that the Executive, with all its appendages, are elevated above the people? that they have no connection with the people? are in no sense responsible to the people? If so, I hold no communion with such doctrines. So far from those charged with the legislative and executive power of this Government performing their respective duties independent of the popular will, they hold themselves directly amenable to the source of all political power in this country—to the people themselves. What is our Government but a Government of the people? And every measure which shall have received the sanction of the law making power under this Government, has been originated, debated, examined, and finally passed and approved, by the servants of the people; men deriving their authority from popular and public sentiment.

One currency for the Government—another for the people. This language has lost its charm. An unprejudiced mind would at once suppose, by the use of these terms, that Congress was about to establish a currency for the exclusive accommodation and benefit of those charged with the administration of the Government; that, by this bill, a specie currency is to be provided exclusively for the executive and the legislative branches; and that the other members and classes of our community are, in terms, disregarded. "Let the Government attend to its own affairs, and let the people attend to theirs," the Senator from Massachusetts has told us are "ill-boding words." In all this, Mr. President, there is more of poetry than of fact; more of fancy than reality.

What does the bill provide? Does it, in any sense, interfere with the currency? Does it regulate the affairs of the Government to the exclusion of the affairs of the people? No, sir. In making the necessary provisions for the collection, safekeeping, and disbursement of the public revenues—in designating the kind of currency which shall be drawn from the people for the support of the Government of the people, to be again paid back to the people, the bill does emphatically and most faithfully attend to the most important affairs of the people and of the whole people. It protects and guards their funds from actual loss and from partial depreciation. This, sir, is the character of the measure before us—a measure which, if adopted, may last as long as the Government shall last—a measure which can, in no way, affect those in power differently from those out of power. It affects every member of the community who enjoys the blessings of our free and representative Government. Let us hear, then, no more about one currency for the Government, and another currency for the people. I have, on a former occasion, undertaken to show that the provisions of this bill, so far as they relate to the collection and disbursement of the public money, are like the provisions of the act of 1789. I then traced the similarity between the bill before us and that act of 1789. I do not now intend to occupy the same ground. I then said all I wished to say on that point; but I might well add, for the first quarter of a century of our existence as a nation, a system for the collection and disbursement of the public money was preserved substantially the same as this bill seeks to establish; and during that period, who ever heard that the law of 1789 created one currency for the Government and another currency for the people? Who ever heard that the act of 1789 attended to the affairs of the Government, to the exclusion of the affairs of the people?

The Senator from Virginia further objects to the bill, that it is a measure hostile to the local banks. I have often heard this allegation made against the late and present Administration. It could not with the least semblance of truth be made against that which has recently terminated. Every encouragement within the constitutional power of the late administration, was extended to the State banks. The revenues of the country were placed in deposite with those institutions It must be within the recollection of every Senator present, that on the first of January, 1837, just before the late Administration went out of power, the selected State deposite banks held of the public money more than forty-two millions of dollars. It will not then be said that any measure of severity was inflicted upon these local institutions by the late Administration. Favor upon favor was granted to them. Nor can it be said that the present Executive has expressed a sentiment, or done an act, unfriendly to those State banking institutions which deserved public confidence. In his late Message he remarked, that "the discontinuance of the use of State banks for fiscal purposes, ought not to be regarded as a measure of hostility towards those institutions. Banks properly established and conducted, are highly beneficial to the business of the country." And I have yet to learn that a different feeling has been manifested, or a different sentiment expressed, by any of the efficient friends of this Administration. Certainly no man will accuse me with being unfriendly to well regulated local banks. The little property which I possess, is invested in those State institutions; and while I am ready to sustain them so long as they shall keep within just limits—so long as they shall go forward to accomplish the purposes of their creation, I trust that I shall be behind no man in condemning them whenever their means shall be employed, and their power shall be exerted, to encourage speculations, or to countenance frauds.

The Government of the United States has no control over these State institutions. They derive their being from State authority; and to the States, and to the people of the States, they are solely responsible for the manner of executing the trust confided to them. No act of the General Government can restrict them in their operations; and no act of the General Government can constitutionally enlarge their granted privileges. In all their transactions, acting, as they must do, perfectly independent of the Government, it was indeed difficult to see how any public measure of this kind could be regarded as a measure of hostility against the local banks.

The object of this bill is to secure the public finances from every possible fluctuation. It in no way interferes with State institutions. It may be as well said, that, because an individual who has been for a period of three years accustomed to keep his money in deposite at a particular bank, shall select a different institution at which to do his business, that he thereby is carrying on a war against the bank with which he was first connected, doing all within his power to blast its credit, and to embarrass its concerns, as to say that because the Government saw fit, for satisfactory reasons, to change the places of deposite, that it thereby is manifesting a settled hostility against the institutions first selected to hold in deposite the public money. Different, indeed, would be the complexion of this affair, if the Government could be put in the wrong; if these local banks could claim, as matter of right, the privilege of receiving and disbursing the public money.

It was clealy a matter of favor up to the passage of the act of June, 1836, and the ground of rightful claim to the use of the public money, on the part of the banks since that time, I will leave for others to settle. The public funds were placed on deposite with these local institutions. They were permitted to retain them no longer than suited the convenience or favored the interest of the depositor. There was no contract that the banks should keep the deposites any length of time. It was perfectly competent for the depository to put an end to the trust at any moment. It could return the fund whenever it accorded with its convenience, or suited its pleasure; and the depositor would have no just cause of complaint. The nature of the relation between the Government and the banks, must necessarily have left either the one or the other at liberty to dissolve the connection at any moment. Such must have been the fair inference resulting from this relation anterior to June, 1836, when the act was passed to regulate the deposite of the public money in the selected depositories. That act conferred certain privileges, and imposed certain obligations upon the deposite banks; and if these institutions could show a fulfilment of all the duties devolving on them under this act, I certainly would not undertake to justify the withdrawal of the deposites, except for public purposes. If such were the state of the question, the Senator from Virginia might say that the passage of this bill would evince a hostility to the State deposite banks. But entirely different is the case: these local institutions have disregarded their obligations to the Government—have wholly failed to perform their engagements, and if they are now suffering, it is a suffering which they have brought upon themselves, without the privity or agency of the Government.

I most freely admit that the passage of this bill will effectually put down unsound and irresponsible banking insututions, while it can have no injurious effect upon those of an opposite character.

The bill contemplates the collection and disbursement of the revenue independent of banks. It seeks to separate from them as fiscal agents, to manage the affairs of the Government in its own way; but these acts evince no hostility to the banking system; it leaves the banks as it found them. The Government at no time employed but about one-tenth part of the banks of the country as public depositories. The neglect to employ the others, was never charged upon the Government as an act of hostility to them; and the discontinuance of those which may have been selected, cannot, with any more justice, be regarded as an act of hostility to them.

The hoarding of specie has been alleged to be the tendency of this measure, and on that account objectionable. I have listened to the course of remark in relation to this particular objection, and I really should suppose, from the character of the debate, that were the public revenues now all required to be collected in gold and silver, that the consequence would be the necessary abstraction of the whole amount of the revenues from actual circulation. That this Government collects to keep, not to disburse; and that every dollar which shall be paid into the National Treasury, is to be locked up in the iron chests and safes of the Department, and for all the uses of an actual moneyed capital, these collections might be as well sunk in the ocean. How is this, Mr. President? Is this Government thus to conduct its affairs? Is this Government thus to act the part of the sordid miser? Let us examine this subject, and we shall at once discover that nothing can be more unfounded than the charge, that the tendency of this measure is a hoarding up of specie. It can be matter of very little importance to the people what shall be the character of the revenue receipts, if those receipts are to be withdrawn from the circulating medium. If the moment they are deposited in the vaults of the Treasury, they are no longer to perform the offices of money; no longer to make a part of the general currency. The revenues might as well be collected in iron as in gold. But nothing can be further from the truth. The practical operation of our revenue system is but an indirect tax upon the people, and it would be equally an act of palpable injustice to collect money from them, either for the purpose of loaning to the banks, or of locking up in the Treasury.

I trust the time has at length arrived when, under the operation of our laws—with a well regulated commerce—a steady and natural course of trade and manufactures—when supply shall not exceed demand—that no more money will be drawn from the people than shall be necessary for the proper support of the Government. This is the grand desideratum in political economy—and to this point, not only the experience of the country, but the effect of the existing tariff system directly tends. Take, for example, the collections and disbursements for the last two years, and the result will show this fact most emphatically, that none of the people's money has been hoarded up in the public Treasury. It will show this additional fact, that the public receipts bear a most fortunate proportion to the public expenditures; that at the commencement of the year 1838, there was but a little more than a million of dollars unexpended in the Treasury, and that not less than fourteen millions of dollars was then remaining a charge upon the Treasury, as the balance of outstanding appropriations.

The receipts into the Treasury, in 1836, were - - -		$48,873,964 36
The balance in the Treasury, January 1st, 1836 - -		26,749,863 96
Making in the Treasury, January 1st, 1837 - - -		75,623,868 32
In the course of the year 1836 the actual expenditures amounted to	29,655,244 46
Leaving an unexpended balance, January 1st, 1837 - -	45,968,523 86
The receipts into the Treasury, received and estimated to January 1st, 1838, were - -	23,499,981 00
Making the amount of receipts, January 1st, 1838 - -	69,468,504 86
The expenditures, made and estimated in 1837 - - -	35,281,361 57
Leaving in the Treasury, January 1st, 1838 - - -	34,187,143 29
Of this balance, there has been deposited with the States -	$28,101,644 97
To this may be added the amount of funds not available, viz: -	5,000,000 00
Making the whole sum unavailable	33,101,644 97
Which will leave unexpended in the Treasury, Jan. 1st, 1838 -		$1,085,498 32

It will also appear, from the estimates of receipts and expenditures for the current year, as presented by the head of the Treasury Department, that there will be, on the first of January, 1839, less than a million and a half of dollars remaining in the public Treasury; and at the same time there will be a balance of old appropriations, chargeable upon the Treasury, of eleven millions of dollars. The idea, then, is preposterous, of hoarding up large amounts of the public money, of withdrawing from circulation, of abstracting from actual use, any alarming portions of the public funds.

The tariff of 1841 will bring down the revenues of the country to the wants of the Government; and there is every reasonable probability that the time is far removed when the public receipts shall very much exceed the public expenditures. Nor will the tendency of this measure be an internal drain of the precious metals, even upon the supposition that every dollar of the public revenues shall be collected in gold and silver; for this plain reason, that the amount collected from the people will be disbursed to the people; and that the kind of currency drawn from the people will return to them again. Nor can the tendency of this measure be to keep specie at a premium; or, in more appropriate language, to keep paper at a discount.
